religion to share with him the honor. The Puritans who used to show their contempt of Holy Days, by feasting on Good Friday, and fasting on Christmas, who discarded every symbol of communion with Papists, not excepting even the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer, and who made it a prime article of their faith—which faith was none—that the Pope is the incarnation of Antichrist, might well, we think, doubt their identity when they found themselves celebrating the anniversary of "the Day of the Pilgrims' Landing," in communion with a Roman Bishop, and expressing their joy in the Pontificate of Pius IX, not indeed by eating a mince pie, but by drinking a glass of wine. Indeed we cannot but suspect Bishop Hughes of indulging in the satirical: for he as a Roman Bishop, ex virtute officii, is entitled to every novelty of position, and can hardly be surprised to find himself in any; and we must therefore, suppose that his dignified comparison was meant as a covert satire upon the New England Society.

The whole affair is significant and deserves a graver comment; and this we shall give in the words of a sensible man who wrote some hundreds of years ago; mutatis mutandis, that is, substituting for Deism, the religion which is common to Dissenting Protestants, it suits the occasion as well as any thing we could write; or rather we may say, it is a prediction, of which the last New England Dinner denotes the fulfilment.

"We know the transition is very easy from superstition to infidelity; and I should be very glad to know, why it should not be as easy from infidelity to superstition; since we are very apt to run from one extreme to another. The present declared scheme of Deism is this: that people must be left to collect every one a religion for himself, independently, according as their ignorance, short-sightedness, or passions, which to be sure they will call their reason, shall mislead. Now as the best King that ever sat upon the throne could not wish a nation more wretched than that the precepts of the Gospel should be universally obeyed, and the doctrines of it, those strong incentives to virtue, universally believed throughout his kingdom; so the most ill-natured being, the most accursed spirit could not wish nation greater confusion than their scheme, so big with evils, would occasion if it should take place. The consequence of which would be, that as soon as the people were left to their own devices, they would fall into the same errors as the heathen nations of old."

Divisions of Christendom and Duties of Churchmen.

Whatever may be the evils affecting our present position, they are not new to the world. Christianity, at its origin, struggled with them in a much greater degree. Only it had then one great advantage which we have not. It was then embodied in one definite and acknowledged system which was matched against the world, and which suffered, bled, and prevailed.—Now men of the world ask, which is Christianity? Which is the true Bible? Which is the right Bishop? Which is the true Pastor? Which is the real thing? Or is there nothing real after all? From this statement you will see that what orators at public meetings declaim upon with so much effect, the union of Christians in agreeing to differ, because they despair of agreement, is in reality not a good, but a very frightful practical evil; an evil certain to be made worse, if not incurable, by the commendations bestowed on it. It has produced a great deal of secret infidelity, and will produce, I fear, a great deal more. There is a vast body of persons, who live entirely out of what is called the religious world, who are intelligent, thoughtful people, very keenly watching all that is now going on around them, and very much dissatisfied with all sects and all parties. They see a great number of persons claiming not only to be Christians, but in this country to be separate churches all disunited, often at open variance, never communicating with each other, yet in possession of the same Scriptures, and appealing to them in support of their different and contrary systems with equal confidence. I fear the effect upon minds of this description is a very great indifference to all, an indifference amounting to contempt.

It may be said, perhaps, that such differences are of no moment, and are felt to be of no moment by the parties themselves. I confess this is to me incredible. No rational pious persons would form separate communions for what they believed to be trifles, not founded on their religious convictions. But where is the community to whom their religious peculiarities do not appear of moment? Of so great moment that they are often represented by them as the key-stones to a right understanding of the Scriptures, and of the whole Gospel scheme.

It is again supposed that by the division of Christendom, more good is effected on the whole; the divided bodies stimulating each other to greater efforts. There would be more reason in this, if their efforts were all directed to a common point: but when a vast deal of this energy is exerted against each other, and by that means wasted, so that the web which one spins by day, the other unravels by night, it does not appear that we gain anything by our "unhappy divisions." What satisfaction is it to learn that in one place Roman Catholics have become Protestants, and in another Protestants have gone over to Rome; that here the Church has gained on the Wesleyans, and there the Baptists have prevailed over the Church, if the equilibrium of division be maintained on the whole, and good and pious men, on many of whom the Spirit of God has evidently descended, waste more than half their strength in undoing the good which others wish to do?

Nor is the evil much amended by many of the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel being held in common by all; for if any be denied, can there be, in the fulness of the Apostolic sense, "one Lord, one faith, one baptism?" Where is this residuary Christianity sanctioned in the New Testament? Is not the "everlasting Gospel," a system fixed, limited, and determined; neither to be diminished nor enlarged by mankind? Can that be a satisfactory state, when particular bodies of Christians make their selection of the truths of Revelation, and their brethren out of courtesy, agree not to press points of difference, which themselves, nevertheless, believe to be revealed? We may be thankful that many truths are held in common: but if they were held as they ought to be, our joint interest in them would unite us in Church-fellowship. Separation can never consist with a thorough discernment and holy love of religious truth.

Yet this sad division is not, in my view, the worst of our position as members of the Church in this Province. How fearful soever the evil I have been describing, we share it in common with all parts of the world. It is our common weakness, reproach, and punishment. There is, however, among many of the members of the Church in this Province, (and I am inclined to think that the evil is felt in other Provinces,) a surprising apathy, a want of conscious energy, without which nothing good or great can be accomplished, and a remarkable absence of public spirit. This may in some degree be imputed to the bad policy of the Mother Country. It arises, also, partly, without doubt, from the noble yet sadly-abused generosity of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, which did not insist from the first that the people should do their part in maintaining a religion to which they professedly belong. Yet the voluntary system of support seems peculiarly liable to a capricious and fitful charity, which promises much more than it ever intends to perform. Whatever be the causes, the facts (though painful) are too notorious to be denied, and to conceal them is to render the evil fixed and permanent. It is evident that much is received, and little paid. There can be no doubt that on the whole the balance of wealth lies on the side of the Church of England, yet, after making every allowance, I greatly fear that its members, taken as a whole, contribute less to the steady and continued maintenance of their own religion than the members of other religious communities. In several parts of the province, which it might be invidious to name, a large number of Church men, it is well known, do nothing for the support of the Church, or next to nothing. A few individuals give very liberally; and all that is done, to their honor be it spoken, is done by them, and they are called upon to give again and again. Yet those who do nothing are often very well able to afford to give, but always have an excuse ready: in truth, they feel little interest in religion, and they know that England is ready to help them, and they forget the fearful account which they will soon have to give. So great is their ignorance, that they obviously regard the funds of the Venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel as a kind of patrimonial inheritance laid up for themselves and their children, of which they are robbed, when it is not granted to them, forgetting that they are only pensioners on its bounty, that it receives now no support from Parliament, and that every body of Christians is bound to contribute to the maintenance of their own Clergy, and the support of their own charitable institutions.

It would indeed be only an act of justice, as well as gratitude to that noble Society, the nurse of all our Missions, that this Province, which has received so largely from its funds, should occasionally, if not stately, render it pecuniary assistance in return. I am persuaded that by many it is still regarded as a kind of government fund to which it is wholly unnecessary to contribute.

For though the Mother Country has her own duty to fulfil, nothing is more clear, than that, as long as we are wholly dependent on the charity of others, we shall never effectually maintain and propagate our own faith. And do we esteem that faith so lightly as to consider it a matter of small importance whether it be upheld or no? Are not they who remain in a Church without supporting it, even more guilty than they who leave it? I am unable at present to propose any general remedy with any hope of its being adopted. The only true remedy seems to me to be an assessment upon the property of Churchmen, for the support of their own religion. The burden would then be felt most by those who are the most able to bear it, and the charitable efforts of individuals would be applied in aid of poor and really destitute places.

It would be at the same time very ungrateful to deny that an increasing disposition to co-operate for the good of the Church has been manifested for some time past in many quarters, and that the liberal sums contributed to the Church Society are, it is to be hoped, an earnest that a better spirit is beginning to arise. And in saying what I deem it my duty to say on this point, I must not be understood to reflect on individuals, nor to deny a measure of willing co-operation; but to speak of the united efforts of the whole body of Churchmen, which I consider to be very far below what might easily be accomplished, and would be accomplished if men were as eager to practice religion as they are to dispute about it; or if their gifts were made on a systematic system of charity, and in any degree corresponding to what they lavish on themselves. And I take this opportunity of respectfully, but earnestly saying to my lay brethren, the merchants, shipowners, and landed proprietors of the Province, that it is their bounden duty on gospel principles, to make some permanent provision for the Church in the place where their fortunes are made, or their estates lie, out of the property which God, not their own might and power, has given them. Let them forgive me for reminding them, that "God is not mocked; but that whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

The root of the evil no doubt lies in that hollow worldliness, which makes men prefer the acquisition of wealth to the salvation of their souls. Indifferent to their own salvation, they care even less for the good of others. They are not properly Church-members, though they may be Church-goers. They abstain from the Holy Communion, deeming themselves unfit to receive it, and perhaps justly; yet they take no pains to become better and holier. Our Church is full of such broken reeds, who when we lean upon them, pierce us through and through with empty promises never made good to those who have depended on their fulfilment. A vast train of sins follow closely on this unholy state of mind. Parental discipline is wholly relaxed, so that little children become their own masters at a very early age, with the ignorance of children, and the cunning of men. Early indulgence as children induces habits of greediness in after years. Excess in eating and drinking, and an inordinate love of pampering the appetite, "making provision for the flesh," reign without check among us. Even at mid-day festive parties are held, in which the use of an inordinate quantity of wine is encouraged, and among both the younger and older members of society strong drink in immoderate quantities is continually used. Among some a great want of honour is observable in the ordinary transactions of life. In the remote districts a frightful irreverence in all divine offices is observable. Had it not been for the generous gifts of the two great Societies at home, there would often be neither Communion Table, nor Font, nor Vessels for the Holy Communion, nor a Linen Cloth, nor Books for the Offices. Even at present, in some places, the Vessels I have been compelled to use in administering the Lord's Supper would not be used in any decent parlor in the Province. The Canon which requires a Font of Stone is neglected in the great majority of Parishes, nor is there even a font of any durable material. Such are the results of leaving every man to do "that which is right in his own eyes." Man, the creature, despises his Creator, and pays him less reverence than he exacts from his fellow-sinners to himself.

Yet lest I should seem to discover no bright spots in our horizon, I thankfully acknowledge that there are those whose reverential love seems ever ripening, who are found daily in the temple, blessing and praising God: who are never absent from the Heavenly Board: whose hand never grows weary in charity, nor does their love evaporate in words: were Christ again on earth, these faithful souls would pour the spikenard on his sacred head, would anoint his body for the burial, would treasure up his holy sayings, would follow him, and minister to him of their substance. O that God would give us to see more of this blessed spirit: that he would root out heartless doubt, and hollow suspicion, and grovelling deceit from among us: that he would give us truly to believe that there is a God, a heaven, a hell, a future state of retribution: that he would teach us to make our Prayer Books real books of Prayer: our houses, houses of prayer; and would make our hearts his home: that he would grant to all who bear the Church's name to be honest Churchmen and consistent Christians!

FROM BISHOP HENSHAW'S SERMON AT THE CONSECRATION OF DR. BURGESS.

1 Timothy, Chapter iii. verse 15.—"That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself, in the House of God, which is the Church of the Living God, the pillar and ground of the Truth."

The theme presented in these words addressed by St. Paul to Timothy, the first Bishop of the Church at Ephesus, will not be deemed an unsuitable one for our meditations upon this solemn and interesting occasion, when a brother, faithful and beloved, is to be consecrated to the same high office in the church of God. May the Lord guide and bless our thoughts while we speak.

I. Of the Nature of the Church of the Living God.

II. Of its Office or Uses as described in the text.

III. Of the Department which becomes us as its Ministers and Members.

The text, as is well known to theologians, has been the subject of controversy. It has been falsely claimed by the Church of Rome as sustaining her arrogant pretensions to infallibility and to the exercise of tyrannical authority in matters of faith and discipline, as the self-styled "Mother and Mistress of all churches." On the other hand, some Protestants, who seem to have adopted it as a principle that truth is to be found in the widest possible departure from every thing that has the semblance of Romish interpretation,—have run into the opposite error of denying the proper office of the Christian church, and, by absurd and constrained criticisms upon the original Greek, have labored to deprive the passage of all meaning, or to force one upon it too visionary and ridiculous to be believed.

We should not, indeed, give the slightest countenance to the false pretension of Rome. If any one local church be referred to in the text, it must have been that of Ephesus, over which Timothy presided, and not that of Rome, with which he had no official connection. We should boldly maintain the protest of our martyred Fathers against the alleged infallibility of a communion which has been so vacillating and changeable in her aspects, that the reader of ecclesiastical history can with difficulty find any resemblance between the church of Rome in the fifth and sixth centuries, when corruption was in its bud and blossom—and the same communion, when it had produced the ripened fruits of corruption, in transubstantiation, Purgatory, the idolatrous worship of images, the saints and the virgin, indulgences, and other abominations by which piety was overlaid and smothered and the truth almost utterly extinguished during the dark ages which preceded the Reformation. Talk to us of the infallibility and unchangeableness of Rome. Where is the man who has ingenuously enough to trace a resemblance between Romanism in the nineteenth century—courting the favor of Princes and succumbing to the prejudices of the mob, flaunting in its gaudy robes of pride, and in the temporary vigor of its spasmodic resuscitation—boasting great things,—and the humble, devoted, world-renouncing, holy Catholicism of the first three centuries of the Christian era? Shall we ever concede the arrogant claim of unity to a communion whose different societies and orders have been distinguished by their mutual jealousy, distrust and crimination?—To a communion, in which, at different periods, Popes have been arrayed against Popes, and the decrees of one Council have been overruled and nullified by those of another? Shall we reverence as "the pillar and ground of the truth" a communion whose career, for centuries, was marked by her gradual corruptions of the faith, and whose iron power has been often exerted in the enforcement of gross errors and the suppression of most important truths? We cannot do this without treasonable infidelity to our trust.

But are we at liberty to resist these false pretensions, so boldly put forward by a corrupt communion, by assumptions which are equally hollow and futile? May we, for the sake of rebutting the specious, but false, argument which Rome draws from the text, deny its fair and legitimate meaning? May we mould it, like wax, to suit our purposes,—or mutilate it, by the rash and daring exercise of critical surgery? I need hardly say that such a course, equally with that already condemned, would be infidelity to our trust. If the former, be a perversion of the meaning of the word of God, the latter is a mutilation and change of its literal instructions. It is no less dangerous to make that word void by unfair criticism than by corrupt tradition. If this were a proper occasion for it, we might show that this charge would lie against those interpretations of the text which make the words "pillar and ground of the truth" refer to Timothy, on the one hand, or to the doctrines stated in the following verse, on the other. The exegesis of the original text, according to the soundest rules of criticism, concurs with the historical argument, in showing that the true meaning of the passage is that which it presents to the mind of the humble and intelligent Christian on reading our English version of it. By "the house of God," and "the church of the living God," the same thing is intended: and that thing, whatever it be, is designated as "the pillar and ground of the truth."

These preliminary remarks have prepared the way for our illustration and enforcement of the positive teaching of the text: "That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the House of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth."

I. Our first point relates to the Nature of the Church of the Living God.

What is the meaning of the phrase here employed—"the house of God, which is the church of the living God?" Under the Old Testament dispensation Jehovah was said to have his abode in the Tabernacle, and afterwards in the Temple.—But why was a moveable tent, or a building constructed by human hands, spoken of as the house, the dwelling place of Him who flieth immensity with his presence, and whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain? Because there was the visible symbol of His presence—the cloud overshadowing the mercy seat and the ark of the covenant, between the wings of the cherubim. There He received the devotions of his chosen. There His priests offered up the prescribed sacrifices, pronounced benedictions, and dispensed favors to His people.—There was realized the presence of that Holy One, who, in a pillar of cloud and fire accompanied them in their wanderings through the wilderness. There he fulfilled the promise—"Wherever I record my name, I will come unto thee and bless thee." On this account, the pious worshippers had so profound a reverence and so ardent a love for the Tabernacle and the Temple. This may account for the strong terms, and burning words which broke forth from the soul and the lips of David in his state of temporary banishment from the sanctuary: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so thirsteth my soul after Thee, O God! O, how amiable are thy dwellings, thou Lord of Hosts. My soul hath a desire and longing to enter into the courts of the Lord. O, send out thy light and thy truth, that they may lead me, and bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy dwelling. And that I may go unto the altar of God, even unto God my exceeding joy: and upon the harp will I praise Thee, O God, my God."

Those tokens and symbols with which the chosen people were favored before the Advent of Messiah, were but types of better things,—shadows of the substantial blessings which have since been vouchsafed.

Under the Gospel dispensation, God has indeed come down to dwell upon earth. He was "manifested in the flesh." He "was made of flesh and dwelt among us" in the person of our Redeemer. And ever since our Lord's triumphant ascension and the Mission of the Comforter, the mystery of the Incarnation, has, though in another sense and a different manner, been as it were perpetuated upon earth. The promise to the Apostles and their successors in the ministry was, "Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." The promise to the assemblies of his worshippers was, "Wherever two or three are assembled together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." The promise of the New Covenant, in which every individual disciple has an interest, was, "I will dwell in them and walk in them, they shall be my people, and I will be their God." These promises are in a course of fulfilment. I they have any intelligible meaning,—(which it would be infidelity to doubt,)—they teach us that the Lord is present in the Christian church, not merely in outward tokens and visible symbols, but by the grace and power of the Holy Spirit. The Church is the "House of God"—His dwelling place—"built together for an habitation of God, through the Spirit."

The word Church then, according to its general usage by the inspired writers, means the great body of believers under the teaching and government of divinely appointed Pastors holding the true "faith once delivered to the saints," maintaining pure worship, and living in communion with God by means of sacraments and prayers. If it be true of every spiritual and renovated man that Christ liveth in him; if it be true of every sound branch of the Christian church, that God dwells there as in His house; how much more emphatically true is it of the entire church, confined to no land, but scattered through all nations—that company, or "congregation of faithful men in the which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same."

We may, indeed, if we please, speak of the church as invisible when we refer to its spiritual members as they appear to the eye of God—and to their state after temporal probation is closed; but when we speak of the church as having an office assigned to it upon earth—or having any duty to perform, "the church whom this doth concern," says the judicious Hooker "is a sensible known company. And this visible church in like sort is but the one continued from the first beginning of the world to the last end.And therefore the Apostle affirmeth plainly of all men Christian, that be they Jews or Gentiles bond or free, they are all incorporated into one company, the all make but one body. The unity of which visible body and church of Christ consisteth in that uniformity which all several persons thereunto belonging have, by reason of that one Lord, whose servants all they profess themselves; that one faith which they all acknowledge; that one Baptism, wherewith they are all initiated. The visible Church of Jesus Christ is therefore one in outward profession of those things which supernaturally appertain to the very essence of Christianity, and are necessarily required in every particular Christian man."

The text speaks of an office to be performed, a duty to be discharged by the church. There is not here, therefore, (according to Hooker) reference to an airy metaphysical abstraction,—to an invisible spirituality or conception to which we give the name of church; but to a visible body, an organized corporation existing in this world, though not of it. An institution established upon earth as a witness for God, the teacher of His truth, and the advocate of His holiness; existing through all generations, and giving light to all Nations. This Church is the instrumental conveyer of salvation, the almoner of God's grace, the dispenser of His covenant blessings to mankind. It is the same society originally instituted by Christ and His Apostles, to which His presence and blessing were promised, and which in its leading and essential features, has continued unchanged through all the mutations of this world's history:

By "the church of the living God" spoken of in the text, is meant, not any particular local communion, as the church of England, the church of America, or the Church of Rome; but the entire body of the faithful, proving its lineal descent from the Primitive Church of Christ, by the preservation of Primitive doctrines and primitive institutions. Wherever you find a Christian community under the ministry of Apostolical succession, holding the great truths of the word of God, maintaining His pure worship, and celebrating the sacraments according to Christ's ordinance, whether it be in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America, there you find a part of "the church of the living God" spoken of in the text. In this we profess our belief in the Apostles' creed, under the name of "The Holy Catholic church;" so called, to distinguish it not only from infidels and idolaters, but also from those heretical and schismatical communions which falsely usurp its name, and presumptuously claim its privileges.

II. What is the Office of the Church as described in the text? This is the second point to which we invite your attention. The Church of the living God is here declared to be "the pillar and ground of the truth." * * * * *

Is it Bible truth that man is fallen, corrupt and guilty, that he can be justified only by the free grace of God through faith in the atonement and righteousness of Jesus Christ, that he is dependent upon the aid of the Holy Spirit for the will and the power to do that which is good,—and that, unless renewed and sanctified by His agency, he can never be admitted into Heaven? How fully and strongly are these teachings of Revelation echoed by the voice of our church? You find them recorded in clear and unequivocal language, in her Articles and Homilies; not only so, but impregnating her devotional services so thoroughly, that you find a distinct recognition of them even in her shortest Collects. Yes! These evangelical truths—these precious doctrines of grace are written in fair and legible characters upon every part of this pillar of the truth, while Doxologies and Anthems, winding in graceful folds around it, cover it all over with the glory of the Eternal Trinity. At every step of our progress in the public services of the sanctuary, we are reminded of our indebtedness to the love of the Father, the merits of the Son, and the grace of the Holy Ghost.

Thus brethren, we have shown you, how our church, as a sound branch of the Church Universal, faithfully executes her office as a "Pillar of the truth."

In saying, we do not deny that some truth is to be found elsewhere. We are willing to admit that every Christian others, commonly known as Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Unitarians, &c., who again are subdivided into countless subdivisions, representing every variety of opinion from stark Deism up to the most rigid supra-lapsarian Calvinism. The grand characteristic of the former division of Protestants is faith in the word of God as interpreted by the ancient Church, i. e. the Book of Common Prayer; that of the latter, faith in the word of God as interpreted by each man's private opinion, which is too apt to be to his humor or fancy.

This latter division of Protestants, this vast congeries of sects, have, notwithstanding their variety, certain exponents of unity; such, for instance, as the World's Convention, Evangelical Alliances, American Societies for the diffusion of the Bible with no man's note or comment, or (for extremes meet) with every man's note and comment, for the circulation of tracts, &c., &c. But their most definite form and representation of unity is the New England Society, which meets annually on the 22d of December to commemorate the virtues and the arrival to this Western Hemisphere of the Puritans, from whom all American Protestants of the second division are descended.

The Puritan Protestants have a custom, it seems, of testifying their spiritual joy by a good dinner; and on the last 22d, having had "the introductory prayer," and Mrs. Hemans' "Pilgrim Fathers," and a suitable oration in the Tabernacle, the New England Society adjourned to the Astor House in the evening to partake, according to custom, of the Dinner. "Among the distinguished gentlemen present," as we read in one of the daily papers, "there sat, on the right hand of the President, the Rt. Rev. Bishop HUGHES, John A. King, Esq., President of the St. Nicholas Society; James Reyburn, Esq., President of the St. Patrick's Society; the President of St. David's Society; Col. W. Burnett, and several other gentlemen; on his left the Orator of the Day, Mr. Maxwell of the St. Andrew's Society, Mr. Bierworth of the German Society, Mr. Lentillon of the French Society, Commodore Sloat, and others."

It seems also that the Puritan Protestants, (or if the reader please, the Protestants par excellence, we wish only to distinguish them from Church Protestants,) have a custom of drinking toasts, i. e. of expressing some joyous sentiment in unison by quaffing a glass of wine. Among the toasts announced on this occasion by the President of the Society was, as we learn from the aforesaid voucher, "The present Sovereign Pontiff of Rome, Pius IX.!" And we further read:—

The toast of Pius was drunk with the greatest enthusiasm. Bishop HUGHES replied to it, expressing his embarrassment at his truly novel position. If he were to give way to his feelings, he should almost question the reality of what he saw around him, or doubt his own identity. He would return his own thanks, and as far as he was worthy to do so, those of Pius IX. for the honor just received at the hands of the Chairman, an honor of which he was deeply sensible. It was a gratification him to say that the promise of the elevation of Pius IX, to Pontificate was full of hope. He believed God had predestined him for his great task with a clear head and a strong heart. (Applause.) For himself he felt much in the situation he man in the old English legend, whose horse had been an away while he was asleep, and who reasoned according to the Aristotelian logic, that if he were himself he had lost a se, but if he were not he had gained a cart. (Applause.) think that he who used to be called Bishop Hughes, found self in the midst of the New England Society, and heard health of Pius IX, drank with so much enthusiasm made doubt almost the reality of things.—N. Y. Tribune, Dec. 23. Whether Bishop Hughes truly represented his own condition or not, is a point of which he is doubtless himself the judge. But one thing is certain, viz., that if the Bishop is a meet representative of Giles Scroggins, (for in the more genial report of the Courier, the Bishop is said to have given Scroggins as the name of his worthy type,) he had many friends to share with him the honor. The Puritans who used to show their contempt of Holy Days, by feasting on Good day, and fasting on Christmas, who discarded every symbol communion with Papists, not excepting even the Apostles' and the Lord's Prayer, and who made it a prime article their faith—which faith was none—that the Pope is the incarnation of Antichrist, might well, we think, doubt their nity when they themselves celebrating the anniversary "the Day of the Pilgrims' Landing," in communion with a man Bishop, and expressing their joy in the Pontificate of Pius IX, not indeed by eating a mince pie, but by drinking a glass of wine. Indeed we cannot but suspect Bishop Hughes indulging in the satirical: for he as a Roman Bishop, ex officio, is entitled to every novelty of position, and can only be surprised to find himself in any; and we must therefore suppose that his dignified comparison was meant as a mere satire upon the New England Society. The whole affair is significant and deserves a graver comment; and this we shall give in the words of a sensible man who wrote some hundreds of years ago; mutatis mutandis, that substituting for Deism, the religion which is common to Distinguishing Protestants, it suits the occasion as well as any thing we could write; or rather we may say, it is a prediction, of which the last New England Dinner denotes the fulfilment. "We know the transition is very easy from superstition to idolatry; and I should be very glad to know, why it should be as easy from infidelity to superstition; since we are very apt to run from one extreme to another. The present declared name of Deism is this: that people must be left to collect for one a religion for himself, independently, according as his ignorance, short-sightedness, or passions, which to be sure they will call their reason, shall mislead. Now as the best thing that ever sat upon the throne could not wish a nation more opinionless than that the precepts of the Gospel should be universally obeyed, and the doctrines of it, those strong incentives to virtue, universally believed throughout his kingdom; so the ill-natured being, the most accursed spirit could not wish a greater confusion than their scheme, so big with evils, would occasion if it should take place. The consequence of which would be, that as soon as the people opened their eyes, I saw the numerous train of miseries that it had plunged them into, how an unrestrained freedom of thought had everywhere produced a correspondent freedom in action, they would receive an utter abhorrence of what had been the source of so many evils; and resolved to fly precipitately through an inveterate, undistinguishing hatred, as far as ever they could get from delirium, (the farther, they would think, the better) they would run into the very jaws of Popery. They might indeed rove out for a while pleased in the mazes of error; but weary of many crude notions, weary of wandering, ever seeking rest, finding none, they might be tempted at last to take up with the pretended infallible guide. Thus, this nation would tread in a bound of error. The cant and enthusiasm in the time of the rebellion begat in the next generation an abandoned profligacy and immorality, which was productive of infidelity, which hath been growing ever since; and may at last, if it goes on, produce enthusiasm or something worse. We dance a circle, and may end in the same point where we set out." Seed's Sermons, Vol. 3, p. 200.

Questions respecting a Liturgy.

BY A LATE CLERGYMAN IN THE DIOCESE OF ARMAGH.

"O, worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness."—Ps. xcvi. 9.

I. What is the meaning of the word liturgy?—"A form of public worship."

II. What Christian churches make use of a liturgy?—"In truth, all congregations of every denomination, when assembled for and engaged in divine service do necessarily use a 'form of worship' or 'liturgy.'"

III. How can this be the case, since churches differ so widely in each other?—"Some churches prefer a fixed or appointed liturgy, prepared with wise and pious carefulness, such as the Churchmen, Moravians, and all episcopalians; other churches use 'a form' provided merely by an individual, such as presbyterians and other dissenters."

IV. Can the public service of the latter kind be considered a form or liturgy?—"especially if extemporaneous prayers are introduced?—Yes; for in truth, whether the minister prays from memory, or in words suggested to his mind at the moment, it is 'a form of prayer,' which, united with the stated services of the congregation, thus supplies a liturgy to those assembled."

V. Which is the better and preferable mode?—"The fixed and appointed liturgy; because it is more likely to be correctly executed, when many learned heads and pious hearts have been employed in the preparation of a permanent form, than if one person only (however eminent) is engaged."

VI. Is there authority in scripture for thus using 'a form of worship' prepared beforehand?—"Yes; for the Jews (who in such matters were instructed by God himself) had, during many ages of divine favour, an established liturgy: also, John the Baptist, acting by inspiration, had taught his followers another form; and, afterwards, Jesus himself (approving of such systems) gave 'a form of prayer' to be a part, as well as the pattern, of future liturgies."

VII. What are the benefits arising from, and secured by the adoption of an appointed liturgy?

1st. St. Paul's advice (as written in 1 Cor. xiv. 14, 15), is most accurately followed, it being, in this mode, easy to understand the whole service, which abounds with spiritual truth.

2nd. His exhortation (as delivered in 1 Tim. ii. 1) is always attended to.

3rd. A sufficiency of prayer and of scripture is secured, not depending on the talents, caprices, or feelings of the minister.

4th. The communion, or spiritual connexion of saints, is more effectually preserved; all persons of the same church, however scattered through the world, at the same time using the same words, asking the same blessings, and hearing the same portions of scripture.

5th. By the regular recurrence of the liturgy, the weakest memory is enabled to remember many prayers, and many well selected parts of holy writ (a great source of comfort in times of sickness and sorrow).

VIII. What are the chief excellencies of that liturgy, which was made and is used by the church of England?

1st. It is plain, affectionate, and beautiful in its language.

2nd. It is very full of portions and expressions of scripture.

3rd. It is so comprehensive, that it embraces all possible wants and wishes, and is suited to persons of every age, rank, and situation.

4th. It is true and scriptural in its doctrines, duties and directions.

5th. It furnishes good answers and useful exhortations against all prevailing errors and dangerous heresies.

6th. Its forms and the variety in its services tend in a most salutary way to keep the thoughts of the worshippers from heedless wanderings.

IX. How is this last benefit secured by the liturgy of the church?—1st. A change of posture often rouses a careless worshipper. 2nd. The privilege of speaking occasionally greatly helps attention.

X. How is the fifth benefit effected?—In many ways; but, as examples, it will suffice to state that the shortness of prayers called collects (which always terminate with an address to Jesus Christ) plainly opposes the Roman invocation of saints; and the frequent repetition of the doxology is a barrier against arian and socinian tenets.—Ch. of Eng. Mag.

Bowing at the Name of Jesus.

The root-and-branch men, feeling now that audacity insured success, and that every success increased their numbers and their strength, moved that there might be liberty to disuse the Common Prayer, by reason that in many things it gave offence to tender consciences. The majority at once rejected the motion, well knowing, that "if that which offends the weak brother is to be avoided, much more that which offends the strong." But on the very next day, in violation of all parliamentary rules, the Puritans, finding themselves masters of a thin House, suspended the yesterday's order, and passed a resolution that the communion table should be removed from its appointed place; the rails which enclosed it pulled down; and the chancel levelled; and that no man should presume to bow at the name of Jesus. Sir Edward Deering, who now on all occasions stood forward in defence of the Church, opposed this last infamous decree with great feeling. "Hear me," said he, "with patience, and refute me with reason. Your command is, that all corporal bowing at the name of Jesus be henceforth forbidden. I have often wished that we might decline these dogmatical resolutions in divinity. I say it again and again, that we are not idonei et competentes iudices in doctrinal determination. The theme we are now upon is a sad point. I pray you consider severely on it. You know there is no other Name under Heaven among men whereby we must be saved! You know this is a Name above every name. Oleum effusum nomen ejus: it is the catol of his spouse. This name is by a Father styled mel in ore; melos in aure; jubulum in corde. This is the sweetest and the fullest of comfort of all names and attributes of God, God my Saviour. If Christ were not out Jesus, Heaven were then our envy, which is now our blessed hope."

"And must I, sir, hereafter do no exterior reverence—none at all—to God my Saviour, at the mention of his saving name, Jesus? Why, sir, not to do it—to omit it, and to leave it undone, it is questionable, it is controvertible; it is at least a moot point in divinity. But to deny it—to forbid it to be done!—take heed, sir! God will never own you if you forbid his honour. Truly, sir, it horrors me to think of this. For my part, I do humbly ask pardon of this House, and thereupon I take leave and liberty to give you my resolute resolution. I may—I must—I will do bodily reverence unto my Saviour, and that upon occasion taken at the mention of his saving name, Jesus.—And if I should do it also as of the name of God, Jehovah, or Christ is named in our solemn devotions, I do not know any argument in divinity to control me."

"Mr. Speaker, I shall never be frightened from this, with that fond, shallow argument, 'Oh! you make an idol of a name!' I beseech you, sir, paint me a voice,—make a sound visible if you can. When you have taught mine eyes to hear, I may then perhaps understand this subtle argument. In the meantime reduce this dainty species of new idolatry under its proper head, the second commandment, if you can, and if I find it there, I will fly from it ultra Saturnum, any where with you. . . Was it ever heard before, that any man, of any religion, in any age, did never cut short, or abridge any worship, upon any occasion, to their God? Take heed, sir, and let us all take heed, whither we are going! If Christ be Jesus, if Jesus be God, all reverence, exterior, as well as interior, is too little for him. I hope we are not going up the back stairs to Socinianism. . . In a word certainly, sir, I shall not obey your order, so long as I have a head to lift up to Heaven, so long as I have an eye to lift up to Heaven. For these are corporal bowings, and my Saviour shall have them at his name Jesus!" Southey's Book of the Church, chap. xviii.

The Burial Service.

From "The Village," by the Rev. John East.

"When I was curate of St. James's, Bristol, I read the funeral service over nearly a thousand graves within the short space of rather less than six years. My mind often felt depressed by the apparent unconcern of those who wore the garb of mourners, and at the indifference, and even levity of the numerous passengers, to whom the spectacle of an open sepulchre was familiar. I used frequently to observe persons gazing idly from the windows of habitations which surrounded the burial-ground on every side, and wondered to myself what might be their feelings."

One part of St. James's church-yard is separated from those houses only by a narrow road: on that side the work of death most frequently required my attendance, because there were deposited, in their crowded and scarcely separated graves, the numerous deceased paupers of that populous parish. Into one of those houses I was summoned, on the last day of January, 1823, to visit the wife of a respectable tradesman, who there carried on his business. She had been confined to her room by pulmonary disease through the winter, and she lingered to the beginning of March. The window of her chamber looked into the field of graves, and was sufficiently near for her to hear my voice when I read the service over the departed poor. She was induced to take her prayer-book and stand or sit by the window, and follow me through the solemn liturgy of the dead. This was the happy moment of first enlightening her soul as to its own state, and of conducting her to the Saviour in whom she found pardon, peace, and at last eternal life. Her living and dying testimony was most clear and satisfactory. It was truly delightful to listen to the humble, scriptural, and instructive details of her experience. It might be said with truth, that it was the daily tolling funeral knell which called her soul to Christ, and that the seed of everlasting life was wafted to her heart from the grave."

I seldom fail to think of this fact, when I am engaged in the solemn service of the dead; it has frequently encouraged me to hope, that the repetition of our well-known formularies may be of more benefit to the spectators than we are inclined to expect.—The Church.

For Our Young Readers.

THE WILLOW, POPPY AND VIOLET.

A child held in his hand a slight leafless bough. It was like a supple, green wand. But it had been newly cut from the parent stock, and life stirred in its little heart.

He sought out a sheltered spot, and planted it in the moist earth. Often did he visit it, and when the rains of summer were withheld, he watered it, at the cool sunset.

The sap, which is the blood of plants, began to flow through its tender vessels. A tiny root, like a thread, crept downward, and round the head was a bursting forth of faint, green leaves.

Seasons passed over it, and it became a tree. Its slender branches drooped downward to the earth. The cheering sun smiled upon them; the happy birds sung to them; but they drooped still.

"Tree, why art thou always so sad and drooping? Am not I kind to thee? But it answered not; only as it grew on, it drooped lower and lower; for it was a Weeping Willow.

The boy cast seed into the soft garden mould. When the time of flowers came, a strong budding stalk stood there, with coarse, serrated leaves. Soon a full red poppy came forth glorying in its gaudy dress. At its feet grew a purple violet, which no hand had planted or cherished.

It lived lovingly with the mosses, and with the frail flowers of the grass, not counting itself more excellent than they.

"Large poppy? why dost thou spread out thy scarlet robe so widely, and drink up all the sunbeams from my lowly violet?"

But the flaunting flower replied not to him who planted it. It even seemed to open its rich mantle still more broadly, as though it would have stifled its humble neighbours. Yet nothing hindered the fragrance of the meek violet.

The little child was troubled, and at the hour of sleep he spake to his mother of the tree that continually wept, and of the plant that overshadowed its neighbour. So she took him on her knee and spake so tenderly in his ear, that he remembered her words when he became a man.

"There are some who, like the willow, are weepers all their lives long, though they dwell in pleasant places, and the fair skies shine upon them in love. And there are those, who, like the poppy that thou reprovest, are proud at heart, and despise the humble, whom God regardeth."

"Be thou not like them, my gentle child; but keep ever in thy breast the sweet spirit of the lowly violet, that thou mayest come at last to that blessed place which pride cannot enter, and where the sound of weeping is unknown."—Mrs. Sigourney.

BE COURTEOUS.—In this age of blunt remark and disrespectful language, it may seem quaint and old-fashioned to recommend to you the duty of courtesy. No young man is educated, no young man is fitted for society, till he has learned how to be respectful and polite. In the home of your youth, to your superiors and your equals,* this trait of character should be cultivated and displayed. Civility costs but little; yet it will work a man's way through life, and secure him friends with a certainty that nothing can equal. A gentleman, who from obscurity and poverty, had arisen to fame and wealth, was once inquired of for the charm that led to such results. "I owe my whole success," said he, "to one small word—civility." If you will respect the rights and feelings of others, your own will be respected.

* And to your inferiors if you think you have any.—ED. BAN.

LYRA APOSTOLICA.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1848.

To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 89 south Fifth street, Philadelphia.

THE BANNER OF THE CROSS begins the New Year under the direction of a new Editor, whether auspiciously or not, the issue alone can determine. As its success must depend upon future performances rather than upon present promises; we shall not begin by telling what good things we are going to do, but rather strive in the course of our humble labors "by manifestation of the truth to commend ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God."

This much the present editor feels bound to say, that he enters upon his new duties with a full apprehension of the solemn responsibilities involved in the conduct of a Religious Journal. At a time when serious and delicate questions force themselves into public discussion, to secure universal approval or to escape particular condemnation, is not possible. But we indulge the hope, perhaps the vain expectation of inexperience, that the truth can be spoken, and our distinctive principles maintained in a spirit, not of compromise but of love, which may disarm hostility though it may not prevent opposition.

Upon the great questions which have excited the Church, the Banner of the Cross has always held firmly and consistently to the principles which, in the judgment of its friends, are those of the gospel attested by its "witness and keeper," "the Church of the living God, the Pillar and ground of the truth." As these ever have been, so shall they continue to be the sole guides of its teachings. That it never has erred or never shall err, in the promulgation of these, would be to require of its editors a measure of infallibility, which it is absurd in man to claim, and unjust in man to expect from his erring fellow beings. For its past and future errors it only asks that charitable judgment which man must accord to his fellows, as he himself hopes for it from his God.

The same general character which has marked this paper shall continue, only with that difference which must appear in the work of different minds, and the same object shall still be kept steadily in view, viz., to furnish useful and profitable reading for the family circle, the theologian and the scholar—and to convey such intelligence as may seem, in the judgment of its editor, of sufficient importance to be known.

We have the promise of help from some able minds, to give interest and character to the department of "Communications." And as this is the department in our religious newspapers, most exposed to evil, perfect honesty shall be exercised in the reception or rejection of all articles, and the editor shall always choose, as the safest course, to offend the vanity of a correspondent rather than to do injury to the church of God. Nor shall the editor of this paper feel at liberty to open its columns as a Theological Gymnasium for those who write merely for exercise.

Religious intelligence, from the foreign and home journals, shall be as full and selected with as great care as possible.

The present number begins our year, and as we wish most heartily the friends and patrons of this paper "a happy new year," would it be too much for so humble an offering to ask their good wishes in return? And as good wishes, if they be honest, always lead to good deeds, may we not look for those most grateful new year's gifts to a paper, viz., new subscribers? Very slight individual efforts in the many different portions of the church (including every Diocese) whither the Banner has made its way, would greatly increase its circulation, and enable its Proprietor to make it, what he truly desires it to be, more worthy of the regard of its friends.

And in return for these expected efforts it will be the earnest endeavour of the editor to make this Journal the humble means of doing as much good, and as little harm, as possible to the church, so that the Banner of the Cross shall be true to the noble inscription it bears.—PRO DEO, PRO ECCLESIA, PRO HOMINUM SALUTE.

—Rev. Dr. Norton

THE NEW DESIGN FOR THE BANNER OF THE CROSS.—In adopting the new and beautiful design which adorns the first number of this year's volume, we are not to be thought as expressing thereby any dissatisfaction with the former one. The simple design, drawn by a faithful friend, which has so long borne upon its graceful folds the symbol of our faith, enlightened by a star through whose leading a Saviour was first manifested, must be dear to all who regard the Banner of the Cross. Beneath that Banner, firm hands and true hearts have rallied round the glorious faith which it expresses, and "Seiz'd it with no faltering hold."

And we may humbly trust that beneath "its foldings high and fair" some immortal trophies have been won.

The causes which have led to this change are simply these. The new design was sent, without solicitation, to the Proprietor of the Banner, as a grateful offering for some kindness rendered to "a stranger." And what makes it more interesting is the fact that the kindness has no place in the memory of him who has received this pleasant return.

The name of the donor, who is also the engraver, which we feel bound to record, is Mr. J. Caughey, 56 Gold street, New York.

We are sure, however much the readers of the Banner are attached to the old design, they will be reconciled to the new, if for no other reason, at least as the occasion of the beautiful lines which it has suggested from the truly poetical pen of the Rev. Dr. Lyons.

A WORD TO THE WISE.—We have cut the following from an exchange paper, and in reference to the great service which they might thus render, we wish our friends, male as well as female, would provide themselves with "Revolvers" of this sort, and use them as effectively as this lady used her "Pocket pistol."

GETTING SUBSCRIBERS.—The American Messenger says: "A lady in a neighbouring village has sent the names of one hundred and seventy-six subscribers. The following extract from her letter shows the secret of her success. 'I set about the work, I trust, with faith, and the result has proved that I have not laboured in vain. I carried my book of subscribers' names with me wherever I went. I presented my pocket pistol to every body I met, and I did not present it in vain. I conquered wherever I attacked.'"

The following pleasant effusion of a spirit which once gave life to the Banner, although somewhat personal, we feel bound to give for the entertainment of our readers. It is not the present Editor's fault that its author did not take a share of the Sisyphean labors of which he speaks as one "haud ignarus mali." The greatest difficulty in the way of such an arrangement, we suspect was that it would have imposed upon him the title of "senior editor"! If to be forewarned of coming evil is to be forearmed against it, then the new Editor is pretty well guarded. If an Editor may be compared to a patriarch, then, according to the best authorities, his "see" is one "of troubles!" Indeed some of our kind friends who have no doubt of "the salvability of the heathen," entertain serious doubts as to the salvability of the editors of religious papers! On the whole, we feel pretty much in the mental condition of Giles Scroggins, as represented by Bishop Hughes, (who has sadly miscalled his hero) at the Puritan dinner. We are puzzled to determine whether in taking this new office we "have gained a cart" or "lost a horse!" Our readers will see with what cause, when they have perused what follows from "an old editor."

For the Banner of the Cross.

Editorial Life and Trials.

MY DEAR EDITOR:—

There are not a few who will feel as much pleasure as I do at your elevation to the editorial tripod; but there are few who can so feel with and for you at your entrance on your new and dignified calling. Having myself conducted a weekly periodical for years, I know the severe mental labour and toil which it imposes on one who exercises his vocation with a continual consciousness of its duties and responsibilities, and how little his labours and trials are understood and appreciated by most people. It is the stone of Sisyphus—an endless repetition of toil—a constant weight upon the intellect and spirits; or, as Capt. Marryat observes, (who also spoke from experience, having once edited a monthly magazine—and the remarks apply still more strongly to a weekly paper,) "it is something like walking a thousand miles in a thousand hours:—in itself, it appears nothing, the labour is not manifest; nor is it the labour—it is the continual attention it requires; your life becomes, as it were, the magazine; one is no sooner corrected and printed, than on comes another."

But then, for your encouragement, my dear Banner-bearer, remember the extended sphere in which you are now called to move—the immediate contact into which you are brought with the public mind—and the immense influence you will exert in giving a tone to public sentiment and opinion, and in guiding public morals and religion.—The parochial clergyman is hemmed in by the walls of his church and the bounds of his parish;

but to the voice of the editor, there are thousands and tens of thousands whom he will never see who listen weekly, as the mails carry his speculations from parish to parish, and from one diocese to another throughout the whole country and world. You will remember that a few years ago, one of our Right Rev. Fathers compared editors to patriarchs. I know you are too modest to claim such high powers and extensive jurisdiction; but some of the fraternity, not satisfied with a three-legged stool, have seized the triple crown, and claimed infallibility, with the Pope himself; like the editor I have heard of out West, between whom and a visitant at his office one morning the following dialogue took place:—

"Sir, your journal of yesterday contained false information."

"Impossible, sir!—but tell me, what do you allude to?"

"You said that Mr. M—— had been tried."

"True."

"Condemned."

"Very true."

"Hung."

"Most true."

"Now, sir, I am the gentleman himself."

"Impossible!"

"I assure you it is a fact, and now I hope you will contradict what you have alleged."

"By no means, sir."

"Hum, what do you mean? you are deranged!"

"I may be so, sir, but I will not do it."

"I will complain to a magistrate."

"As you please, sir; I never retract. The most I can do for you is to announce that the rope broke, and that you are now in perfect health. I have my principles, sir; it is said of me that I never deceive."

CHURCHMEN'S MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION FOR SEAMEN.—We commend most heartily the following "circular" to the regard of the churchmen of this city. When we consider the wants of this most interesting class, their fearful spiritual destitution, and the favor with which the services of the church are ever received among them, we must think our apathy and indifference positively criminal. "We speak that we do know," when we say that sailors have a decided preference for the order and solemnity of our worship, and yet amid all the charitable efforts of the churchmen of this city nothing, save one or two abortive attempts, have they done to provide a fitting sanctuary as a refuge for those who are most exposed, of all our fellow beings, to the dangers and evils which surround our mortal path. While New York hoists a church flag on either river, no sacred ensign is seen among those which float over our crowded wharves. We understand that a gentleman admirably qualified by long service in the Navy for this peculiar duty, and soon to be ordained, has consented to engage in this blessed work. Surely ready hands and willing hearts are not wanting among the churchmen of Philadelphia to ensure the successful prosecution of this noble christian charity.

An excellent article from a friend, on this subject, with a view of the floating chapel have been received since the above notice was prepared. As we desire interest in this matter to be kept up, we shall reserve them for another paper.

APPROBATION OF THE RIGHT REV. THE BISHOP OF THE DIOCESE.—Understanding that several gentlemen meditate the erection of a Floating Chapel to be used for the benefit of Seamen frequenting this Port, I take pleasure in expressing my cordial approbation of every effort calculated to promote the welfare of this interesting and much neglected class of men, and my sincere desire that the proposed undertaking may commend itself to the goodwill and patronage of Episcopals in this city.
Philadelphia, Dec. 4, 1847. ALONZO POTTER.

Having learned that the "Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen," of this port is about to construct a Floating Church, and that it has already a Missionary in prospect to labor in this field, the undersigned, fully aware of the great importance of this Mission, hereby express their cordial approbation of the undertaking, and heartily offer their fullest assistance in furthering the views of the Association. They believe that the cause will at once commend itself to the sympathies and support of churchmen and of the whole community.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHMANSHIP. We take pleasure in placing on record the following honest and manly avowal from a Presbyterian paper. It expresses exactly what should be our feelings and practice. Surely such a worthy and highminded course of Christian action will secure, even from "our enemies if such there are," more real favor and respect than that ambiguous and reserved policy which tries so hard to be "all things to all men," that it often becomes nothing to nobody!

DISTINCTIVE PRESBYTERIANISM.—As religious journalists, it has ever been, and we trust ever will be our aim, to maintain a distinctive and strict Presbyterianism; that being the aspect in which Christianity itself is viewed by us. We have no affinity for the liberalism which would merge all distinctions, and, under the plea of enlarged charity, wink at, if not profess respect for, error in all its diversified forms. Recognizing in all the right of private judgment, we claim the same for ourselves. Arraigning no one for his religious preferences, we hesitate not to express our own, and in all proper ways to set forth the reasons by which they are sustained. We have no wish to conceal the desire which animates us, that the precise views which we entertain in relation to every great feature of religion, should be extensively propagated. From an honest, and yet, we hope, a humble conviction, that we have received the truth as it is in Jesus, we disclaim all feeling of indifference as to its reception by others. Believing that Presbyterianism, in its great and distinguishing features, is the very system of truth taught in the word of God, we wish to see it pervading every part of the earth, and, by the force of its own verity, leading captive every heart. Still to achieve this we would resort to no improper measure. We would wield no civil power, if it were within our control, to make a single proselyte; we would be guilty of no intolerant feeling or act towards others; we would descend to no stratagem, intrude upon no one offensively, nor infringe upon any man's liberty, to win adherents. To aim steadily at what we conceive to be a right end, and in the employment of right means, has been our object; and if in so doing we subject ourselves to the charge of bigotry and narrow mindedness, it is a small matter.

In connection with the foregoing, as expressing the principles by which the conduct of this paper shall be governed, we copy the following from the "New York Observer."

RESPONSIBILITY OF PUBLISHERS.—Some men have strange ideas of the proprieties of a public journal. Our view of it is this—that men who make newspapers are responsible for what is printed in them, as a pastor for what is said in his pulpit. Suppose that an orthodox pastor attacks the sentiments of the Universalists or Mormon preacher who holds forth over the way. Must he surrender his pulpit to the errorist that he may reply? Certainly not.

If a man writes a book, and we review and condemn it, are we bound to print his reply to our review? And is he bound to print our review in his next edition? Certainly not.

If a public lecturer advances doctrines that we deem subversive of public morals or settled truth, and we denounce those doctrines, are we bound to lend him our columns to defend his notions? Certainly not.

Men make books to circulate their own opinions; they employ agents to sell the books, and thus they scatter their sentiments broadcast over the land. Will these men be required to go to the same labor and expense to distribute a reply to their books?

And he who makes a public journal, if he has any moral principle to guide him, will govern himself by the same rule that guides the right man in making a book. That is to say, he will defend the truth, and oppose error, leaving the enemy to sow his seed in his own field. If a man makes a bad book, and we condemn it, he may make a better one, or another to defend the first, or he may let it alone. He must not ask us to give him a column to defend what we think is wrong.

This is the rule by which all publishers are guided, if they have consciences. There are papers, made to sell, in which anything is printed that is paid for, or which will cause a few more copies of the paper to be distributed. These are the common receptacle of all opinions, however preposterous or injurious. They do the less harm, however, because no one regards an opinion in such a paper as worth more than a penny a line.

These are our views of justice and duty, and when a man has renounced his former views of truth, and desires us to lend him our columns to bolster up a miserable delusion, that does not merit the notice of a sensible man, he ought not to complain if we refer him for a hearing to those papers that will hail with pleasure anything that is hostile to sound doctrine, and calculated to unsettle the faith of the community.

ST. MARY'S HALL.—The following notice of the closing exercises of St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, was mislaid through the carelessness of the particular messenger to whom it was entrusted. We give it now on the principle that so good a thing is "better late than never," and consider the delay another among the many arguments against the use of Private Mails. Having been a witness, we can endorse the truth of every word. We may add that it is written by a gentleman of the highest standing in the city of New York.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

"I seldom trouble any of the journals of the day with my opinions, and never to circulate a 'puff.' Please, therefore, to be assured that the following observations are strictly true. On Wednesday last I attended the usual exercises at the close of the summer term, at 'St. Mary's Hall,' Greenbank, Burlington, New Jersey, of which the Right Rev. Bishop Doane, is Rector. The examinations, rehearsal and graduations took place there on that day. I have been in the habit for the last thirty years of visiting similar institutions, and in no instance have I been more gratified, than on the occasion above alluded to. The progress of the pupils in some ancient and many modern classics, and indeed in the whole circle of sciences submitted to their attention, was seen to be extensive and most satisfactory. The classes have contained during the last term, 130 young ladies. The evening was occupied in the reading of numerous well arranged compositions in English, French, Italian, Spanish and German, and in performances in vocal and instrumental music. All these exercises were received with approving enthusiasm by a very large audience of ladies and gentlemen. Then the pupils, teachers and audience withdrew to the 'Chapel of the Holy Innocents,' adjoining the Institution, where the interesting ceremonies of the graduation of the senior class took place.

It is most gratifying to notice the constant improvement in the forms of teaching and methods of acquiring, in our female seminaries of learning; and the professors, teachers and pupils of St. Mary's Hall deserve the thanks and encouragement of every patriot and citizen, for their able, faithful, and successful efforts to elevate the character of female education.

A VISITOR.

KING AND BAIRD, No. 9 George Street, are prepared to supply Prayer Books on the most reasonable terms. They have several editions. Among them is one of large clear type, suitable for persons whose eyesight is weak, and also suitably bound for the desk, at a very reasonable price.

They have likewise smaller books for Sunday Schools and general use. See their advertisement on the last page.

Persons at a distance who may wish to order them, may be assured that their directions will be promptly and faithfully observed. We commend Messrs. King & Baird to the patronage of our friends.

Their large printing establishment, is one at which work can always be done expeditiously, and in the best manner. They are prepared to do all kinds of printing with correctness and despatch.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.—The Church, the pillar and ground of the truth. A sermon preached at the consecration of the Rev. George Burgess, D. D. as Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Maine, on the twenty-second Sunday after Trinity, Oct. 31st, 1847, in Christ Church, Hartford, Connecticut, by J. P. K. Henshaw, D. D., Bishop of Rhode Island. Published by request.

This sermon, we need not say, is altogether worthy of its distinguished author, and suited to the important occasion which called it forth. We give our readers an opportunity of judging for themselves by a selection from it in another column.

For a notice of the Address to the Students of the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, at the annual Matriculation on Ember Tuesday, December, 1847, see the communication of "Ecclesia" on another page.

Other notices of several new works we are obliged to defer.

We ask the attention of our readers to the extract from the brief admirable and pointed charge of the Lord Bishop of Fredericton, for which we are indebted to "The Church."

We have received the whole charge in a New Brunswick paper, and have marked for insertion in the Banner, some judicious hints on the important subject of Architecture.

Also to the excellent article on Bishop Hughes among the Puritans, from "The Churchman."

Our correspondent "Dio" also refers to a matter connected with this important subject.

THE EPIPHANY.—This Holy Festival marks with the solemnity of its sacred services the present week. "The principal design (says Wheatley) of the church's celebrating this feast, is to show our gratitude to God in manifesting the gospel to the gentile world, and vouchsafing to them equal privileges with the Jews, who had been all along His peculiar people; the first instance of which Divine favor was in declaring the birth of Christ to the wise men of the east."

CHRISTMAS.—This day of sacred joy went cheerily off, at St. Mary's Hall, and Burlington College. At the College, it began at six. The Bishop accompanied by the Head Master and the Librarian, and by the Rev. Mr. Germain, and Dr. Ver Mehr, said the early prayers. The Music was admirable. The "The Gloria in Excelsis," the "Venite," and "Adeste Fideles," were chanted in Latin. The School Room, which is used as the Chapel, was most tastefully decorated; the design and execution entirely by the boys. Among the emblems, were a massive Cross, with the motto "Hoc Signo, Vince;" a triangle inscribed in a circle, with "Trinitas, Eternitas;" a star, with "A light to lighten the Gentiles;" and a Mitre, with "Nulla Ecclesia Sine Episcopo." "The Word was God," was inscribed on one side of the Cross; and "The Word was made flesh," on the other. Opposite these, "Unto us a Child is born," and "Unto us a Son is given." On the Organ, "Gloria in Excelsis." At seven, the Bishop said prayers in the Chapel of the Holy Innocents: which was also adorned with exquisite propriety and beauty. The two households were at the Morning Service and Communion, in St. Mary's church: and the remainder of the day was spent in social enjoyments: closed and crowned at both houses, with the Evening Prayer.

Since the Festival, the Teachers at the College have subscribed about fifteen hundred dollars, towards the erection of THE CHAPEL OF THE CHILD JESUS, for the religious uses of the College. Who will help on so good a work? Or, rather, who will not?—Missionary.

DR. HAMPDEN.—Our Church must deeply sympathize with the Church of England in all that concerns her weal or woe. That our readers may discover the reasons for the great apprehension and excitement stirred by the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the vacant see of Hereford, we subjoin a few extracts from his published writings collected from the last English papers. It will be seen from these that it is no false alarm which is sounded, as with one voice, throughout the whole of England.

The essential faith of a Christian, Dr. Hampden lays down to be the facts of Scripture. The facts of Scripture, as contradistinguished from some other and ulterior matter, are what constitute, in his view, that religious truth, the belief in which makes a man a genuine and legitimate Christian believer. We have, therefore, to find out what Dr. Hampden means by the facts of Scripture.

On this point no great difficulty meets us. There is sufficient explanation and context surrounding the term "fact," to show that "fact," in Dr. Hampden's use of it, means something much the same with what the term in its ordinary use conveys: that is to say, something which has taken place in the world, external, capable of being witnessed to, in the way in which facts of common history are.

"I venture to say that there are no propositions concerning God in Scripture, detached from some event of Divine Providence, to which they refer, and to which they are founded. When I say, therefore, that the Christian revelation is matter of fact, I intend by it to express my conviction that the substance of the revelation is the doings and actions of God. I have always before my mind some event in the history of God's providences, to which I refer it."—(Observations on Dissent, p. 14, 15. first edition.)

A belief in "facts of Scripture," then, constituting, according to Dr. Hampden's view, the essential faith of the Christian, the next step in his system is one which immediately follows from the first, viz., the exclusion of all other belief from being essential.

First, then, the Creeds of the Church are regarded in the general as documents full of simply human, and often erroneous notions and opinions. They are regarded as compounds, in which some primordial elements of Divine truth are mixed with a most disproportionate mass of purely unauthorised speculation. "The intellect of man has insinuated his own conclusions into the body of the revelation." And the Christian world is described as being full of a mistaken zeal for a number of doctrines, which it supposes to be Divine realities, but which are, in reality, only abstractions of the human mind.

"The signs have been converted into things. The combination and analysis of words, which the logical theology has produced, have given occasion to men to arm themselves in defence of the phantoms thus called into being. Not only have professed theologians, but private Christians, been imposed on by the spurious religion of terms in theology, and have betrayed often a fond zeal in defence of their idol-abstractions; not unlike that of the people of old, who are said to have beaten the air with spears to expel the foreign gods."—(Bampton Lectures, p. 55).

"It may further illustrate the character of a theology so constructed, to observe the analogy which it bears to the personification of the heathen mythology. The genius of Paganism seized the fancy with some image of loveliness, or mirth, or awe, expressing the tendency of the mind to realise its own abstractions, in the fabled beings of a many-peopled heaven. Scholasticism, in like manner, has its apotheosis of human ideas: only that an exact logic has worked the transmutation which poetry effected in the other."—(B. L. p. 87).

"In pursuing such an inquiry, we are naturally led to consider the principle on which Christian doctrine takes its rise, that is, whether there is foundation for the common prejudice, which identifies systems of doctrine, or theological propositions methodically deduced and stated, with Christianity itself—with the simple religion of Jesus Christ, as received into the heart and influencing the conduct."—(Observ. p. 3).

With this view of Creeds it is not surprising that the writer does not contemplate them as fixed—

"Wherever speculative truth is involved, there must be presupposed an opening for improvement, whereas articles of religious communion, from their reference to the fixed objects of our faith, assume an immoveable character, fatally adverse to all theological improvement. Were it not for the intrinsic sublimity of the subject, the case of the adherence of men to such unvarying formularies would forcibly strike the minds of men, as no less incongruous and injurious to religion, than in medicine, would be the case of a society of physicians who should make the maxims of Hippocrates or Galen the unalterable basis of their profession."—(Observ. p. 22.)

Thus much for Creeds in general. We come to the specific doctrines contained in these Creeds, and the language is still more startling. It is strikingly that of a critic who is judging some production of the simply human intellect. We have heard all along of a certain scholastic, theoretic, speculative dialectical spirit. Here are the particular cases in which it is instanced, specimens of the doctrines which it deduced, and of which it is the rationale—

"The dialectical spirit laboured to establish the Divine unity amidst the Trinitarian distinctions."—(B. L. p. 128). "The whole discussion was fundamentally dialectical."—(p. 104).

"It was attempted to be explained in what way the Son might be said to be generated of the Father, whether out of the substance of God . . . whether he is the son of God by nature . . . or will . . . or adoption. The confusion of principles, of different sciences, in these promiscuous inquiries, is sufficiently apparent. But it was by such philosophy that the orthodox language was settled, declaring the Son 'begotten before all worlds,' and of one substance with the Father."—(B. L., 137).

"They too (the orthodox) delighted to speak of the whole Trinity as consubstantial."—(B. L., p. 126.)

ject, the difficulties of which are no doubt felt by themselves. In a church is to be built, an architect is seldom to be found, almost every one is ignorant of the best form, dimensions, arrangement of the fabric. The difficulties are generally caused by a want of means. There is no deficiency in materials. New Brunswick abounds with excellent granite, sand, and free stone, and of course wood is always to be had in abundance. I should strongly urge on the Clergy the desirableness of building low walls of rubble stone, wherever stone is scarce, and a mason can be procured. In spite of the apparent cheapness of wood, it requires continual paint, it is liable to rot, and it will only last a limited time. If the expense of stone windows be too great, as may frequently be the case, wooden windows, sanded over, might be inserted as a makeshift, they could be taken out when decaying, and could be replaced, when means are found, with stones. Then the expense of rebuilding would be saved. Some little decoration in the shape of the window, could then be provided at a small additional outlay. The walls need not be more than 18, 16 or 14 feet high above the ground. The roof should, in this climate especially, be steep, not less, at all points not much less than equilateral in pitch, which will look well, wear better, and will prevent any lodgment and ponding of snow. As little plaster as possible in the roof should be allowed, for plaster is the worst, and wood one of the best conductors of sound.

The early Decorated or Middle-Pointed is the best style for building, as being one of the simplest, the most chaste and the most of all the styles. In stone buildings, the usual proportions of ancient churches are, in churches without aisles, that the Nave and Chancel together are in length three times at least the width of the Nave. When there are two side aisles the length of the Nave is usually $1\frac{1}{2}$ times the whole width of the Nave and aisles, and the length of the whole church is 3 times its width. The aisles are generally 5 times as long as they are wide. The height of churches varies, but they are at least as high as they are wide: when very small, the height is often twice the width. If the tower stand at the west end of the Nave, which is not necessary where there are no aisles, it should be as wide as the Nave, or it may stand at the end of an aisle. Cross churches are very pleasing in effect when small, and the arms nearly equal, but cannot be recommended as large churches. The Cathedral is the only exception, which is, with very few exceptions, cruciform. The windows usually made in this country are at least twice, often three times larger than is necessary, making the church hotter in summer by excess of light, and colder in winter, not only by draughts, but by cold from the glass. Few side lights need be more than 18 inches or two feet, nor, if the window be double, more than a mullion between, need it contain more than three or four panes of glass. If the Nave be of proper proportion a tie beam as low as the eaves is not always required, and the timbers though rough, should still be seen. The usual proportion (40 to 28) is therefore nearly the worst that could be devised, especially when filled with broad flaring vulgar windows. The roof is generally flat, and loaded with snow. It may be observed that the proportions of the ancient Parish Church, were in the main, those of the first Temple, divinely given, viz., 90 feet in length by 30 in width, and 45 in height.* May we not suppose that it would be at least as wise to copy such a pattern as to copy the pattern of 1786?

RELIGIOUS PRACTICE OF THE MARINERS OF THE HEBRIDES.—The following simple, but pious exercise, is taken from an old Liturgy, compiled in the year 1566, and prevailed with the Sailors on the Western Islands of Scotland, when they commenced their voyages.

Method of blessing the Ship when they put out to Sea.

Steuersman. Let us bless our ship!
Crew. God the Father bless her!
Steuers. Let us bless our ship!
Crew. Jesus Christ bless her!
Steuers. Let us bless our ship!
Crew. The Holy Ghost bless her!
Steuers. What do you fear, since God the Father is with you?
Crew. We do not fear any thing.
Steuers. What do you fear, since God the Son is with you?
Crew. We do not fear any thing.
Steuers. What are you afraid of, since God the Holy Ghost is with you?
Crew. We do not fear any thing.
Steuers. God the Father Almighty, for the love of Jesus Christ his Son, by the comfort of the Holy Ghost, the one God, who miraculously brought the children of Israel through the Red Sea, and brought Jonah to land out of the belly of the whale, and the Apostle St. Paul and his ship to safety from the doubled raging sea, and from the violence of a tempestuous storm; deliver, sanctify, bless, and conduct us peaceably, safely, comfortably, through the sea, to our harbor, according to his divine will; which we beg, saying, Our Father, &c.— Gospel Messenger.

Highland Piety.

One striking characteristic of the piety of the highlander is his love to Christ. His love and reverence for God the Father are indeed deep and fervent; but his love and devotedness to God the Son are deeper and more fervent still, and are not unfrequently exhibited in a desire to die, simply that the soul may enjoy his beatific presence. Of this, the following anecdote is a striking example:

A gentleman of piety and accomplishment was once traveling in the neighbourhood of one of the finest of our highland lakes. Being on foot, and fatigued with his journey, he asked a female cottager to favour him with a draught of water. She readily complied; and, feeling thankful and refreshed, he entered into conversation with her.

"You live in a beautiful country," said he.
 "Yes," replied the woman; "and yet I often wish to leave it."

"And why?" inquired the traveller.
 "Because I desire a better country, that is an heavenly." This was said with such a placid smile, that the gentleman's interest in the speaker was singularly increased. She was still young, and did not appear unhappy; but, nevertheless, he thought that there must be some secret sorrow.

"Surely," said he, "you must have met with some severe affliction thus to wean you from the world."

"No," replied she; "I have never known what affliction is. That is my husband in the next field: those are my children before you; and all my wants are supplied."

"Then why do you wish so much to depart?" inquired the gentleman, still more astonished.

"Because," said she, "I feel so much love to him who died for me, and rose again, that I seem as if I could not be entirely happy until I see him face to face."

The same pure and unsophisticated love to the Redeemer is also exemplified in the incident we are about to describe.

An aged highland couple were very recently engaged in conversation respecting the heavenly state, to which both looked forward with humble faith and hope. In the midst of their discourse the question arose whether they would know one another in heaven? To the decision of this point they felt that they had nothing very determinate to guide them; but at length the old man, looking affectionately at his wife, observed—

"I trust it will be so; for I think that, if I did not see you there, I would feel as if I experienced a want, even in heaven."

"Well," replied the old woman, "I will tell you my thought about the matter. I think that I will be so much engaged in admiring Him, whose blood saved me, and whose grace brought me there, that for the first thousand years I will not be able to look at anything else."—Church of England Magazine.

"Churchmen's Missionary Association for Seamen."

Churchmen and Christians, are earnestly requested to consider the subject to which the above title invites attention. It is to many a new, and may for that reason prove an interesting theme. It is the cry of the poor wanderers who, straying far from country, friends, and home, go forth to brave the terrors of the sea, dealing with danger and death, amidst scenes, which even fancy and romance are unable to depict in all their stern and sad reality. When the many and high claims of this useful class of men are duly estimated, and attention directed to their hitherto absolute neglect by the Church of this Diocese, surely the expectation cannot be disappointed that this appeal will meet a ready response in the hearts of all who are disposed to do good for Christ's sake, and to aid in having the Gospel preached unto every creature.

The physical wants and sufferings of seamen, are alone sufficient to excite universal sympathy in their behalf; the dangers they encounter to supply the comforts and luxuries of their more favored brethren of the land, should of themselves, endear them unto us; but great as all these are, they bear no comparison to their spiritual necessities. It is alas! too truly said that,

"Men who trace the dangerous waves, Forget the Mighty God, who saves."

But in fact they scarcely have heard of God, and know Him only through "His wonders on the deep." May not their sins be shared by those who, enjoying the privileges of the sanctuary and its means of grace, yet do nothing towards extending these blessings to others? The importance of seamen, as Missionaries, and heralds of the Gospel, is too little known, and appreciated. Ignorance of this fact may explain, but cannot excuse the indifference manifested by the Church, in converting them to the faith. They are borne on the wings of our vast and rapidly extending commerce, to the "utmost parts of the sea," and the remotest corners of the earth, and are oft the sole representatives of those regions, over which the "Sun of Righteousness," hath shed his rays. If, as is generally the case, they be depraved and vicious, what will the Heathen say, when invited to turn from their wickedness to serve the living God? They will point you to the specimens you have sent them from Christian lands, and silence you with the proverb, "Physician heal thyself." Such is the experience of all who have gone to preach unto the Gentiles. To send one set of men to teach by precept the purity and holiness of Christianity, and another to illustrate the doctrine by vices which shock even the savage, is but to build up and pull down, at one and the same time. While on the other hand every Christian man, who visits a foreign Missionary's scene of labor, is hailed as a messenger specially sent to aid and advance the cause of religion by his presence and example.

He who gave the command to make disciples of all nations hath set his seal to this work by remarkable demonstrations. During a few past years, a great change has come over seafaring men. Both in the naval and mercantile services, many have been taught of God. The Holy Spirit is even now "moving upon the face of the waters," and the bold hearts of those who occupy their business thereon are feeling His enlivening influences. Many are seeking the "Ark of Salvation." Churchmen especially should give heed to these "signs of the times." It is a pleasing and well known fact, that seamen evince a decided preference for the liturgy, discipline, and worship of the Church. In the Navy our "Prayer Book," is used almost if not quite universally, by those Chaplains who are not appointed from among ourselves, and a form of prayer is found to be indispensable. Even a gown is generally worn to satisfy what are termed the prejudices of seamen. In short, every inducement presses upon the Church to send forth laborers to this portion of the field, so "white for the harvest," and wherein the reapers are so few. You are invited to co-operate in this noble, useful and encouraging work. "Cast your bread upon the waters," for it will feed many hungry souls. "If you see your brother have need, and shut up your compassion against him, how dwelleth the love of Christ in you?" "There is sorrow on the sea." You can materially assist in diminishing it. Shall this opportunity be lost of adding unto the Lord, the many who may thereby be saved? Each gale that sweeps along our coast, during this season of suffering, hurries many a poor seaman to his final account, and how few have prepared for the event? The drowning mariner calls on you to rescue him. "Oh! consider well, the voice of his complaint." As you have opportunity do good to all men, but especially unto those who have done so much for you, and who desire to become members, with yourselves, of the "household of faith."

Scientific Expedition to the Red Sea.

MR. EDITOR:—

I do not remember to have yet seen in the Banner any notice of an expedition which has recently been undertaken by our Government for the exploration and survey of the Dead Sea, whose deep dark waters have so long remained a mystery to the world. It is an enterprise which reflects great credit upon those by whom it is directed, and its results will be looked for with no little interest. The United States Store ship Supply, which has just sailed for the Mediterranean with Stores, is to be employed under Lieutenant Lynch, as her commander; with Lieutenant Dale, who will be more specially charged with the scientific reconnoissances. "It is singular," says the New York Courier, "that a government of the new world should be the first to explore, and verify the facts, concerning a region so intimately connected with the common faith of Christendom and the witness of one of the most awful penalties of transgression under the Patriarchal Dispensation: and we cannot but hope from this expedition what will gratify natural and intelligent curiosity, while confirming the original record of the Bible."

The following interesting communication from Lieutenant Lynch appeared in the New York Herald a few weeks ago, and its republication will no doubt gratify many of your readers.

Yours, very truly,
Rev. J. Coleman D.D.

To the Editor of the Herald:—

In reference to the proposed survey of the Dead Sea, several of the newspapers have asked, "cui bono?"

As the first public intimation was given, without my knowledge, through your columns, I ask permission to avail myself of the same medium to answer, briefly, to the point of abruptness, questions at once so natural and so reasonable.

Although most reluctant to parade my insignificant name in print, I take this step without an instant's hesitation, in justice to the enlightened statesman whose mind in an instant grasped the importance of the questions at issue and foresaw the credit to be acquired by his country in their solution.

For upwards of four thousand years, the Dead Sea has laid in its deep and wondrous chasm, a withering record of the visitation of God's wrath upon his sinful creatures. Itself once a fertile vale, teeming with population and redundant with the products of a favored clime, it now lies inert and sluggish, a mass of dark and bitter waters, with no living thing upon its shore, or above, or beneath its surface. Receiving at one extreme, the mighty volume of a swift and unfailing river, and the numerous torrents that plunge into it through the clefts in its sides, it slowly rises and falls in its own solitary bed, with no visible outlet for its tributary waters. Its lofty and fretted sides riven by earthquakes;—here blanched by the rain, there blackened by the tempest, rise perpendicularly fifteen hundred feet on one side, and two thousand feet on the other; while from the summit the awe struck spectator beholds floating upon its surface huge masses of bitumen, thrown up from its mysterious vortex. Mount Lebanon is 9000 feet above the Mediterranean, and 10,300 above the Dead Sea, which is little more than one hundred miles distant from it. The "Corral" in the Island of Madeira is wonderful, for it is the bed of a crater nearly level with the ocean; but here is a sea, forty miles distant from another sea, and upwards of thirteen hundred feet below it. The unhappy Costigan, the only man who has undertaken to circumnavigate this sea, and who perished in the attempt, could, in one place, find no bottom, and it was indicated by incessant bubbles and an agitated surface. Whether or not this be the crater of a submerged volcano, forming a subterranean aqueduct with the ocean, who can tell? This unfathomable spot, whether or not through an extinct volcano, in connexion with the depression of surface and the height of a contiguous mountain, forms the most extraordinary fissure in the known world.

One great object of investigation will be to ascertain whether this sea and its shores are of volcanic or non-volcanic origin, and to refute the position of infidel philosophers with regard to its formation. The elucidation of this subject is a desideratum to science, and would be most gratifying to the whole Christian world. It is a mystery which has remained impenetrable since the awful moment when the waters of that wondrous sea first rose above the smouldering ruins of the vale of Siddim. The configuration of one-half of its shores, and its very extent, are unknown. Its waters, of a petrifying quality, and limpid as a mountain stream, doubtless hold within their bosom, and holding, will reveal those ruins, upon the non-existence of which the unbeliever states his incredulity.

Strabo, Diodorus, Pliny and Josephus among the ancients—and Maundrell, Pococke, Abbe Martine, Chateaubriand, La Martine, Stephens and Robinson, among the moderns, all differ as to the extent, and many of the peculiarities of this sea. Considerable streams are said to empty into it, the very names of which are unknown. Some have heard the gambolings of fish upon its surface, while others deny that any animate thing whatever can exist within its dense and bitter waters.—Fruits, luscious to the eye, but of nauseous taste, and crumbling in the grasp, are said to be found upon its shores. Many travelers deny the existence of vegetation, and Chateaubriand asserts that he found branches of the tamarind tree strewn upon the beach. Its southern coast is said to consist of masses of solid salt; while, as far as the eye can reach from its northern extreme, it beholds only the washed and barren hills of Judea on one side, and those of Arabia Petrea on the other. All is vague, uncertain and mysterious.

Are the questions answered? Or, shall a small pecuniary consideration withhold a country such as this, from such an undertaking?

I admit that it is not a summer's excursion, and that British officers are said to have twice failed in a like attempt. Should that circumstance deter us? I venture to say, that within the broad periphery of this land, which, cradled between oceans, stretches from the frigid zone to the tropics, there is not one native born or true hearted adopted citizen who will answer in the affirmative. We owe something to the scientific and the Christian world, and while extending the blessings of civil liberty in the south and west, may well afford to foster science and strengthen the bulwarks of Christianity in the east.

Church Almanac for 1848.

This periodical has just come under our eye; and in glancing over the list of Clergy, we notice several serious mistakes. We shall leave it, however, to each diocese to speak for itself.

There occurs the following strange error among the clergy of North Carolina.

"Buxton, Jarvis B. r. Rutherfordton, N. C." Now the Rev. Jarvis B. Buxton, is still, as for the last 17 years, the rector of St. John's church, Fayetteville, N. C. But his son the Rev. Jarvis Buxton, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, ordained last August, is the minister of the Parish at Rutherfordton, N. C., where he resides and at Ashville, Buncombe Co., N. C. Too much pains cannot be bestowed on the list of the Clergy of the Church.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF CHRISTIANITY IN PENNSYLVANIA.—This admirable Diocesan Institution held its thirty-sixth anniversary on the evening of the Epiphany.

After service, in which the Rev. Drs. Ducachet and Clay officiated, the annual report of the Board of Trustees was read by the Rev. Dr. Clay its author, and the annual sermon preached by the Rev. M. A. De W. Howe, Rector of St. Luke's Church. The report was listened to, with great attention, and was certainly one of the most excellent documents of the kind we have ever heard. The sermon was a forcible and earnest application of the text (St. Luke xxi. 1, 2,) to the case in hand. Its argument, to prove the obligation resting upon all classes of christians to contribute liberally and heartily towards extending the privileges and blessings of the Gospel, was a strong and convincing one. The fact was fully made out that great liberality was shown by the Jews in providing for the spiritual wants of their needy brethren, and that this liberality was exercised by all degrees among them. The text proved that the extremes of wealth and poverty met at "the treasury" of God. The question then was whether christians could be less liberal than Jews! The conclusion of this excellent discourse contained a most powerful exhibition of the claims of this society upon the sympathies of our Diocese, and appealed, in an eloquent and touching manner, to those whose hearts might be moved by the noble impulses of Christian charity.

The collection, we fear, proved that there were more widow's mites, than rich gifts, cast into the Treasury of this society on the night of our blessed Lord's Epiphany.

After service the Society met and the following officers were elected.

" Frederick Ogilby,	" N. Sayre Harris.

We feel it a solemn duty to add a few plain words, as to the duty which the Churchmen of this Diocese, one and all, owe to this society.

In the first place it is a DIOCESAN INSTITUTION, or rather it has been made by the Convention part and parcel of the Diocese itself. The conventions of 1812 and 1829, committed to the care of this society the sacred trust of its missionary operations. And it has fulfilled that trust without favor or partiality. On this head the report of this year (from which we are permitted to make these extracts) uses this emphatic language. "Ever mindful of the trust reposed in them, and solicitous only to acquit themselves with fidelity of their trust they (i. e. the Board) have sent forth laborers into the vineyard of the Lord, and sustained them when there as members of the one Catholic and Apostolic Church, without any reference whatever to their private construction of her teachings. In thus acting, and that they have uniformly done so, the catalogue of their missionaries, past and present, will abundantly demonstrate, they have the approval of their own consciences, and feel moreover that they deserve the approbation of their constituents, and of the Diocese."

In the second place, the church in this Diocese owes under God, its growth and extension to the fostering care of this Diocesan Institution. In proof of this we again appeal to Dr. Clay's admirable report. "When our society had been in existence but eleven years, or so long ago as 1823, the present able and excellent Bishop of Western New York, and who was then one of the most active and efficient of the Trustees of this society, in an address which he delivered on an occasion such as has now called us together, used the following language in reference to the results, at that early day, of the missionary operations of the society. 'I would ask, he says, those of you who have been led by business or pleasure to the distant sections of the Diocese, if you have met with no vestiges of the usefulness of this society in the progress of your travels. I would ask if the Diocese presents the same extent of melancholy blank, which it did when the society commenced its operations? I know before hand what will be your answer. You will tell me of churches built, of congregations gathered, of ministers settled, of people improved, of sanctuaries filled, of the gospel preached, and of thousands walking in the ways of God, in places where but a few years since you had witnessed the unchecked operations of ungodliness, where you had seen the tavern as the only sanctuary frequented by the people, profanity its worship, and riot, intemperance and gambling its unhallowed ceremonies.' And if our society had accomplished so much when eleven years only had elapsed since its organization; how much greater and more numerous benefits might we speak of now that thirty-six years have passed away in the constant endeavor to extend the blessings of our holy religion, and with a missionary force in the field, for many of those years, of from twenty to thirty active laborers." From the report we learn that twenty-nine churches, most of them now flourishing Parishes, either partially or wholly owe their existence to this society. "While many others are now growing into strength" with aid thus obtained, and may more owe their existence to the indirect influence of its operations.

Many young men have been supported in their preparation for the ministry by the education department.

Large numbers of the Holy Scriptures have been distributed with the help of the funds placed at the disposal of the "Bible Committee." While Prayer Books, Standard works for Parish Libraries, and excellent Tracts, which do not deny the doctrines of the church, have been distributed with the generous and efficient co-operation of those noble and praiseworthy institutions, the Bishop White and the Female Prayer Book societies, and "the Bishop White Parish Library association."

Is it not clear from this statement, that as the best interests of the church in Pennsylvania are concerned in the welfare of this society, so it is the manifest duty of this Diocese to sustain it. Whatever is done for it, is done for the Diocese at large, and whatever is done against it is done against the Church of God in Pennsylvania.

Will it not pain the members of our communion, will it not stir their zeal and draw forth their contributions, when they read these words of the 36th annual report? "If there is anything to discourage your Trustees, it is, that they find at the close of the present year an exhausted treasury; with the prospect before them instead of enlarging their operations of being obliged considerably to curtail them." "The reduction which may now be necessary is a measure which they cannot adopt, but with great reluctance, for it will fall heavily on those whose scanty resources can afford no diminution. A more general and liberal support to our society would render it unnecessary; but in the actual and probable condition of things there seems unhappily, to be no alternative."

Last year, the Board placed $3,500 at the disposal of the Missionary Committee, this year the Board are enabled only to give to this purpose, $2,250! Churchmen of Pennsylvania, think how many Missionaries must be deprived of needful support, how many brethren must be cut off from the means of grace by this sad reduction.

THE LATE EDITOR OF THE BANNER.—We cordially thank the authors of the two following notices. Kind and courteous expressions of just feeling, like these, are honorable to those who make them, and are, we know, appreciated by him in whose behalf they are deservedly made. We have seen many private letters which express even more strongly similar opinions as to the manner in which this paper has been conducted, assuring it's late Editor that the "rare qualities" which have won for him so large a share of respect and esteem, in private life, have not been lost upon all who have witnessed their more public development in the columns of the Banner. We append the expressions of those who can speak with less restraint than we can. W. James, Newbold

We are sorry to learn, from the last number of the Banner, that its late amiable editor has resigned his chair to another. We shall part with him with sincere regret, for though we have not the pleasure of personal acquaintance, we have frequently enjoyed his editorial courtesies. We have no doubt that he has secured an able successor, but the "clerical gentlemen" who is hereafter to be editor, will be possessed of rare qualities, indeed, if he succeeds in sustaining the character for mildness and sincerity which the Banner has won for itself.—Church Times.

THE BANNER OF THE CROSS will hereafter be edited by a Presbyterian whose name is not yet announced. We cordially reciprocate the good feeling of the gentleman who has conducted this valuable church journal, for a few years past with great intelligence and sound judgment, and in a spirit worthy of all praise. He has won our respect, and if at any time we have failed in these columns to do justice to his motives, we trust our error has been rather one of the head than of the heart. Protestant Churchman.

THE SYMPATHIZERS OF OUR DAY.—We have always known that human sympathy is often eccentric in its developments. But this previous knowledge had little prepared us for the exhibitions of our day, which has witnessed the marvelous sight of Protestant Republicans gathering, in solemn assemblies, within walls which have resounded with the voice of a Cox and a Cheever, to express sympathy and offer the adulation of Protestant Republican incense to a Papal Despot!—For with all the liberality which Pius IX. has shown, he has not evidenced yet his intention to lay aside the triple crown, or to give up the keys of his spiritual kingdom.

Our city has just been the scene of another exhibition of this kind. We are aware that these meetings are in part occasioned by political motives, and in some degree the outbreaks of Fashion. The new Pope is now the Fashion, the leading topic of our day. But with all these more trivial causes, there is also grave matter for the thoughtful mind in these developments, and serious questions must arise as to whether these things may tend. It is a matter which, in our judgment, especially demands faithfulness on the part of those who conduct our Religious Journals. The meeting "called at the Chinese Saloon" in this city, we are told "was a magnificent demonstration. It was largely attended by all denominations."—And the principal speaker tells us that "three times already has Italy achieved the elements of conquest which have made it great in power and influence." Of these the time which most concerns us is "the second when went forth the mild sway of Ecclesiastical power and extended through every nation bearing with it the mission of love and peace!" And addressing him who is under most solemn obligations to re-establish as far as possible, "this mild sway of ECCLESIASTICAL POWER," "through every nation," the orator indulges in the following apostrophes. "Great and od philanthropist! Noble patriot! Glorious Reformer! (a political Luther we suppose.) I as one not recognizing your worth am ever willing to acknowledge your virtues. Press on!" &c. Now if the Roman Pontiff might be regarded purely as a temporal sovereign we would not be disposed to offer a word of objection to his political canonization, though it might be wise to wait for further developments of his democratic intentions. But how is it possible to separate in his case the prince from the Prelate? And does not our glorification of one vice magnify the other when the two are essentially and inseparably united? In fact we consider that the spiritual powers of Rome have been more advanced in our day by political movements than by ecclesiastical. And those who excite sympathy for this political Reformer may most aid in extending a "mild sway of ecclesiastical power," and thus help to enslave the world once more in the chains of Spiritual Despotism!

That the present Pontiff has no idea of abating "one jot or tittle" of the preposterous claims of the Papacy, we have his own express declaration in his speech to "the Consulta." These are his own words, and they furnish grave matter for the consideration of "sympathizers."

"It was for the public good that since my elevation to the Pontifical throne I have, in accordance with the councils inspired by God, accomplished all that I could; and I am still ready, with the assistance of God, to do all for the future, without, however, retrenching in any degree the sovereignty of the Pontificate; and, inasmuch as I received it full and entire, from my predecessors, so shall I transmit this sacred deposit to my successors."

This view is further confirmed by the following extract from "The Tablet," a leading Journal of the Church of Rome.

"How widely has the idea spread that Pope Pius IX. was in every sense of the word, a liberal Pope; that his political acts, spread by infidels and revolutionists, afforded an index of his ecclesiastical dispositions; that his concessions to the spirit of the time fixed a deep gulf between him and the old Gregories and Innocents of the Popedom; that a new spirit was being breathed into the Catholic religion by the secular influences of the time. * * * * *

"How widely have these most delusive hopes spread! How fondly they have been nursed and cherished! In every country, amongst weak, or wicked, or ignorant men, this thought has made its way,—that in a liberal Pope was to be found a traitor to his own church, an apostle of some mad scheme of universal fusion, a destroyer of the antiquated dogmas of Christianity. In some quarters, it was seriously hoped that mysteries would soon be dropped out of the Papal religion, if once an ecclesiastical of 'good sense' came to be seated in St. Peter's Chair."

We are of those who think that mere declamation has done more to advance, than to retard the progress of the Roman Church.

We would therefore simply ask whether it becomes the members of the Church, for whose true faith Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer were burned at the stake, to glorify a Pope because he has shown some tendencies to make the government of his state more liberal, while he boldly professes himself, the firm, and unflinching supporter of the absurd claim, of that spiritual tyranny which seeks to extend "the mild sway of ecclesiastical power through every nation."

The "mild sway" has already added to the troubles of unhappy Ireland by the Papal proscription of its national schools and colleges. Our turn may come next, and as an illustration of the manner in which this "mild sway" sometimes operates we give the following grave facts, of whose truth we have evidence from private letters, as well as from the public journals, and which are further confirmed by those who attempt to deny them. Such facts as these have more convincing eloquence than all the oratory heard in Exeter Halls or Tabernacles. The Inquisition is not needed, when sentence of death may be pronounced from the chapel altar!

PRIESTLY DENUNCIATIONS.—Assassinations still continue in Ireland. Mr. William Hassard, Treasurer of the County of Wexford, has died from wounds received on Saturday evening. Mr. Bayley (another landlord) is scarcely expected to recover. In many of the recent cases of murder, the victims had been previously denounced at the altar by the Roman Catholic Priests.

The state of Ireland was the principal topic of the speeches which followed, (i. e. in the House of Commons.) In the course of his speech, Sir B. Hall alluded to the following public speech of a Roman Catholic Archdeacon:— * * * * *

The hon. member, in referring to the recent atrocious murders in Ireland, observed—one man who was denounced was not the same day; another was denounced from the altar one day, and was shot the following evening. These were not imaginary cases; he wished to God they were. What was the evidence of a priest in the county of Tipperary, in a case where a man named Callaghan had been murdered? The following was the examination:—

"Did you denounce the murdered man from the altar?—did."

"When did you denounce him?—On Sunday at mass."

"When was he murdered?—At five o'clock the same evening."

But was it because a man was a bad landlord, because he was unkind and inconsiderate to his tenants, that he was to be murdered? Not at all. Was Major Mahon a man of such a class? He (Sir B. Hall) believed that unfortunate gentleman was a most excellent man, but what were the facts attending his murder? He was denounced by the priest on Sunday, and on the Monday, while returning from his charitable office in Roscommon, he was shot dead in his carriage.—English Churchman.

The Spectator gives the following particulars of Major Mahon:—

"Major Mahon was one of those few landlords in Ireland who possessed both the will and the means to fulfil advice frequently thrown out in England, that his class should strive to raise the character of agriculture on their estates, and thus elevate the condition of their resident tenants; at the same time providing for those who might be removed in the process. Major Mahon did this; he removed many tenants, but he set apart a large sum yearly—3,500*l.*, we believe—to aid them in emigrating."

In a chapel of the district this beneficent landlord was denounced as an 'exterminator,' with many harsh expressions; and the priest wound up his denunciation in these words—'He is worse than Cromwell: and yet he lives!' Coming out of that chapel, that Sunday, one of the congregation said to another—'If he lives a month after this he is immortal!' He was shot on the Monday."

A poor man named Callagan, in Tipperary, was denounced from the altar on Sunday, and murdered on Monday.—Guardian.

MORE PRIESTLY DENUNCIATIONS FROM THE ALTAR.—Having heard it rumoured last week that that most exemplary and venerated Clergyman the Rev. Alexander Ross, Rector of Banagher, in this Diocese, had been denounced from the altar by some of the Roman Catholic Clergy, we addressed a brief enquiry to the Rev. Gentleman on the subject, on Wednesday last, and we now subjoin his reply, from which it appears that the report was but too well founded. It afforded us, however, the utmost gratification to learn, that so far from the calumnious attack on Mr. Ross meeting with sympathy or encouragement from his Roman Catholic parishioners, they have taken the most dignified method of testifying their respect for him and rebuking his assailant.

This last extract is from the "Londonderry Sentinel," and concerns a Clergyman to whose Parish a portion of the relief Fund from Pennsylvania was sent, and whose interesting letters in reply were published in the Banner. We are in possession of private letters from him verifying these accounts, which otherwise we might have doubted. His crime is the zeal he manifests for the education of the Poor within his Parish, and mingling with these instructions the sacred teachings of the Bible!

We subjoin the following vindication in reply to the above serious charges (the italics are our own) from "the Catholic Herald." Our readers will observe that they do not make a very strong case for their friends.

"But another charge is made, with the intention of raising a hue and cry against the Catholic clergy. They say, (they,) the landlords, whigs, Tories and bigots, that the Priests denounce from the altar those who were the victims in these murders. Although this charge is made in parliament, yet, strange to say, no persecution has been commenced against any of those clergymen—only one Priest's name is mentioned, and those whom he denounced have not been injured—only one instance, Mr. Baily, of a person assassinated, is brought forward as having been thus denounced. They charge that as a crime on the Priests, and the sectarian papers here are taking it up, because they do not allow their people to be ground to the very dust, to be pillaged and starved, without raising their voice. Post hoc ergo, propter hoc, is their argument. Some of these landlords would not contribute a farthing to relieve the people, but punished with the utmost rigor those who attempted to satisfy the cravings of hunger by taking turnips from their fields and eating the food these gentlemen had ordered for their dogs. Yes, the priests are 'surprised ruffians,' because they will not be silent.—Of this, however, we feel assured, that no Catholic clergyman would or does act with the motive ascribed to them, and that, if they supposed that murder would follow their denunciations, they would rather suffer all things than commit crime by directing vengeance against any individual."

REV. SAMUEL MOORHOUSE.—This highly esteemed Clergyman, who has ministered in this city since his ordination, has removed to Rossville, Staten Island, where he has become Rector of St. Luke's Church. We take pleasure in expressing what we know to be the feeling of many of his brother clergymen here, the sincere regret with which we part with one, who was ever ready to assist with friendly offices his fellow laborers in the ministry, and whose faithful and consistent course won for him the sincere regard of all his associates. Many hearts will join in the wish that his new situation may prove a happy one, and that the Great Head of the church will bless him in the ministry and stewardship committed to his charge.

Intelligence by the last Steamer.

The leading, almost the sole, topic discussed in the Church Papers from England, is the new appointment to the See of Hereford. We give the following extract from the editorial of the last English Churchman, Dec. 16th.

"Our readers will all know that our announcement of last week has received the fullest authentication: the letter signed by the thirteen Bishops, whose names we were the first to publish, on the appointment of Dr. Hampden, has since been printed in the Times—canvassed in the House of Commons—and conveyed by the press to every parish in England. The substance, or rather the chief point, of the letter we have also laid before our readers; but, of course, we print the original document, and the weighty correspondence with which it is connected. Nor could more important contributions to the history of the Church of our own days be found than is presented by this remarkable series. On the one hand we have the collective voice of the Church of England, expressed by thirteen, or rather fifteen—for it is known that the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Ripon have each separately conveyed the like intimations to the Premier—of the chief rulers of the Church, Bishops of all shades of opinion, the activity of one mind, the venerable gravity of another, the genius of a third, the practical energy of a fourth, the theological judgment of two Prelates who themselves formerly dignified the office of King's Professor in the sister University; here the sacerdotal, there the pastoral, or the doctoral character, all these elements, respectable and dignified, when taken singly, of unparalleled force and power in combination, have been united. They have expressed a fact,—and upon this fact, one which, in all its depth and fulness, could be known to themselves alone—they have built a very solid matter for consideration. The fact, to the existence of which the Bishops, by merely expressing and testifying to it, give the strongest evidence of importance, is that the whole mind of the Church of England is revolted at a rumoured appointment; the inference is, their grave apprehension that this appointment, if persisted in by the secular power, will tend to shake the Church's confidence in an arrangement respecting appointments to Episcopal Sees, which is coeval with the British constitution. In other words, the fifteen Bishops say that an act of the present Premier is something which may tend to—we do not say will immediately end in—the separation, as it is not very accurately phrased, of Church and State."

To this we append the following correspondence between thirteen of the Bishops and the Premier.

Dr. Hampden.

The following correspondence has been published:—

"My Lord,—We, the undersigned Bishops of the Church of England, feel it our duty to represent to your Lordship, as head of Her Majesty's Government, the apprehension and alarm which have been excited in the minds of the Clergy by the rumoured nomination to the See of Hereford of Dr. Hampden, in the soundness of whose doctrine the University of Oxford has affirmed, by a solemn decree, its want of confidence."

"We are persuaded that your Lordship does not know how deep and general a feeling prevails on this subject, and we consider ourselves to be acting only in the discharge of our bounden duty both to the Crown and to the Church, when we respectfully but earnestly express to your Lordship our conviction that if this appointment be completed, there is the greatest danger both of the interruption of the peace of the Church, and of the disturbance of the confidence which it is most desirable that the Clergy and laity of the Church should feel in every exercise of the Royal supremacy, especially as regards that very delicate and important particular, the nomination to vacant sees. We have the honor to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's obedient faithful servants,

C. J. LONDON,	C. WINTON,
J. LINCOLN,	CHR. BANGOR,
HUGH CARLISLE,	G. ROCHESTER,
RICH. BATH AND WELLS,	J. H. GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL,
E. SARUM,	H. EXETER,
J. ELY,	A. T. CHICHESTER,
SAML. OXON.

To the Right Hon. the Lord John Russell, &c."

CHESHAM-PLACE, Dec. 8, 1847.

"My Lords,—I have had the honour to receive a representation signed by your Lordships on the subject of the nomination of Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford."

"I observe that your Lordships do not state any want of confidence on your part in the soundness of Dr. Hampden's doctrine. Your Lordships refer me to a decree of the University of Oxford passed 11 years ago, and founded upon lectures delivered 15 years ago."

"Since the date of that decree Dr. Hampden has acted as Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, and many Bishops, as I am told, have required certificates of attendance on his lectures before they proceeded to ordain candidates who had received their education at Oxford. He has likewise preached sermons, for which he has been honoured with the approbation of several prelates of our Church."

"Several months before I named Dr. Hampden to the Queen for the See of Hereford, I signified my intention to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and did not receive from him any discouragement."

"In these circumstances, it appears to me that should I withdraw my recommendation of Dr. Hampden, which has been sanctioned by the Queen, I should virtually assent to the doctrine that a decree of the University of Oxford is a perpetual ban of exclusion against a Clergyman of eminent learning and irreproachable life, and that, in fact, the supremacy which is now by law vested in the Crown is to be transferred to a majority of the members of one of our Universities."

"Nor should it be forgotten, that many of the most prominent among that majority have since joined the Communion of the Church of Rome."

"I deeply regret the feeling that is said to be common among the Clergy on this subject. But I cannot sacrifice the reputation of Dr. Hampden, the rights of the Crown, and what I believe to be the true interests of the Church, to a feeling which I believe to be founded on misapprehension and fomented by prejudice."

"At the same time I thank your Lordships for an interposition which I believe to be intended for the public benefit."

I have, &c.,

J. RUSSELL.

"To the Right Rev. the Bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, &c."

[VOL. X.—No. 3.—WHOLE No. 473.]

which would awaken in the heart those feelings of sympathy for others' sorrows, those benevolent affections, which dwell so abundantly in our Saviour's bosom, and which do so much towards preparing us for those purer worlds where all is love. When, too, in our worship here below, we use our solemn liturgy, that, God may provide for the fatherless children and widows, and all who are desolate and oppressed, and then send our prayers by offering our substance for their provision, we have the opportunity of testing the sincerity of our petitions; and this very act will give them a fervency and heartiness which will be felt and heard as we cry, "We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord." And when we pray, "thy kingdom come," when all such as have erred and are deceived are the subjects of our petitions, that they may be brought into the way of truth, and offerings into the treasury of the Lord for spreading abroad the blessings of the Gospel, will give the wings of faith to our prayers, which render them, through Christ, acceptable before the throne on high.

There is every sign of the dawning of a better day; men seem awakening to Church duties and Church privileges, and we have now a larger amount of Catholic spirit abroad than has existed for more than a century. The heaven is working, and we need not doubt that it will in due time leaven the whole lump. The present is doubtless a most anxious and critical time, but we must be patient, and wait the pleasure of that God who has so often rescued us in the hour of danger. It were well that we should not be too hasty, and not insist upon immaterial unessential points, however desirable, to the breach of peace. Yet let those who thus determine be fully sure that those things which they think immaterial and unessential, are really so, that they really do not involve a principle. Men are too apt in these days to think that great principles are only involved in great things, whereas there are many, very many, seemingly trifling things, which, if carefully examined, are seen to contain great results. Things, which at first sight appear trifling, are often full of a most important spirit. Let men beware, then, how they decide that things are unimportant, and, above all, let them not yield to clamor; those who stand firmly on their principles, and at the same time charitably and courteously, manifesting also their sincerity by their own lives, their own zeal and diligence; such men may rest fully assured that their sincerity will gain respect for their principles; their very firmness in such a case, and so displayed, will win them esteem, and in the end co-operation. If they act thus, they will soften the hearts even of their enemies, and gain their point at last. . . . They will gain nothing by yielding; those who yield up principles to clamour will lose all the respect even of those whom they are seeking to oblige or win. Their authority is at an end for ever; they place themselves at the mercy of their opponents, and happy will they be if they do not feel the constant effects of it, in the retarding of their future ministry. Whether Bishops or parish Priests, they will feel this equally to be the case. Let each fearlessly and firmly lay down their principles, and act upon them firmly. . . . We are constantly told that such doings will bring on a division in our Church; probably they would, but the Church would be the stronger for her loss. Much better were it that she should number a small band of one heart and soul than a large mixed multitude at variance. The threatened loss would be her greatest strength. Many, moreover, who now incline through ignorance to Puritanism, would shrink back and leave their errors when they beheld their Church plainly declaring herself. The Puritan body within would become a mere sect without, and when it would be looked upon by many with very different eyes from those with which they now survey it. The ancient Church did not shrink from casting forth her heretical members, however numerous and powerful, and however grievously she was thereby troubled for a time, yet the event always proved the wisdom of the course; her boldness, and her purity.

The following interesting and instructive narrative is taken from the Edinburgh edition of "Chambers' Miscellany of useful and entertaining Tracts, No. XII."—This collection is in the course of republication in this country, but we do not think has yet reached the number from which this extract is made.—[ED. BAN.]

ANTOINE DE MONTYON, whose life affords one of the most brilliant examples of practical and judicious benevolence, was born at Paris on the 23d of December 1733. His father a respectable accountant, bred up his son to the profession of the law; and such was the early proficiency of young Montyon in his studies, that, when only twenty-two years of age, he was admitted an advocate at the Chatelet—a court of civil and criiminal jurisprudence in the French capital. Here he distinguished himself by his talents, and, when still in middle life, was raised to the dignity of counsellor of state, and was so appointed to the government of Auvergne, a central province in France, where he speedily obtained the love, respect, and gratitude of the inhabitants, not only by his great integrity and justice, but his benevolence on many occasions of suffering.

To make room for some ministerial favorites of the day, he was first shifted from the government of Auvergne to that of Marseilles, from Marseilles afterwards to Rochelle, and finally to his situations altogether. By the accession of Louis XVI., a change from the dissolute state of affairs which had previously prevailed at court, Montyon again came into favorable notice, and was appointed chancellor to the royal household. Previous to his receiving this situation, and also when he enjoyed it, he occupied himself in devising and executing useful regulations; but this career of benevolence was brought to a close by the Revolution, an event which caused him to remove to Switzerland, and afterwards to England, to which country he wisely transferred his fortune. While in England, he devoted himself to scientific pursuits, and found scope for his benevolence in relieving the necessities of poor emigrants, than also in sending occasional contributions to the poor French refugees of war. Returning to France in 1815, he resumed his career of public usefulness: and these he continued till the closing of his death, on the 29th of December 1820.

Among the few leading facts in the biography of this remarkable man, whose life was destitute of all stirring incident, away is only memorable for an untiring course of unostentatious benevolence. Montyon appears to have been one of the kindest of men of whom we have any account; but with this kindness was united the not less rare quality of prudence. His views were not lavish or indiscriminate; it was founded on his comprehensive views of society, and had usually moral advancement for its special object. Influenced by the responsibility which wealth imparts, he seems to have spent the greater part of his life in organizing and establishing beneficiary institutions at his own cost. Besides dispensing large sums for the purpose, he resorted to the plan, more common in France as in England, of founding prizes, to be awarded annually on a select number of objects of benevolence and utility. Among the various institutions which he instituted, we select the following five as the most remarkable:—

I. A foundation destined to restore to the poor those articles which they had been driven by necessity to pledge but had not man, whose of redeeming—the value of each article to be under doubt to them.

II. A foundation to purchase small annuities for poor and infirm persons.

III. A foundation to award annual prizes for acts of virtue and of a local in humble life.

IV. A foundation to purchase small annuities for poor and infirm persons.

V. A foundation to purchase small annuities for poor and infirm persons.

The association of gentlemen in Paris. The sum yearly given is sometimes more, sometimes less, according to circumstances. In 1845 the sum bestowed was £760, in different parts. In the first place, there were three large prizes: one sending to a second of £80, and a third of £60. Next there were fifteen inferior prizes, called medals, consisting of eight The prizes, and nine of £20 each. The sums are publicly published by the Academy, with the names of those who receive them.

All the departments of France have an equal right to furnish or mention candidates for the prizes; and the mode of application is as follows. When any person has become conspicuous in the exercise of either private or public duties, the local authorities, acquainted with the circumstance, make the case known to the Academy, along with the necessary details and vouchers. Their application embraces a full account of the action or actions by which the individuals have become remarkable in the district, their age, means of existence, length of time they have distinguished themselves, and the objects that appear to have influenced their conduct. Great care is taken to prevent imposition. The memorial must be signed by neighbors, and the chief persons of the place—such as large proprietors of land, and the parish priest. Being corroborated by the mayor, it is handed to the prefect of the department, who, should the facts therein stated be known to him, certifies their truth, and in either case sends the whole to the secretary of the Academy, whom the application must reach before the 15th of January.

With respect to the plan on which this foundation proposes to act, it is undoubtedly true that the encouragement of virtuous actions by money payments, or indeed by any mark of public approbation, is not consistent with the soundest principle in morals. So much may be allowed; and yet, as a measure of social policy, the dispensation of rewards of one kind or other is not only far from being injudicious, but obviously commendable. In all questions of this kind we require to look at the actual condition of society, the generally uncultured habits and feelings of the people, the cheerless lot which it is the inheritance of so many to struggle with, the readiness to punish, and the little consideration of provocatives to crime, which unfortunately signalize all governments. These, and other circumstances, show that rewards may be judiciously administered as stimulants to virtue; and that such is the general impression of mankind, is evidenced by the distribution of honors among the higher orders of every community. On this topic it may not be inappropriate to give a short extract from the speech of the celebrated statesman Dupin, pronounced with regard to the Montyon Prizes, at the sitting of the Academy on the 11th of December 1845. After stating the great difficulty of properly recompensing virtue, M. Dupin observed—"When the French Academy distributes, as it will to-day, the prizes founded by M. de Montyon, it does not pretend to exercise that high justice which human institutions can never attain. For a few traits which are brought under its notice, however remarkable or meritorious these may be, many must remain unknown. Nor does the Academy pretend to pay the authors of those deeds which have merited its applause; those men possessed of providential courage, those poor women endowed with angelical devotedness, have placed their reward elsewhere. The French Academy acts merely in the capacity of executor; it simply delivers the pious legacy which has been destined to them. At the same time that it loudly proclaims their actions, it takes pleasure in having the knowledge spread far and wide; not that their vanity may enjoy a puerile satisfaction, but that others may be improved, that this simple recital may touch those who will read it, and create in the hearts of all the love of virtue and the desire of imitation. Philosophers have often shown themselves embarrassed to define virtue, to assign it its distinctive marks, and divide it into classes. The Academy is not so critical. It prefers, amongst different virtues, when a choice must be made, that which includes and inspires them all, and to which Christianity has given the name of charity."

A history of a few of the cases which merited prizes, will serve much better than any harangue to point out the utility of this benevolent foundation. The cases occur under four different heads—Filial Piety, Charity, Fidelity, and Courage.

PAULINE COPAIN.

In the year 1838, a lawyer was directed to take the necessary steps for recovering a debt which was due to one of his clients by a man named Copain, then residing with his family in the village of Saint-Marc sur Seine, in the north-eastern part of France. In order to ascertain what likelihood there was of the debt being paid, the lawyer proceeded himself to the house of the debtor. "Never," he afterwards declared, "did I witness a sight more touching than that offered to me on this occasion." He was introduced into a small and humbly-furnished, but strictly-clean room. An infirm and aged man, in whom it was not difficult to recognize an old soldier, was sitting near the fireplace, and with difficulty rose to receive the visitor; his wife, whom her advanced age evidently rendered incapable of any save the slightest exertion, was busying herself in some trifling household work; and on a bed, in a recess of the apartment, lay a poor helpless girl, seemingly deprived of the use of her limbs, and whom her vacant and wandering look but too evidently proclaimed to be an idiot. Almost immediately a fourth person appeared; this was Mademoiselle Pauline Copain, a poor village schoolmistress, and daughter of the debtor. She seemed to be about thirty-five years of age, and was neatly but simply attired; her appearance was mild and interesting, but without anything very remarkable; indeed the lawyer would certainly have paid no attention to her but for one circumstance—it was on her single and unaided exertions that the three helpless beings he had seen depended for their daily bread.

Struck with this fact, he made a few inquiries, and was still more astonished at what he learned. For nearly twenty years Pauline had been the only support of her parents and her unfortunate sister; she was, moreover, known throughout the village for acts of universal benevolence and charity; yet the number of her scholars was limited, they paid but little, and many of them were gratuitously instructed. Many people were found who asserted that if Pauline and her family could subsist on her small earnings, it must be through a miracle. It was indeed through a miracle; but through such a one as charity, industry and economy can alone achieve. The lawyer could not without difficulty bring himself to believe what he saw. He at length did so, but it was by concluding that the blessing of Heaven rested on this humble roof; nor was he mistaken, for Pauline dwelt beneath it.

Anxious to know more of what he rightly considered surprising, he purposely prolonged his visit, and thus only acquired stronger grounds for admiring the noble character of Pauline Copain. The love and attention she displayed not only for her parents, but also towards the children confided to her care, her gentleness and affection for all were so touching, and yet exercised with such simplicity, that the lawyer knew not which to admire most: her calm unostentatious manner, or the extent of the daily sacrifices her position compelled her to make. So astonished and struck was he with all he saw, that he was on the point of departing with the conviction that not only those poor people could never pay the debt which had caused his visit, but that there would also be direct cruelty and inhumanity in endeavoring to force them into compliance, when Mademoiselle Pauline Copain, having learned with what object he had come, and ascertained that the claim of his client was founded on justice, firmly and unhesitatingly declared that her father's debts were like her own, and insisted that he should receive her personal engagement for the payment of the sum which was due. And not only did she pay this debt, but also every other which came to her knowledge; and, lest any should escape, she industriously sought them out one by one. On being remonstrated with on this subject, she earnestly exclaimed—"What! disown my father's debts! allow his honor to suffer such a stain! Nay, by working assiduously, I can accomplish everything!"

Years have passed since then, and still Pauline Copain labours in her filial task, cheerfully and undauntedly. Nor is her pride misplaced: her father is an old and honorable soldier, whose infirmities proceed from the wounds received in his country's service; his poverty, and the debts he has unfortunately been obliged to contract, are the result of the severe losses he experienced in 1814 and 1815, when his house was twice pillaged of all that it contained by the allied troops; and he was, moreover, deprived by the new government of the small benefit he reaped by holding a tobaccoist's shop—an office which, in France, is not the property of private individuals, but a post of trust depending on the state. But for his daughter Pauline, the unfortunate Copain and his family must undoubtedly have fallen into the deepest misery. At the epoch of his misfortunes, she was living in Paris in a comfortable place; but on hearing of his unhappy position she immediately relinquished it to join him, and resume her former humble station of village schoolmistress. Seventeen years have passed since then. Pauline has spent her youth in poverty and obscurity; but, thanks to her unwearyed efforts, neither the old soldier, nor his helpmate, nor his poor insane daughter, have lacked bread.

Noble as is the conduct of Pauline Copain towards her parents, it is not her only claim to admiration and respect. She has ever given proofs of her charitable and benevolent disposition, and though many instances of this might be quoted, a few will suffice.

In the year 1819, Pauline was returning home towards evening, and following the high road which leads to the village of Saint Marc, when the loud cries of a child suddenly attracted her attention. Hastening towards the spot whence the sounds proceeded, she perceived a poor woman lying in a ditch, and evidently in great bodily anguish. A little girl of about four or five years of age, and the same whom Pauline had heard, was standing near her, and crying bitterly. Moved at the sight of their distress, Pauline inquired into the causes of it, and learned that the woman before her, after wandering for several days with her child about the country in a state of great destitution, without a shelter or the means of procuring one, had suddenly, and on the spot where she now saw her, been overtaken with the pains of premature labor, which unless she received proper assistance, threatened speedily to end her life. Without a moment's hesitation or delay Pauline hastily summoned several persons to the spot: a rude litter was immediately procured; and on it Pauline had the poor creature conveyed to her father's dwelling. Although this was the epoch of their greatest poverty, the worthy family gladly received the unfortunate woman and her child, immediately showing them every attention in their power. Pauline especially attended the sick woman with unremitting zeal, until death, brought on by exposure and fatigue, put an end to her sufferings. But her last moments were at least soothed by the promise which Pauline made, and faithfully performed—that the little girl, her only surviving child, should never want a home. And she kept her word.

A band of those Savoyards who annually emigrate from their country, and generally return towards spring to their native hills, was in the vicinity of Saint-Marc, when one of the boys who accompanied the caravan having severely wounded his foot on the road, was compelled to remain behind, whilst his companions continued their journey. The poor little fellow had no money, his feet were very sore, and totally hindered him from working; he knew not in this state of distress to whom to apply for help, when Pauline Copain, on learning his case, immediately gave him an asylum, dressed his wounds herself, and treated him with as much kindness as though he were her own brother. When he was cured she procured him some slight employment, by which he was enabled to earn his livelihood, until spring having once more come round, and a new band of Savoyards crossing Saint-Marc on their way homewards, he was enabled to join them, and continue his journey. It is pleasant to record that the young Savoyard, who is now a man, and comfortably settled in his own country, did not show himself ungrateful for the kindness he had experienced from Pauline Copain. Every winter, when some of his countrymen cross Saint-Marc on their way to Paris or England, they never fail to bring some gift from him as a token of remembrance to his benefactress; and however slight the value of the present may be, it is not the less acceptable to Pauline, as a proof of his gratitude for past favours, and of the recollection she has preserved of them. Another instance will suffice to show the native goodness of Pauline Copain.

A poor shepherdess of Saint-Marc, who had six young children to support, took in a child to nurse in the hope of thus alleviating her great misery. After having paid her regularly for some time, the parents of the child absconded, and were never more heard of, leaving their infant daughter to her care. Although burdened herself with a large family, and in a state of deep distress, the woman felt unwilling to part from the poor abandoned little creature: she resolved to keep it and bring it up with her own children, as long as she was able to do so. But as her family grew up, her expenses increased; the produce of her daily labour was no longer sufficient for the support of all, and she was at last compelled to have recourse to begging. She accordingly sent her children and their adopted sister on the high roads for this purpose. On learning this, Pauline Copain, moved with compassion, offered to take the forsaken child under her own care. The proposal was gratefully accepted; and after keeping the little girl for two years, Pauline found her a place in an asylum opened to poor and deserted children, still continuing to aid, as much as her slender means permitted, the shepherdess and her family.

After thus speaking of Pauline Copain's filial piety and charity, we must now give a few details concerning her character as a school-mistress, no less admirable than the rest of her life might lead one to expect. Of the exact extent of her acquirements we are not able to speak; but from what is required in France of every person who wishes to open a school they cannot be of so low an order as might, from her humble position, be at first supposed. Two diplomas, and often three, are necessary to open an establishment for girls, whether it be of the most fashionable class, or of the humblest description. These diplomas are granted to the candidates if they succeed in passing their examination, and in properly answering questions which are put to them. For the first examination they are required to know and thoroughly understand reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic, sacred and ecclesiastical history, for the second, French history, geography, and natural philosophy, cosmography, and the principles of music, are necessary.

It is needless to dwell on the excellent results of such a term, which almost precludes the possibility of there being a thing as an ignorant school-mistress in France—an occurrence which must have happened but too frequently were it arranged otherwise. Whatever the natural talents of Pauline may be, it can be thought from this that her acquirements certainly place her far above the position she now occupies. In one sense this is true; but Pauline has shown her example, that usefulness every where finds its source, however low or limited that may appear to be.

The children she has to instruct belong for the most part to poor parents, who consider much knowledge as a superfluous commodity, and are far more anxious to see their offspring comfortably settled in life than properly brought up. This is a great inconvenience, which Pauline's utmost tact has too often been obliged to obviate; nor has she had less difficulty in persuading parents that education, far from obstructing the accomplishment of the duties of life, is much more likely to facilitate them; and in this objection her own example was assuredly the best that could be given. Not only is Pauline unwearied in her endeavours to instruct and improve those scholars whose parents cannot remunerate her for her trouble, but she has in many instances given the value she sets on instruction, by gratuitously educating those poor children whose relatives cannot afford the expense of sending them to school; others who, after paying for some time, were no longer able to do so, she has continued to instruct to as though no change had taken place. The education which Copain gives her pupils is, upon the whole, more practical than that of a school; in her humble school no accomplishments are taught, or learned; for the knowledge she imparts is of the most useful kind, though clearly explained. But praiseworthy as are her efforts in this line, the best the noblest lessons which Copain gives to her scholars, are those of universal benevolence—inculcated not by dry and unprofitable maxims, but by her own daily example. Nor is she satisfied with this mode of teaching. She has given proofs of the constant appeal to the generosity of her pupils in favor of the poor destitute creature, who only wanted decent clothing to earn her livelihood by entering a good place.

ately the school seemed transformed into a dressmaker's room, and continued so until a sufficient quantity of had, by some means, been found or made. If a poor were in distress, and in want of food, things went on the same manner. Each scholar would take something the provisions she had brought with her, until a sufficiently somewhat heterogeneous, meal was provided for the poor people. Such is the education which Pauline Copain the children intrusted to her care. It needs no comment can we better conclude these remarks than by giving of an inhabitant of the village, and which convey all be told on the subject: "A hundred times have I those occurrences—admirable lessons of benevolence more capable of forming the heart of youth than all the tations in the world."

Facts like these might well draw the attention of whom they were submitted; and in the year 1815 the after bestowing high praise on the noble character and of Pauline Copain, unanimously voted her a prize of a thousand francs (£40).

FROM A SERMON "ON THE DUTY AND BENEFIT OF A SYSTEM OF WEEKLY CHURCH OFFERINGS—PREACHED IN ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, SING SING, N. Y., BY THE RECTOR."

"Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come."—1 Cor. xvi. 2.

The ministering to the necessities of others less favored than ourselves by means of offerings of such things as we have, is acknowledged by all to be an important Christian duty. If there be one mode more than another better calculated to encourage the true principle which should call forth such offerings, Christian prudence, at least, would lead to its adoption.

Exciting appeals, worldly measures, and cunning management may and do often, nay constantly succeed in calling forth large portions of this world's treasures for pious and benevolent uses ; but we dare not call such gifts, Christian offerings. The money may be there ; but where is the piety which should have offered it ? Now the worldly man, who would fain make gold, the God which he worships, the sole instrument of the Church's power, cannot comprehend why any stress should be laid upon the peculiar mode of obtaining the necessary provision for religious purposes. To get the money seems all he cares for. It enters not within his powers of comprehension how it is that the smallest offering into the treasury of the Lord, may have a value far exceeding one of a much greater amount. He knows not the vast difference that exists in the sight of God, between an act performed upon Christian principle, and one recognizing no principle whatever.

TERMS.—The price is $2.50 a year, payable in ad

ings they are due to ~~others~~ ^{the Lord}. The price is $250 a year, payable in ^{advance} ~~advance~~ ^{at the end of the year} ~~at the end of the year~~ ^{if not paid before the end of the year}. This system recommends itself, as by it their duty is the most easily performed. Their offerings, by being made so frequently, are comparatively small at any one time; and there is consequently not the same temptation to withhold from the treasury of the Lord, that amount or proportion of their income, which under a proper consideration of the subject, they may decide upon as their duty to offer. Others, however, whose fortune and prosperity may be of a more fluctuating character, are enabled to give more at one time than at another. A week of more than ordinary prosperity in business, would, of course, call for such a larger offering; while in another of less profit, it would be, not only inconvenient for them, but perhaps improvident, to offer as much. "For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not."

"Upon the first day of the week," then, "let every one of you," my brethren, rich and poor, "lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him."

I believe it would be difficult, brethren, to calculate the great advantage it would be to the piety of the Church, if a return were made to the regular, systematic, and prayerful mode of making the offerings of her members, as ordered by the Apostle. It would have the effect of constantly reminding us of what we are in general too forgetful, that we are here as stewards of God, intrusted with talents, to be used for His glory. It would lead into constant exercise the duty of self-denial, which is inseparable from a sincere following of Christ. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself." It would be a most effectual mode for the destruction of that selfishness of heart, which desires to centre within oneself every thought of happiness and comfort. It would draw us away, periodically at least, from ourselves, and fix our attention upon the suffering poor, the destitute, and afflicted—call to our remembrance the labors and trials of the missionary soldiers of the cross, which would awaken in the heart those feelings of sympathy for others' sorrows, those benevolent affections, which dwell so abundantly in our Saviour's bosom, and which do so much towards preparing us for those purer worlds where all is love. When, too, in our worship here below, we use our solemn litany, that, God may provide for the fatherless children and widows, and all who are desolate and oppressed, and then send our prayers by offering our substance for their provision, we have the opportunity of testing the sincerity of our petitions; and this very act will give them a fervency and heartiness which will be felt and heard as we cry, "We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord." And when we pray, "thy kingdom come," when all such as have erred and are deceived are the subjects of our petitions, that they may be brought into the way of truth, our offerings into the treasury of the Lord for spreading abroad the blessings of the Gospel, will give the wings of faith to our prayers, which render them, through Christ, acceptable before the throne on high.

There is every sign of the dawning of a better day; men seem awakening to Church duties and Church privileges, and we have now a larger amount of Catholic spirit abroad than has existed for more than a century. The heaven is working, and we need not doubt that it will in due time leaven the whole lump. The present is doubtless a most anxious and critical time, but we must be patient, and wait the pleasure of that God who has so often rescued us in the hour of danger. It were well that we should not be too hasty, and not insist upon immaterial unessential points, however desirable, to the breach of peace. Yet let those who thus determine be fully sure that these things which they think immaterial and unessential, are really so, that they really do not involve a principle. Men are too apt in these days to think that great principles are only involved in great things, whereas there are many, very many, seemingly trifling things, which, if carefully examined, are seen to contain great results. Things, which at first sight appear to be trifling, are often full of a most important spirit. Let men beware, then, how they decide that things are unimportant, and, above all, let them not yield to clamor; those who stand firmly on their principles, and at the same time charitably and courteously, manifesting also their sincerity by their own lives, their own zeal and diligence; such men may rest fully assured that their sincerity will gain respect for their principles; their very firmness in such a case, and so displayed, will win them esteem, and in the end co-operation. If they act thus, they will soften the hearts even of their enemies, and gain their point at last. . . . They will gain nothing by yielding; those who yield up principles to clamour will lose all the respect even of those whom they are seeking to oblige or win. Their authority is at an end for ever; they place themselves at the mercy of their opponents, and happy will they be if they do not feel the constant effects of it, in the retarding of their future ministry. Whether Bishops or parish Priests, they will feel this equally to be the case. Let each fearlessly and firmly lay down their principles, and act upon them firmly. . . . We are constantly told that such doings will bring on a division in our Church; probably they would, but the Church would be the stronger for her loss. Much better were it that she should number a small band of one heart and soul than a large mixed multitude at variance. The threatened loss would be her greatest strength. Many, moreover, who now incline through ignorance to Puritanism, would shrink back and leave their errors when they beheld their Church plainly declaring herself. The Puritan body within would become a mere sect without, and when it would be looked upon by many with very different eyes from those with which they now survey it. The ancient Church did not shrink from casting forth her heretical members, however numerous and powerful, and however grievously she was thereby troubled for a time, yet the event always proved the wisdom of the course; her boldness and willingness to make a fearful sacrifice at first, in the end obtained for her peace and purity. And so we should find now; and surely our Church might with much surer and juster confidence, reckon on the assistance and support of her Lord, when taking a bold, open, self-sacrificing course, than when proceeding fearfully, and speaking hesitatingly, and permitting the truth to be corrupted, that she might remain in a dangerous rest, which, after all, daily experience proves to be no rest, but endless strife and anxiety."

—Preface, pp. xiv., xv., xvi.
"There is an earnest feeling silently but surely growing up; and if the rulers and pastors of our Church will but be bold and firm, they will find themselves upheld by no mean support, such as the Puritan opposition will in all human probability never be able to overcome. We shall hear no longer of Romish sanctity and Romish unity; we shall be taunted no longer with the weakness and undisciplined state of our Church; her children will place in her the full unbounded confidence of loving hearts, for they will see that God is with her to bless her, and they will feel within themselves the peace and hope which she can fully give. They will begin to feel that men of the deepest learning and most earnest piety, such as Hooker, Herbert, Andrewes, Laud, with a host of others, were really living members of the Catholic Church; they will begin to see that the Communion which they judged to be safe is really a road to Heaven; that the theory which they rejected is really no essential part of the Christian scheme; they will see that such men as these were less likely to err in their judgments than their weak sinful unlearned selves. It is not in reality because the Romish claim is valid, but because the English Church has been slothful, that her sons have become dissatisfied and unloving; it is because she has not been robed in her own fair dress that they have been disgusted, and fled from her."—Preface, p. xxiii.

Miscellaneous.

Constantinople.

The following Communication has been received from Bishop Southgate. It will be perceived that it is in continuation of his report to the Board of Missions and the General Convention:

Constantinople, Oct. 4, 1847.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I. I have not found myself able to resume the consideration of your letter of July 14th, since mine of August 26th. I feel less concern for this, on receiving your questions, and seeing little in them that appears important beyond what I have already answered. All those upon "the Greek Church," and upon the "Syrian Church," were noticed in my reports transmitted to you, and all those on "the Armenian Church," with the exception of the last two. With regard to the first of these, "the character of the Armenian population, as to intelligence and education," I think highly of the native qualities of the Armenians as a race. They are sober, prudent, inquiring, have more common sense than genius, are industrious, better principled than some other eastern communities, peculiarly susceptible of religious impressions. They are not educated, speaking of them as a nation, but are improving in this respect, and also declining; for, while knowledge increases among them, and new schools are opened by the untiring zeal of the Patriarch, and many minds are doubtless enlightened, others are wandering away into infidelity, having received of knowledge only the corrupting influences of French literature. Their great want in this particular, is that of good teachers, well-trained, and a system of education.

As to the effects of exhibiting the Prayer Book to them in their own language, I will not speculate upon what they may be, as we shall soon know what they are. The Prayer Book, being now on the eve of publication, (I am expecting it daily out of the binder's hands,) we shall soon have an opportunity of judging of its effects by actual experience. As yet, I have the opinions of only three or four, who have seen as many copies, first bound as specimens. One of them, a Priest of the reformed class, not a seceder—(the distinction is a broad one)—says, after going through the Book carefully, that "it is admirable; he had no idea of such a Church among the English, (a name very often given to the English and Americans promiscuously,) and he rejoices to find in it the old Armenian doctrine." Another, a layman, who knows the book well, writes me that "he has no doubt the Armenians would be pleased with it." Another, formerly of the seceders, but who has now returned to his Church, tells me that "if the seceders had had this book a year or two ago, they would never have formed the schism they have done." These are all the opinions I yet have. I shall be ready to report others favourable or unfavourable, as they come to my knowledge.

II. I have given a list of every thing published by the mission in my reports. No alterations have been made in matters of doctrine in anything translated by the mission. In matters of a local character, (as for example, in the third question of the preliminary instructions, concerning festivals, taken from Nelson's work,) there have been such changes as difference of place required. The question just referred to, for example, is, "Are not holy-days enforced by the laws of the land?" It has reference only to England, and has no use in a book intended for Orientals. It was, therefore, with the answer, omitted. So of other things.

The sources from which funds have been obtained for publication, are mentioned in my reports.

The opportunities for circulating books are, a depository which I have in the city, private intercourse with Christians, sending by trusty persons into the interior, and sale in native book-shops.

The proportion of Armenians who would be likely to read publications, I cannot state. It is daily increasing, but I have not sufficient data to answer, excepting by mere conjecture. I think publishing one of the best modes of doing good here, and those who would most read, (being the clergy, and the most intelligent and influential of the laity,) are those whom it is most important to influence. We are doing less with the press than any other body of Christians having Missionaries in this country.

No tracts have been published having direct reference to errors or superstition prevailing here. I think that the most effectual way of doing good, is by stating truth itself, and that this is the most successful mode of assailing error, especially among an ignorant people. Truth established, displaces what is contrary to it. In this way we have published works against error and superstition. For example, a tract like ours, on the right use of festivals, is, in its whole tenor, an argument against their corrupt or superstitious use. By saying, then, that we have published nothing having direct reference to errors and superstition, I mean nothing formally assailing them, but everything published has direct reference to them, in so far, as it is the statement of the truth to which they are opposed. I have never seen a tract of the kind intended by your question, published by anybody in this country.

The Armenian language was assigned to Mr. Miles and Mr. Penny. Mr. Miles pursued the study of it till his departure. Mr. Taylor took the Arabic, and I the Greek. All studied Turkish. We had, also, native assistants, speaking, one, English, and all, native languages.

(2) Education.—I am not much in favour of schools, (in the common acceptation of the term,) as a part of Missionary labor in this country. Every country, doubtless, has, in some respects, its peculiarities with regard to the kind of labour best suited to it. But I think, in general, and peculiarly here, the training of native agents, carefully selected, and few in number, is the best mode to effect the great work to be done; it being the laying of a permanent foundation, the planting of seed whose fruit will endure, and whose branches will spread,—of seed which will forever continue to propagate itself.

As the native Christians are making great efforts to improve education, and their means are scanty, and their knowledge for such purposes small, I think it an act of fraternal charity to aid their schools, to improve their discipline by kindly counsels, and to supply them, as our own means permit, with text-books and instruments of instruction.

I think a theological school should grow gradually out of another of a lower character, the preparatory steps to the former not having yet been passed; but religious instruction should be a part of this lower education.

I think that any institution belonging to the Mission should belong to it exclusively. It would not be well to take part, by any commixture of administration, in native institutions. They should be left to themselves, so far as government and official control is concerned. Our aid to them should be by kindly counsel, &c., as above mentioned; and our own institutions should be exclusively under our control, receiving, however, in a kind spirit, any suggestions from native Christian brethren, while we reserve to ourselves the right to adopt or reject them, as we judged best. This is the only true course for peace, as combined agencies often create confusion and strife.

The amount of funds necessary for establishing such an institution as I have recommended, would depend upon the number of scholars, &c. A beginning, I suppose, could be made at $1,000 per annum, and continued without enlargement, at the same.

(3) Ministerial.—It is hardly necessary to say that we do not propose to exercise the functions of the Ministry, (if by that you mean pastoral care, or anything that belongs of right to that office alone,) among our Eastern brethren. This would be in direct violation of the instructions, both of the Presiding Bishop and the Foreign Committee, on which this Mission was founded; to say nothing of higher and universal laws of the Church of Christ.

Of the Mission Chapel, I have spoken in my reports. There was only one Oriental Bishop present at the consecration, and he has repeatedly attended since.

IV. My plans of future labor, beyond what I have indicated in my reports, must depend upon the amount of funds placed at my disposal. I shall be able, therefore, to answer the question fully, only after hearing from the Triennial Meeting of the Board.

V. Everything under this head seems to be sufficiently answered in the letter to a friend, which I sent open for your perusal.

VI. Expenditures.—I find, on referring to my account, that, during the two years ending July 1, 1847, the Mission received from the Church £400 for Missionary purposes, and that it has expended, (exclusive of everything received from the Christian Knowledge Society, and the Protestant Episcopal Tract Society for publications,) £600. The deficiency has been made up by contributions of members of the mission, £100, and by private donations forwarded through the Secretary, £15; the remainder, £85, is a debt which the Mission now owes, and which I am most anxious to discharge. I hope to do so by aid of the sum asked from the Foreign Committee, for this year, in addition to what has been received, and by an appropriation of $400 for next year, which will enable me to pay the small balance remaining, before enlarging our operations in the department of education. I have to commend the zeal of my associates in the Mission, who have advanced, out of their private salaries enough to save us from serious embarrassment, and to prevent a reduction of our labors. I shall make it a point, with whatever I receive from the Church at the approaching Convention, to keep within the limits of the appropriation, and to lay out my work according to the receipts of the Mission. The annual expense will be determined by the appropriation. I have formerly said, that $10,000 per annum were needed to do the work to which we are called. We shall endeavour to do that portion of this work which the annual appropriation shall admit of.

No agents exclusively secular are employed. One only attends in part to secular duties, but these are secular duties of the Mission, relating to the sending and receiving of letters and articles, postages, freights, payments, &c. &c.

The questions relating to the Armenian troubles, are treated of in my letter to the seceders, and published in the Church papers, to which I beg to refer you. Most of it has been published since your letter was written.

I have written necessarily, with somewhat of haste, but I believe I have left nothing unanswered. I shall be happy at all times to answer questions, and I hope that they may relieve the doubts and remove the misapprehensions of some of our brethren. I shall be happy to give information on all subjects connected with the Mission, and I regret that my time is so little at my command for this purpose. I shall wait for the decision of the Board, and abide by it with perfect cheerfulness. It cannot be adverse to me, for I am predisposed to submission; and finding in the view of the Church the clear expression of God's will concerning me, I have no other desire than to hear that voice, that I may yield to it.

Believe me, with sincere regard to the individual members of the committee, your faithful friend and brother.

Spirit of Missions.

Circumcision of Christ.

Early Thy course of pain didst Thou begin,
Son of the Highest! to the Law's sharp rite
Submitting, ere familiar with earth's light,— Faint shadow of Thy spotless purity:—no sin
In Thee required such symbol: Thou would'st win
Our prompt obedience, by Thy pattern bright,
To every rule of wisdom infinite:—
Thou would'st encourage us, to Thee akin
By our new-birth, ne'er cowardly to shrink,
When of some cup of bitterness to drink
By duty summoned:—Thou, sweet Babe, would'st teach
Our worldly, wayward minds the thought to link
Of glorious gain with suffering; and, through each
New pang for Thee endured, after new joys to reach.

The Christian lives by Faith.

Faith is essential to the formation of the christian's character; his mark or stamp, whereby in the sight of God, and of the holy angels, he is known, amid ten thousand other men.—“Whatsoever is not of faith is sin.” The forms of faith, may be assumed, and often are, where faith itself is wanting. These may impose on human eyes; but faith itself, though clothed in forms, is “the hidden man of the heart:” seen only by Him whose prerogative it is to “search the heart.” There may be conformity to Christian forms, without faith; but faith cannot be without outward forms.

By faith, the child of God repairs to his closet, and shuts his door, and falls upon his knees and says, “Our Father, who art in Heaven.” He is alone, so far as flesh and sense can judge. He is in perfect secrecy, so far as any of his fellow mortals are concerned; his voice is spent in air; his hands are lifted up to empty space. But is it so? Far from it. “He seeth Him who is invisible.” By faith, “he falls down and kneels before the Lord his maker.” By faith, “he beholds the heavens opened, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God.” By faith, he is within “the City of the living God”—so far from being alone, he is surrounded by “an innumerable company of angels;” and “by the spirits of just men made perfect.” He is a worshipper with “the General Assembly and Church of the first born, which are written in Heaven.” What a difference does faith make here? Two men enter at the same time into their chambers. The one prays for form sake—because he has been taught that it is his duty—in hope that God will reward him for so self-denying a service. The other prays “in faith.” He esteems it his highest privilege. He takes unearthly pleasure in the exercise. He draws near to God, “with a true heart, in full assurance” that the desires of his soul are known, and that the requests of his lips will be granted, in such a way, as is most expedient for him.

“By faith,” the Christian father of a family regards himself “a priest of the most high God;” his wife, an emblem of the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ. The mother of his children, a type of “the mother of us all.” Daily, morning and evening he convenes “his household,” “accompanies them,” and leads the way, “with a pure heart and humble voice, to the throne of the Heavenly grace;” that with them he may “offer praise,” for family mercies, and supplicate God's favor for the time to come. His “children are an heritage from the Lord.” “By faith he commands and instructs them and his household,” after his own example, “to keep the ways of the Lord, to do justice and judgment.” Having brought his children to Jesus Christ, in Holy Baptism; “by faith,” he looks upon them, regards and treats them, as “members of Christ's” mystical body, “children of God, by spiritual regeneration,” and “heirs of the kingdom of Heaven.” “As soon as they are able to learn,” he teaches them “whata solemn vow, promise and profession has been made for them, in their name and stead. That they may know these things the better, “he calls upon them to hear sermons,” and “provides that they may learn the Creed, the Lords prayer, and the ten Commandments, with all other things which a Christian ought to know and believe to his soul's health.” The Christian's watchful care, over his family, never ceases; aided by his faithful wife, their united endeavour is to bring them up to man's estate, “to lead a Godly and a Christian life.” At the proper season, “they are brought ‘in faith’ to the Bishop,” the chief minister of Christ, the centre of unity, “to be confirmed by him” that “they may be defended by the Lord, with his Heavenly grace, and continued his forever, and daily increase in his holy spirit more and more, until they come to his everlasting kingdom.”

Faith makes all the difference between the form and the substance. Christianity is a living religion. The Church is to him who has faith a living body. The word is life; the Sacraments are life; prayer is a living exercise. The believer is alive unto God, and so far as he is renewed unto holiness, he is dead to the world, and the flesh.

The reader can pursue this train of thought at pleasure. He can illustrate the power of faith by similar applications to public worship, and to all the varying forms of Christian experience. He will find it profitable thus to trace the line between things visible and invisible—things outward and inward. But let him know, this high and Heavenly gift of faith, can only be secured by humble prayer, and diligent waiting upon the Lord.

“In prayer on earth, the saints are one,
They're one in word and mind,
When with the Father and the Son,
Sweet fellowship they find.

O thou by whom, we come to God,
The life, the truth, the way,
The path of prayer, thyself hast trod
Lord teach us how to pray.”

Died

On Wednesday the 12th inst, in the 55th year of her age, Mrs. ELIZABETH BOYD, daughter of the late Robert H. Livingston of Dutchess County, N. Y., and wife of the Rev. Dr. Boyd, Rector of St. John's Church in the Northern Liberties. This estimable lady had been afflicted, for several months, with the painful malady which terminated her honoured and valuable life; and, during that whole period of protracted suffering, with the certainty of death before her, manifested a firm, unwavering faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and was preparing, with meek resignation, for the end that was coming. She died at last in the peace of God, passing away from earth to brighter worlds on high, gently and calmly as a sleeping infant. Her whole life, since her early conversion to God, had been a life of faith, devotion, and piety. Blessed with unusual amenity of disposition, and a blandness of manners rarely seen, the virtues of her character were invested with a peculiar charm, which rendered her to her family and friends an object of the most attachment; and won the admiration of an extensive circle of acquaintances. In the congregation of St. John's Church, in which her worthy husband has now been ministering for thirty-four years, she was looked up to by all as “a mother in Israel” truly. Such a woman was an ornament to the Gospel, an honour to the Church, and a blessing to the community. But, high-wrought eulogy would be in violent contrast with the humbleness and modesty of her nature; and can do nothing to emblazon worth like hers. We, therefore, say no more, except that she paralleled the description which the wise man gives of “a virtuous woman.” “Her children arose and called her blessed; her husband also, and he praised her. Her own works praise her in the gates.”

To our esteemed and warmly loved brother, thus bereaved of one of the best of wives, after a union of thirty-seven years, at a time of life too when such an affliction must be felt to be peculiarly severe, we offer our sincere condolence; and desire to express, in this his day of mourning and sadness, our highest respect and our cordial affection. May the Master he has served so long and so well, fill the void in his aching heart with His own presence; and, amid the darkness which spreads the pall of woe over his house, lift up the light of his countenance upon his stricken servant, and give him peace.

The obsequies of the lamented deceased were performed in St. John's Church in the Northern Liberties, (where she had worshipped from the day that sacred edifice was opened, and at whose altar she had so often knelt,) on Monday morning last, the 17th inst.; and were attended by a large concourse of sorrowing friends. The burial office was said over her remains by the Rev. Dr. Ducahet, Rector of St. Stephen's Church in this city; and a sermon adapted to the occasion was preached by him. The Rev. Robert M. Mitcheson read the funeral lesson. After which the body was deposited in the Rector's vault, in the porch of the Church, by the side of her venerated mother, who died a short time before her, and near by the spot where repose the relics of a lovely daughter, who also went away a few years ago. Their “flesh rests in hope”—until “the resurrection of the just,” awaiting “the glorious appearing of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.”

Errata in the Standard Edition of the Prayer Book.

MR. EDITOR:—

In glancing over the Standard edition of the Prayer Book, I perceive that the Second Lesson, Evening Prayer, for Easter-even, and for Monday in Easter week, is misprinted.

The Second Lesson, Evening Prayer, for Easter-even is not as “the Standard” Prayer Book prints it, “Hebrews 3,” but Hebrews 4; and the Second Lesson, Evening Prayer, for Monday in Easter week is not “Acts 4,” as the Standard has it, but Acts 3.

Such errors as these, in the table of Lessons, Mr. Editor, ought to be severely criticised, especially, in a book claiming to be the Standard, and whose accuracy is vouched, by such distinguished names as are known to be connected with its proof-reading and printing. But we have no desire, at present, to do more than point out the above mentioned inexcusable blunders; and under the impression that “the Standard” may be faulty in other parts, to respectfully solicit from any one who has noted other errors, to give a list of the errata in the Standard Prayer Book.

It may be also worthy of notice, that the original Prayer Book printed by Hewit, and presented to the General Convention of 1844, and from the stereotype plates of which, “the Standard,” is certified to have been printed, does not contain the errors now pointed out.

New York.—From the Annual Report. The Protestant Episcopal Tract Society, in New York has now completed the thirty-seventh year of its existence. In this as in preceding years, it has had its trials and blessings; but still the years of its advancing maturity are more important, they trust, on the interests of the Church than those of its youth; inasmuch as they are using the accumulations of the past, as well as the additions of the present, and thus, like the dwarf on the giant's shoulders, may reach further and higher than at any former period.—1,640,000 pages have been gratuitously issued during the past year, and of these, 700,000, or nearly one half, to places beyond the borders of our own Diocese; and 2,100,000 have been published—an amount which, though small as it may appear compared with the total products of the press in this land, may yet, by God's blessing, prove as the healing branch cast into the bitter waters of Marah—sweeten and purify them. * * *

The expenditures of the Society during the past year have been $1,650: while their receipts have been $1,760: this is $700, or full one-third, less than the receipts of last year. The simple announcement of this fact will, we trust, be sufficient to draw forth a more liberal contribution for the ensuing year.

GENEVA COLLEGE.—We publish by request the following extract from a letter to a friend, and beg to call to it the attention of our Episcopal readers:—

* * * * * You will rejoice to learn that Geneva College is indeed and in truth a Church institution—a religious as well as literary establishment of the highest order. When at Geneva a short time since, I attended the morning exercises of the College Chapel at the early hour of six o'clock. The President appeared in his surplice—the white garment so emblematic of purity and peace—and read the morning service of the Church. The young men responded with great apparent fervor and devotion, and the chanting was excellent, though without the organ—a deficiency which is soon to be supplied. But never did the simple strains of the Gregorian melody produce a stronger or more delightful effect upon my feelings. Altogether the scene impressed me with the deepest emotions of joy and thankfulness to God. No Christian parent could have been present without saying to himself—“This is the place for the education of my son; here I am sure, that the daily services of God's holy Church must produce the happiest effect on his mind and affections, and no tongue can tell the inestimable value of such a quiet and peaceful discipline.”

Bishop Butler has somewhere said in substance, that mere talking and preaching and laying down rules and “drawing fine pictures of religion,” are only calculated to sear the conscience and burden the heart, and hence that every system of education which embraces nothing more, is really dangerous to the moral character of the young. Precept and practice must be united together, and it is only the combination of these two elements as it is the combination of the essential elements of the air, which is really invigorating and healthful. Hence in order to lead the young to prayer and to God, we must not rely upon talking and preaching, but we must engage their minds and affections in the positive acts and duties of religion.

And this is just the difference between the College now and what it was before, and between every true system of Christian education and those various systems which generally obtain in the world. Then the young men were told what they ought to do and to be, and there was enough of talking; but now the precept and the practice are united together, and the students are insensibly led to the formation of those blessed habits of thought and action which must grow with their growth and strengthen with their strength. God be praised that a new era has opened upon our College, and the brightest prospect of usefulness is before it. Not Episcopalians only, but all good men of every denomination who revere, as all good men do, the precepts and the practices of our Prayer Book when faithfully carried out, must rejoice with us.—Spirit of the Times.

Pennsylvania.—The Rev. Daniel J. Miller has taken charge of a Mission Station in the Northern part of Spring Garden, in the county of Philadelphia. Post Office address, Philadelphia.

South Carolina.—CONFIRMATION.—This rite was administered on the 1st December, at St. Philip's church, to 27 persons from four of the Congregations in Charleston, S. C., and one of St. John's Parish, Berkeley.

ORDINATION.—At St. Philip's church on the 4th Sunday in Advent, Christopher Philip Gadsden was ordained Deacon, and Rev. Alexander Gregg, Priest—both presented by Rev. Dr. Hancel, who preached the sermon. The Rev. J. B. Campbell concurred with him in the “laying on of hands.”—Ch. Gos. Mess.

Marland.—INSTITUTION.—On Thursday, December 30, the Rev. Richard Clarence Hall was instituted to the Rectorship of St. John's church, Huntingdon, Baltimore county. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Alfred A. Milner, Rector of Mount Airy Church, Baltimore, and the Lessons read by the Rev. Daniel Henshaw, Assistant Minister of St. Peter's church, Baltimore. The Bishop preached from 1 Corinthians, ii. 2. "I determined not to know any among you save Jesus Christ and Him crucified."

CLERICAL CHANGES.—We will hereafter take the liberty of dropping the stereotype phrase often repeated after every notice of clerical change of residence, presuming that all who are informed of a clergyman's whereabouts will "direct his letters and orders accordingly."

The Rev. J. L. Gray has received and accepted an invitation to the rectorship of Christ Church, Manlius, N. Y.

The Rev. John A. Childs, of Lewes, Delaware, has accepted all to St. David's Church, Radnor, Delaware County, Pa. He may soon enter upon his duties.

The Quadruple Tale; or Rabbi Joshua Instructed.

No person," said Rabbi Joshua, "ever conquered me (in any way) except two children,—a little girl and a widow." He then related the following tales:—

1.—THE WISE CHILD.

More than a mile-stone must be consulted in deciding which is the shortest way.

Once on my travels, I came near a town where the road separated to right and left. Not knowing which to take, I inquired of a little boy who happened to be there, which of the two led to the town. "Both," replied he; "but that to the right is short and long—that to the left is long and short." I took that to the right, but had not far advanced, when my progress was stopped by a number of hedges and gardens. Unable to proceed I returned, and asked the little fellow how he could be so sure as to misdirect a stranger? "I did not misdirect thee," replied the boy. "I told thee what is true. But art thou a wise man amongst Israel, and canst not comprehend the meaning of a child?—It is even as I said. This road is the nearest but all the longest, on account of the many obstructions; unless thou wouldst trespass on other people's ground, which I could hardly suppose from so good a man. The other road is, indeed, more distant, but it is, nevertheless, the shortest, being the public road, and may, therefore, be passed without encroaching on other people's property."—I admired his wit, and still more his good sense, and went on.

2.—THE LITTLE BOY.

Impertinent Curiosity Repressed.

Arriving in the city, I met another little boy carrying a covered dish. "What hast thou in that dish, child?" demanded I. "My mother would not have covered it, master, had she been willing that its contents should be known," replied the little wit!—and went on.

3.—THE LITTLE GIRL KIND AND WITTY.

Another time, during my travels, I came near a well where a little girl was drawing water. Being very thirsty, I asked her for a draught. She handed me the pitcher. "Drink," said she, "and when thou hast done, I will draw some for the beast which thou ridest." I quenched my thirst, and the good girl gave some to the poor animal. As I departed, I said, "Daughter of Israel! thou hast imitated the good example of our good mother Rebekah."—"Rabbi," said the little girl, with a smile that indicated the most kindly feelings, and that her reply was a mere play of wit—"Rabbi, if I have imitated the example of Rebekah, thou hast not imitated that of the faithful Eliezer." Kind maiden, thought the Rabbi, thou possessest already more valuable ornaments than the most faithful servant can bestow—Wit, Innocence, and Good Nature. May the Lord continue to bless thee.

4.—THE WIDOW.

Great Learning no cause for want of good manners; or the Widow's Delicate Reproof.

I happened once to take up my lodgings at the abode of a widow. She prepared something for my dinner, which she placed before me. Being very hungry, I ate the whole, without leaving the customary remnant for the servants. The next day I did the same. The third day, my hostess, wishing to make me sensible of the impropriety of my conduct, so over-seasoned the dish that she had prepared for me, that it was impossible to eat it. Ignorant of what had been done, I began to eat; but finding the food so very salty, I laid down the spoon, and made my repast on bread. "Why eatest thou not of what has been prepared for thee?" asked my hostess. "Because I am not hungry," answered I. "If so," rejoined she, "why eatest thou bread? Do people eat that by way of dessert?" But," continued she with a significant smile, "I can perhaps guess thy motive. Thou leavest this for the poor servants, whom thou didst, yesterday and the day before deprive of their due! Is it not so, Rabbi?" I was humbled and acknowledged my fault.

MEDRASH ECHOR.

A Word to Children about Purity of Heart.

(From the Magazine for the Young.)

Beloved little ones,—who have been washed from all your sins in the fountain of baptism, and clothed with the shining garment of salvation, the robe of innocence and righteousness, and to whom a new name, your Christian name, was then given, in token that you were made new creatures in Christ Jesus, and inheritors of that new heaven and new earth spoken of in Revelation xxi,—remember that if you do not learn to cut off and put far from you all sin, and daily to deny yourselves, taking up your cross after the example of your Lord and Saviour, your white garments will soon become defiled in this present evil world; and as a stain upon a white robe shows more sadly than upon any other, so will your sins, if not washed away, appear in the sight of God, and angels and saints; but we are told by an apostle of a way in which we may now be cleansed from our sin: "My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins."

A thoughtful child once learned a useful lesson about this matter from the following trivial circumstance. She had been dressed in a clean white frock to go out upon a visit; and having the misfortune to get it spotted with some ink, which she ought not to have meddled with, she came in some distress to one of the servants to have the stains taken out, which, to her great joy, was soon done with some salt of lemons and hot water; but during this operation the quick eyes of the little girl found out another ugly spot, not black like the ink-stains, but of a yellowish colour, and she asked the servant to take it out too; but it would not come out as the others did, and the servant said it was because it was an old stain, and that fresh ones came out easily, but that when left they turned to iron-moulds, and nothing but boiling them with the salt of lemons would fetch them out. So the little girl who was fond of finding out what she called "pictures of this kind," thought within herself that it was like the difference between being sorry for sin and coming to have it washed away directly, and letting the stain remain until we lose sight of its blackness, and it becomes as it were ingrained and very difficult to remove. And so, dear little ones, I would have you, when you have been so unhappy as to stain your pure white garments, lose no time in seeking to have the stain removed.

LITTLE BOOKHAM, Oct. 14, 1847.

MY LORD,—In discharge of my duty as Chaplain in Ordinary to Her Majesty, I desire to bring under the notice of your Lordship, a member of the Privy Council, and chief adviser of Her Majesty's counsels, a sermon which I have lately seen purporting to have been preached in the Church of St. Andrew, in Rome, by an individual styled Padre Ventura, in honour of the late Daniel O'Connell, Esq., in the presence of all the dignitaries of the Roman Church who could be assembled, and of the Foreign Ambassadors at Rome, which sermon is stated to have been submitted to the approval of the Prince Prelate of Rome, prior to its being preached, and to be published with more than ordinary sanction from His Holiness.

In that sermon, the English Reformation, and the English Church, in which Her Majesty is a communicant, and over the administration of whose laws Her Majesty presides, are denounced in terms of the most rabid and offensive abuse; and in it Her Majesty's uncle, my late master, King George the Fourth, is held up by name to reproach, words of vulgar blasphemy being put into his mouth.

I submit to your Lordship that so gross, wanton, and deliberate an insult offered to Her Majesty, her predecessors on the throne of these realms, and to her religion, the established religion of the country, in the face of all Europe, with the consent and approval of the Prince Prelate of Rome, and now published to the world with the express authority of his Government, calls for some notice on the part of Her Majesty's advisers. I submit to your Lordship that the honour of Her Majesty's Crown, and the dignity of her Empire (to say nothing of the cause of truth), alike forbid that any friendly communications, direct or indirect, be had between Her Majesty's Government and that of His Holiness, the Prince Prelate of Rome, until ample apology, as open as the outrage, shall have been made to Her Majesty and her Empire, by the preacher of the said sermon, at the express command of the Prince Prelate of Rome.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,

Your Lordship's obedient, faithful servant,

ARTHUR PERCEVAL.

Right Honorable Lord John Russell.

ANECDOTE OF A GERMAN FARMER.—In Germany during the war, a captain of cavalry was ordered out upon a foraging expedition. He put himself at the head of his troop, and marched to the quarter assigned him. It was a lonely valley in which one could perceive hardly anything but woods. Finding in the midst of them a small cottage, he approached, and knocked at the door, which was opened by an old and venerable man, with a beard silvered by age. "Father," said the officer, "show me a field where I may set my troop to foraging." The old man complied, and conducting them out of the valley, after a quarter of an hour's march, came to a fine field of barley. "Here is what we are in search of," exclaimed the captain; "Father you are a true and faithful guide." "Wait a few minutes more," replied the old man, "follow me patiently a little further." The march was accordingly resumed, and at the distance of a mile they arrived at another field of barley. The troop immediately alighted, cut down the grain, trussed it, and remounted. The officer then said to his conductor, "Father, you have given yourself and us unnecessary trouble; the first field was better than this." "Very true Sir," replied the good old man, "but it was not mine."—Churchman's Companion.

An English paper mentions the fact that the new Archbishop of York is the son of the late Mr. Peete Musgrave, woolen-draper and tailor, of Cambridge, as affording proof that in the Church of England—the poor man's Church—the highest offices are accessible to the middle and the humble ranks.

A Jewish Tale.

LIBERALITY GROUNDED ON RELIGION NOT TO BE CONQUERED BY REVERSE OF FORTUNE: EXEMPLIFIED IN ABEN-JUDAN.

A man's gift extendeth his possessions, and leadeth him before the great.—Prov. xviii. 15.

Rabbi Eliezer, Rabbi Joshua, and Rabbi Akiba, travelled about annually in the land of Israel to collect money for the poor. Amongst their many and various contributors, none gave more liberally, nor with more cheerfulness than Aben-Judan, who was then in very affluent circumstances. Fortune, however, took a turn. A dreadful storm destroyed the fruits of his grounds; a raging pestilence swept away the greater part of his flocks and herds; and his extensive fields and vineyards became the prey of his greedy and inexorable creditors. Of all his vast possessions, nothing was left him but one small plot of ground. Such a sudden reverse of fortune was enough to depress any ordinary mind. But Aben-Judan, on whose heart the Divine precepts of his holy religion had been early and deeply imprinted, patiently submitted to his lot.

"The Lord," said he, "gave, and the Lord hath taken away—let his name be praised for ever." He diligently applied himself to cultivate the only field he had left, and by dint of great labour, and still greater frugality, he contrived to support himself and family decently; and was, notwithstanding his poverty, cheerful and contented. The year passed on. One evening as he was sitting at the door of his miserable hut to rest from the labours of the day, he perceived the Rabbis coming at a distance. It was then, that his former greatness and his present deplorable condition at once rushed upon his mind; and he felt for the first time the pangs of poverty. "What was Aben-Judan!" exclaimed he; "and what is he now?"—Pensive and melancholy, he seated himself in the corner of his hut. His wife perceived the sudden change—"What ails my beloved?" she asked tenderly; "art thou not well?—tell me, that I may administer to thy relief?" "Would to God it were in thy power—but the Lord alone can heal the wounds which he inflicts," replied the distressed man. "Dost thou not remember the days of our prosperity, when our corn fed the hungry—our fleece clothed the naked—and our oil and wine refreshed the drooping spirit of the afflicted. The orphans came round us and blessed us—and the widow's heart sang for joy. Then did we taste of those heavenly pleasures which are the lot of the good and charitable. But now, alas! we cannot relieve the fatherless, nor him who wants help; we are ourselves poor and wretched. Seest thou not yonder good men coming to make the charitable collection? They will call—but what have we to give them?" "Do not repine, dear husband," rejoined his virtuous wife, "we have still one field left; suppose we sell half of it, and give the money to the use of the poor?"—A beam of joy overspread the good man's countenance. He followed his wife's advice sold half the field, and when the collectors called, he gave them the money. They accepted it, and as they departed, said to him, "May the Lord restore thee to thy former prosperity." Aben-judan resumed his former spirits, and with it his wonted diligence.—He went to plough the small spot of ground still left him. As he was pursuing his work, the foot of the ox that drew the plough-share sunk into the ground, and the beast was maimed. In endeavouring to relieve the animal from its perilous situation, he saw something glittering in the hollow which the foot had made. This excited his attention; he dug the hole deeper, and to his great astonishment and no less joy, found an immense treasure concealed in the very spot. He took it home, removed from the wretched hovel in which he lived, into a very fine house; re-purchased the lands and possessions which his ancestors had left him, and which his former distress had obliged him to sell; and added greatly to them. Nor did he neglect the poor. He again became a father to the fatherless, and a blessing to the unfortunate. The time arrived when the before-named Rabbis came, as usual, to make their collection. Not finding their generous contributor in the place where he had resided the year before, they addressed themselves to some of the inhabitants of the village, and asked them whether they could tell them what had become of Aben-judan, and how he was? "Aben-judan!" exclaimed they, "the good and generous Aben-judan! who is like him in riches, charity, and goodness?—See you yonder flocks and herds? they belong to Aben-judan.—Those vast fields, flourishing vineyards, and beautiful gardens? they belong to Aben-judan. Those fine buildings? they also belong to Aben-judan." Whilst they were thus discoursing, the good man happened to pass that way. The wise men greeted him, and asked him how he did. "Masters," said he, "your prayers have produced plenty of fruit, come to my house and partake of it. I will make up the deficiency of last year's subscription." They followed him to his house, where, after entertaining them nobly, he gave them a very handsome present for the poor. They accepted it, and taking out the subscription list of the preceding year—"See," said they to him, "though many exceeded thee in their donations, yet we have placed thee at the very top of the list, convinced that the smallness of thy gift at that time, arose from the want of means—not from want of inclination. It is to men like thou art, that the wise king alluded, when he said: 'A man's gift extendeth his possessions, and leadeth him before the great.'—Prov. xviii. 16."

MEMORY OF A MOTHER.—John Randolph, some years since, addressed himself to an intimate friend in something like the following:

"I used to be called a Frenchman because I took the French side in politics, and though this was unjust, yet the truth is, I should have been a French Atheist, if it had not been for one recollection, and that was the time when my departed mother used to take my little hand in hers, and cause me on her knees to say, 'Our Father which art in Heaven.'" loan of several small sums from kind and charitable persons of her acquaintance. When her father died, at the end of two years, the debt she had thus contracted amounted to a sum of 500 francs (£20.) With a view of relieving her in her distress, as well as of publicly honouring such exalted and yet modest virtue, the French Academy included Henriette Garden among those persons who, in the year 1827, received the medals their conduct had so nobly earned.

JEANNE JUGAN.

About twenty-five years ago a poor peasant girl of Normandy, named Jeanne Jugan, left her native town of Cancale for the small burg of Saint-Servan, situated on the coasts of Brittany. She had come to Saint-Servan in the hope of finding a situation, and as she bore an excellent character with her, she was not long without one. The mistress of the last family she entered was a singularly pious and benevolent lady, by whose example Jeanne was much benefited, and who was unconsciously the occasion of good, which those who forget the power of faith and charity, even in the most humble instruments, could never have foreseen.

This lady was in the habit of relieving the poor, and of visiting them in their own houses. She was on such occasions frequently accompanied by Jeanne Jugan, on whom the scenes she then witnessed produced a deep and lasting impression. Jeanne naturally possessed a kind and benevolent heart; the sight of poverty or suffering deeply affected her, and immediately inspired her with the wish of administering relief; and in thus going about with her mistress, she not only gratified her benevolent propensities, but also acquired much useful knowledge and experience, by which her after-conduct was regulated. She, moreover, conceived the first idea of a plan, through which she thought that a single individual might effect more good than by the means her mistress adopted, although she could not at the same time conceal from herself that the expense this plan would require was above what her present circumstances would allow. But Jeanne Jugan, who was not of a temper to be deterred by either time or difficulties, resolved to wait patiently for a favourable opportunity of putting her project into execution. This opportunity was not long without offering itself, although it was the source of much grief to Jeanne. She had been living for several years with her mistress, when that excellent person died in 1839.

All those who had known her, and especially the poor, whose benefactress she had been, bewailed her loss; but none, though she said less than any, mourned for her like Jeanne. Her grief, though deep, was not, however, of that nature which incapacitates from exertion; on the contrary, the death of the exalted woman, who had ever set so noble an example to her, inspired her with the courage of which her poverty might have otherwise deprived her. The poor had now lost their best friend; Jeanne felt, therefore, that it was time for her to act. She resolved on the execution of her long-cherished plan; and whilst the heirs of the deceased lady divided her wealth amongst them, she took the noblest legacy her mistress had left—namely, her love of the poor.

Jeanne was too truly charitable to have laid up much money; she, however, owned a small sum, and, by practising rigid economy, she hoped to make it last for some time. For her future support she relied on her industry and on Providence. Having already resolved to enter no more into service, she began looking out for needlework; and was successful in finding some, although the sum she thus earned was very trifling. It may be seen from this that she was indeed poor, and that in the strictest sense of the word; but she was both patient and unwearied, and, moreover, had a strong will of her own, which was not to be shaken by adversity or worldly considerations. Her plan was this—to take into her own house, and maintain some poor helpless creature in need not only of food and shelter, but of proper attendance. If, on trial, she found this plan successful, she meditated taking in another, and, in short, as many as she could afford to keep. This was a bold and hazardous project; but Jeanne's mind was replete with holy faith, and she was not one to allow herself to be deterred from an undertaking because it might possibly fail. And yet what had she to accomplish this? Nothing but the will. What this produced will now be seen.

Her first act was to receive beneath her humble roof a poor old blind woman, who had lately lost, with her aged sister, her only support. Her years and infirmity precluded her from work; a severe winter was drawing on; and she was entirely destitute. What was to become of the poor creature? So everybody said, but none proposed to lend her any assistance, until Jeanne appeared. She had heard of her by chance, and now, seeing her distressed state, she immediately took her home, and cheerfully began her noble task—working for the support of two, as she had hitherto done for that of one. Jeanne could not have chosen a more helpless being to succour than her guest. Not only was the poor woman incapable of the least exertion, but she required to be waited on in a manner which entailed much loss of time, and, consequently, curtailed Jeanne's slender earnings, besides trying her patience in no slight degree. But these were evils which she had anticipated, and to which, since they were unavoidable, Jeanne submitted without a murmur; and far from relaxing in her charitable endeavours, she only the more eagerly sought out another opportunity of doing good, and worked more assiduously than ever to meet the necessary expenses.

It was not long before she heard of an old servant, whose masters had lately died, leaving her destitute. The history of this poor woman deeply moved Jeanne; and indeed it was of a nature to excite both respect and compassion. After having for many years faithfully served her masters whilst they were in affluent circumstances, she had experienced the grief of seeing them suddenly fall into great distress. She had been with them in their prosperous days, and in their misery she would not forsake them. At first she refused to receive any wages; then, as their poverty increased, she forced them to accept of those slender savings she had made in their service; and when even this last resource was exhausted, she had, notwithstanding her years and growing infirmities, worked for their support. But now they were dead, and she remained old, infirm, and alone in the world, thrown on the charity of strangers. Jeanne did not know her; but such a character was too congenial to her own for her to hesitate long about the line of conduct she had best pursue. Moved with pity and admiration, she offered her an asylum in her humble home. The proposal was gratefully accepted, and she now found herself with another guest. Jeanne earned but little, and her house was small enough; but what of that; she firmly believed that since it was on her that those two helpless beings were now dependent, the means of supporting them would not be denied her. Nor was she mistaken. She had more work than she could do; charitable persons assisted her; and although from that time forward her house became the acknowledged asylum of the poor of Saint-Servan, and the number of her guests constantly increased, yet she found room enough for all; nor did they ever, whilst beneath her roof, once lack their daily food.

In Saint-Servan Jeanne was enabled to find ample opportunities of exercising her charitable zeal. Being situated near the sea, this town is chiefly inhabited by fishermen or sailors, and the disastrous accidents so frequent in either mode of life, will but too frequently carry off the head and sole support of a family, by whose death not only a wretched wife and children are left destitute, but also those unfortunate parents who, in their old age and infirmities, had trusted to a son for the support of their declining years. To these unhappy beings Jeanne's house was ever open; indeed such was her hospitality, that it soon became too small; and on the 1st of October, 1841, she was obliged to leave it for a larger one. A month afterwards, her second abode was full; twelve persons had found a shelter in it. But now the whole town began to talk of, and praise the poor servant girl, who had taken on herself so heavy a burden, and who, by means that seemed almost miraculous, succeeded in keeping in food and clothing so large a number of persons. Filled with admiration, and desirous of helping Jeanne in her noble task, the townsmen of Saint-Servan raised a subscription, and with its proceeds purchased a larger house. It was solemnly given to Jeanne, but with the express intimation, that the donation of this house was all she had to expect, and that on her alone rested the responsibility of providing for its inmates—the number of whom she was advised not to increase too much.

On such terms Jeanne accepted of the house, and set about filling it with dependants. To those already on her list, new objects of charity were from time to time added. Jeanne learned one day that an old seaman, seventy-two years of age, had been abandoned by his relations in a damp cellar, where he was lying on a litter of straw, with a few tattered rags for covering, and coarse brown bread for food. She hastened to visit the cellar herself, and found all in the state which had been described. A noisome vapour met her at the entrance; but not discouraged by this, she advanced, and at last perceived, in the surrounding gloom, a human form stretched on a wretched pallet. This was the seaman—a feeble, emaciated old man, broken down by a life of toil and fatigue. He seemed hardly conscious of her presence, and could but faintly thank her for the provisions which, according to her charitable custom, she had brought with her. Jeanne saw, however, that he was not seriously ill, but merely suffering from the want of fresh air and proper food and raiment. She immediately caused him to be removed from the wretched hole in which he was, and conveyed to her own house, where, with proper care, he soon recovered.

A poor lame child, not more than five years of age, suddenly lost her parents, and having no other surviving relations, was left alone on earth. Neither her helplessness, tender years, nor infirmity, could induce any of those around her to receive her, and give her a home to replace that which she had lost. Many of the neighbours were too poor themselves, and already burdened with large families; whilst those who might otherwise have been willing, were deterred by her infirmity. Jeanne alone was moved with compassion for the poor helpless orphan whom all abandoned; she took her home, and adopted her.

Two boys about nine or ten years of age, had fled from Lower Brittany, where their parents lived in great distress. They reached Saint-Servan on a cold winter night, and faint with hunger and fatigue, knocked at the first door they saw, in the hope of finding food and shelter. They were rudely refused, and driven away as thieves and vagabonds, who sought to enter under false pretences. It was in vain that they protested their innocence, relating how misery had compelled them to leave the house of their parents: this statement only procured them everywhere a worse reception. The younger and weaker of the two at length declared that he could go no farther; and although shivering with cold, he sat down on the pavement, and began crying bitterly, whilst his brother vainly endeavoured to comfort him. It was not long before a crowd gathered around them. On learning the cause of their distress, many pitied them; but more blamed them, saying that they had no more than they deserved, for leaving their parents as they had done; but nothing was proposed for their relief; until at last a person, more sensible or humane than the rest, exclaimed, "Let us take them to Jeanne." The suggestion was adopted, and the good Jeanne kindly received the fugitives, and kept them until they were taken back to their father and mother.

A poor girl, aged fourteen, had been abandoned by her parents, who were compelled, for some offence they had committed, to leave Saint-Servan precipitately. Unprotected and alone, she was exposed to every temptation which the unprincipled well know how to lay in the path of poverty and distress. Jeanne came to her aid, and rescued her from vice and misery.

In the town of Saint-Servan a woman, notorious for her bad conduct, had an aged mother, who was afflicted with an ulcer of the worst description. Disgusted with the attendance which this poor woman required, and the expense she occasioned, the unnatural daughter informed her unhappy parent that she would no longer support her; and suiting the action to the words, she immediately proceeded to turn her out of doors. Yet, as though to render a tacit homage to Jeanne's well-known benevolence, this wretched creature took her unfortunate mother before the door of Jeanne Jugan's house, and left her there. She was not mistaken in her anticipations. Jeanne received her.

In this way, the number of Jeanne's dependants increased from twelve to twenty, and finally the number of inmates was sixty-five—almost all infirm and aged persons of both sexes, many of them afflicted with incurable illnesses; and all rescued by Jeanne from the vices, degradation, and misery attendant on beggary—the only resource which was left them when she came to their aid, there being neither poor-houses nor poor-law in France.

Such a noble example was not without its effect. Three persons of Saint-Servan joined Jeanne, to assist her in gratuitously attending on the sick, as well as to help her in the necessary business of such a large establishment. A doctor volunteered his services, and furnished the requisite medicines; in short, Jeanne Jugan has founded a real hospital. It is needless to dwell on the immense benefit which Saint-Servan must derive from it; the fact speaks for itself. But this singular hospital is much more simply administered than any official one. Jeanne employs no supercilious overseers; nor is it necessary to go through dilatory forms and petitioning in order to obtain admittance. If she hears of any sick or distressed person, she immediately sees herself into the truth of the case; and on ascertaining it, has the individual forthwith transported to her house. Such are the wonders achieved in less than six years by the poor servant girl to whom, on the 11th of December 1845, the French Academy awarded a prize of three thousand francs (£120).

St. George's Chapel.—Windsor Castle.

This is perhaps one of the finest creations in the Church Architecture of glorious old England. It has been recently beautified and restored, and although everybody visits Windsor, a sketch of its magnificence and taste has not yet, as I believe, found its way to transatlantic readers. It is of course dedicated to the Order of the Garter, and its modern restoration, as exhibiting a refined taste, makes it beyond comparison the most superb chapel in the kingdom. In size it does not vary much from Grace Church at New York; but its nave is free from pews, and its choir is full of richly carved black oak stalls, those rare ornaments of English cathedrals; and independent of its sculptures and paintings, its fine proportions would alone make it a model of the beautiful pointed Gothic style. The roof is richly groined, on a blue ground, adorned with pendants bearing the royal insignia: the fleur de lis, the Tudor portcullis, the famed Roses, the star and emblems of the Garter, with many escutcheons, all in gold, on varied and beautiful colored emblazon.

The great west window has been cleaned, and you now see, in their perspective, the ancient and beautiful colored glass with the multitude of Knights of the Order, in their full and rich panoply. On the right hand of the west entrance is the exquisite Beaufort Chapel, a niched recess formed under one of the aisle arches, and separated from the nave by a finely wrought and gilt fleur de lis railing. Its roof is grained and ornamented as the nave with gold insignia and family escutcheons. Two long and rich lofty windows light the interior, which has several fine statues and effigies of the family. Their banners hang over the walls, and at the corner near the font stands a well sculptured reading desk or rather "prie secul." Opposite, in a somewhat larger recess, barred by a similar railing, under a beautiful semi-spherical ceiling, richly groined like the nave roof, and lighted by superb lancet windows, and on either side of topaz and amethyst hues, is the font of the Princess Charlotte. Her history, which is too well known to be repeated, is enough to make her last resting-place famous. In the back ground, the disposed curtains of the tomb, so broad and richly folded, that it needs reflection to believe them marble, show the archway from the life size figure of the princess is rising. Her shroud is thrown back in graceful folds; transport is on her face; her right hand points upwards, the left extended behind, as if about taking flight from poor mortality. Indeed the whole figure is instinct with the vigor of the New Life. On each side of the figure of the Princess, is a kneeling angel, looking up to her in deep interest. At her foot lies her enshrouded mortal body, over which, in the foreground, two mourning figures are weeping. Although they are likewise completely enshrouded, their position and sculpture are perfect in expression. The serene bliss in the countenance of the Princess, the affectionate welcome of the angels, contrasted with the poor remnants of mortality, make that breathing marble a beautiful embodiment of the Christian's trust of immortality. The whole group is of the life size, and the work of Sir James Wyatt. Some may find fault with these fine sculptures, and argue that if the design is the ascension of a disembodied spirit, its plastic representation is impossible; but on such a theory, the ordinary figure of an angel is equally inconsistent; or it might be further argued that if the sculptor's purpose was to present the resurrection, the mortal accessories might be rather an anachronism; however, such speculations will not disturb the mind when in the presence of the creation of the sculptor.

But leaving these funereal chapels, walk up the nave itself, under its great arches, so rich in gold and blazonry, and so rarely proportioned, lighted by the over crossed and mingled reflection of those superb stained windows, does it not bring back upon the mind that glorious chapel in the undying story of St. Agnes' Eve? Before you is the choir screen of rare and delicate iron work, supporting the organ and its gallery, a forest of carving in black oak: and then the choir itself! All around are the carved and canopied stalls of the knights of the order, from the sovereigns down; over each are hung the crown or coronet, the helm or hanberk and the banner of the occupant, the banners bearing many names which have filled a large field in England's story. In the central aisle is the royal vault, where the worms mock at the majesty of anointed kings. Over the altar table is West's famed painting of the Last Supper, and behind this, the great East Window, in solemn full tints, presents the Transfiguration. Above the altar table, on the left wall of the choir, are two close screened and windowed, and in similar black oak carving, the other intended for the queen and her attendants. The roof of the choir is in the same style of rich ornament as the nave, its windows are finely stained after the antique, and there are side chapels, containing some fine monuments. In the right aisle, at the South corner of the altar screen, is a restoration of antiquity, well executed, and, perhaps, not out of taste. A folio black letter Bible is chained in a niche! underneath is an inscription, in the same old character, that "the Bishop of Evesbury placed this Bible here for godly meditation, and whosoever shall read it aright shall have forty days' pardon therefor!" and further down in the same aisle, protected by a glass screen, are some curious paintings of the era of Henry VIII., representing the meeting at the Field of the Cloth of Gold. Whilst I was in the chapel, the organ, which is esteemed as one of the best in England, commenced playing, and the finely trained choir sang the anthem, "O, go your way unto his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise!" They were practising for the evening service, and their united harmonies accorded well with the pomp and beauty of the building.

Westminster Abbey, so full as it is of the best efforts of the intellect, and the best memories of the history of the land, is, in architectural ornaments, the faded model of this chapel, and whoever is fond of the grand proportions, the long drawn aisles, and the once rich ornaments of the old Abbey, will find his taste highly gratified in this modern restoration of the splendor of the old style.

Rural Excursion—Preaching the Word.

Having circulated notice of an appointment some distance in the country, the missionary left Little Rock on the afternoon of Friday, and crossing the turbid and shrunken Arkansas, then at its lowest stage, soon found himself driving swiftly through the dense woodlands which cover "the bottoms." The scenery around possessed much novelty, being such as the eye of an eastern man is unaccustomed to gaze upon. The density of the forest, peculiarity of its timber, and incidents by the way, bespoke that the visitor was entering upon what was to him a terra incognita, now first brought to light by exploration. The most common and remarkable tree is the Cotton-wood; the Pecan also, and the Sassafras, several times the size attained eastward, attract attention. The first named is of great altitude and immense compass, being some feet in diameter, towering in the air, with its dark green foliage. It is found chiefly on lands of alluvial formation, being the first growth which springs up in such localities. Its giant limbs are often circled by grape vines, on the same mammoth scale which seems to characterize every production of this rich soil. As the traveller approaches, he will see them hung in immense steeple-like forms, sometimes directly over head, as though they would catch him and vehicle in their embrace, and swing the whole into mid-air. What a fine country this is for the culture of the grape, and how much better it would be for those foreign emigrants who are skilled in that business, to settle here, and devote their attention to it as a means of livelihood, than to seek the bleak regions of the north-west. The undergrowth is beginning to disappear, cropped out by the cattle; yet, as you recede from the city, the jungle of cane-break is found pretty dense, containing plenty of bears and wolves secreted within its recesses. There is an abundance of deer; and as we proceeded, we would occasionally have a glimpse of one displaying its beautiful form as it bounded across the road; while flocks of wild fowl, aroused at our approach, would rise with merry cackle and rustling wing, and flutter away before us.

At dusk we reached the hospitable abode of a member of the Episcopal Church, scarcely realizing the distance we had come, so much had the attractions of the drive beguiled the time. The next morning we saw more of the country in a horse-back excursion through the neighbourhood, visiting its inhabitants and distributing tracts and newspapers. It is a level region, sparsely peopled, with some fine cotton plantations, and intersected with bayous, singular channels into which, as the Arkansas becomes swollen, its water rises. These are often as straight and regular as if they were works of art—canals made to connect the interior with the river. Occasionally, these bottoms have been to a considerable extent submerged. Such disasters are, however, rare, and at long intervals; and there are positions which have never been reached by the water. The country is esteemed unhealthy, and hence settlers prefer locating on the high lands; which are mostly sterile, with a stunted growth of pine and oak. But of late the prejudice on this score is being overcome by the tempting nature of these fertile low grounds, and planters are clearing and putting the lands in cotton, under the impression that in this latitude that staple is subject to fewer casualties than farther south. However this may be, it requires none of the sagacity of a prophet to foresee that the day will arrive, when these fine alluvial bottoms will be duly appreciated, and, protected by levees, be put in extensive cultivation.

There are a few families of the church residing here, who belong to the congregation at Little Rock; but we learned that their solemn services had never been performed in the vicinity. Hence, we looked with some anxiety to the developments of the morrow; and, through the goodness of God, a clearer firmament and brighter sun never welcomed a people to the sanctuary of the Most High. As the hour approached, the settlers for many miles around were in motion to the neat and substantial edifice in the grove, used jointly as a school-house and chapel. Although mid-summer, the air was bland, a breeze tempering its ardour. The missionary thanked God for these circumstances favourable toward the exercise of his vocation; and, after the ritual, preached morning and afternoon to an interesting and attentive congregation as he was ever privileged to meet anywhere. The responses were made, and the singing, performed by a choir organized but a short time before, although faltering at first, swelled forth on a second trial into a strain of melody seldom, perhaps, heard in these wilds. The text in the morning was the parable of the sower, it being thought appropriate to the occasion and audience. We scarcely ever realized so much the obligation of the ministry, and the necessity of speaking the word in all plainness, and with holy unction, as a dying man to perishing sinners. Nor, in bidding adieu to these strangers, could the spiritual husbandman be devoid of much solicitude about the seed he had in feebleness striven to sow in their hearts. He feared, indeed, that many, after the usual folly of the world, would not believe, proving barren, way-side hearers; he apprehended that others would "fall away" after a temporary false hope, a transient joy; and again, that some would prove lukewarm, entangled with beguiling cares and temptations: yet, he cherished the comfortable, fond hope, that at least a share would be true fruit-yielding Christians, and finally, at the general consummation of all things be gathered into the garner of the Lord.

The evening was closed with prayer, and the next morning, accompanied by the visitors who had stayed over night, and some of the family, we extended our ride to the residence of Mr. D., on Bear-Skin Lake. Here for a season we almost forgot that we were in the far west, being surrounded by circumstances which recalled the style of living and husbandry of the best class of eastern farmers. A New York family had converted the wilderness into a paradise, bringing all the skill and appliances of the Empire State to operate on the virgin soil of a spot most felicitously chosen for beauty and luxurious retirement. The dwelling is on the margin of a small lake of singular attraction. Fish swarm beneath its waters, wild fowl skin its silvery surface, otter take up their abode in its banks, while odoriferous flowers, springing from the very bottom on lengthy stems, impregnate the air with their delicate fragrance, and regale the eye with their variegated hues. The latter objects alone would richly repay a visit; they are the White Pond Lily and the Monocha-nut, a rare flower, highly esteemed by the Indians. We regret that our limited knowledge of botany forbids an attempt at description. There was altogether something so romantic in the scenery about us,—a feeling heightened by the associations it awakened,—that we were lost in a delightful reverie of thought. We imagined we could yet see the canoes of the red man moving swiftly on the smooth expanse of water before us, and hear his whoop ring through the forest near by. We could indeed, have lingered here for a length of time, gazing on the beauties of nature, and participating in the innocent sports of rural life, had not parochial duty called us, reluctant, away.

After some days rustication, hoping that what had been said in public and from house to house, was not in vain in the Lord, refreshed and invigorated by the excursion, we returned to our parish to welcome the familiar faces, and exchange the cordial greetings of kind friends.

St. Gabriel's Church, Morlatton, Berks County, Penna.

Whether a history of our Diocese is at present desirable may be questioned. But that it will be called for at some future period cannot be doubted. All that may be necessary at present is to collect and lay by the requisite material. This material from which may hereafter be digested an authentic Diocesan Record, is to be found mainly in the Registers of the several Parishes. A brief sketch of the rise and progress of each congregation, would furnish the best means for a full record of the whole.

It was with the intention of doing his part toward the attainment of this end, that the writer drew up the following sketch of the past history of St. Gabriel's Church, Morlatton.

The name of this church, and of the village in which it stands, now generally called Douglassville, are both said to have been adopted by the early settlers in memory of the congregation with which they were connected, and of the town or district in which they lived in their native land. The congregation when first organized was composed principally of Swedes. When and under what circumstances they assembled for public worship during the early years of the settlement cannot now be ascertained. For a time it is probable no parish record was kept, and the first Register has unfortunately been lost. In the earliest register now to be found it appears that for some years, they were dependent for occasional services upon the ministers of Weccaco and Providence, or Perkiomen churches, a grateful acknowledgement of whose kindness is entered upon the minutes. Of these two parishes, the first was composed entirely of Swedes, and was for many years supplied with pastors from Sweden. The other St. James, Perkiomen, consisted chiefly of English and Welsh, whose ministers were clergymen of the Church of England.

Besides the ministers from abroad who officiated for the congregation, at Morlatton occasionally, one native Swede was settled among them as Pastor. This was the Rev. Gabriel Falck, who was minister of the church from 1735 to 1746.

Under his ministry the congregation erected their first place of worship.

When the Swedish settlements ceased to be regarded as missionary stations by the church and government of their fatherland, the several congregations found it necessary to take measures for procuring pastors from some other quarter. In this emergency, they would naturally seek for ministers whose views in regard to doctrine, worship any discipline, were similar to their own. The Swedish Lutheran Church, as is well known, is Episcopal in government, Reformed in doctrine, and Liturgical in its mode of worship. In all these respects there was uniformity between the church of Sweden and the church of England. Hence when the supply of ministers from the former failed, their next resort was to the latter. In the course of a few years after their connection with the mother country was dissolved, all the Swedish congregations in this and the neighbouring states, called and obtained as pastors ministers of the Episcopal church. Among these was the congregation at Morlatton. Their next pastor after the removal of the Rev. Gabriel Falck, was the Rev. Alexander Murray, D. D., missionary of the church of England. He came out under the auspices of the venerable society, for the Propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts, and brought with him as a donation from the society, a small but valuable Parish library.

These books consisting of standard works in divinity are still in a good state of preservation. Besides St. Gabriel's church he had under his care the church at Reading, then called St. Mary's. For sixteen years he continued among his people, laboring faithfully in preaching the word, and administering the sacraments. During the Revolutionary war, the influence of Mr. Murray, was so much impaired, and his position rendered so unpleasant by the prevailing spirit of hostility to the government and church of England, that the vestry at his desire petitioned the Executive Council of the state for permission for his return to England. The petition having been favorably received, and the necessary permission granted, he departed for his native land in the year 1778. After the war he returned, and again taking charge of the congregation, he continued his ministry among them until his death. He died in Philadelphia, during the prevalence of the yellow fever, and was one of the many victims of that fatal disease.

The number of the Rev. Dr. Murray's successors is eleven, of whom several remained but a short time. Those whose connection with the church continued a longer period are as follows:

The Rev. John Armstrong took charge in the year 1801, and remained for three years. Under his ministry the present stone church was erected.

The Rev. Levi Bull began to officiate at Morlatton, in the year 1805, and continued his work of faith, and labor of love, with great success and acceptance for the space of twenty years.

In the year 1828, the Rev. George Mintzer received an invitation to the pastoral care of this Parish, and for eight years ministered here faithfully, zealously proclaiming the truth, and imparting the consolations of the blessed Gospel.

After the removal of the Rev. G. Mintzer the congregation was made to feel the ill effects of frequent changes. During intervals of several years continuance the church was closed, and yet including these intervals there were in the course of eight years no less than four ministers that successively came and went. Owing to these frequent changes, to the consequent want of pastoral oversight, and to increasing ignorance of the peculiar principles of the church, many baptized members both old and young wandered off to the surrounding sects. When it is considered that there are recorded in the Parish Register, the names of no less than eleven hundred persons baptized, many of whom are still living, it might be supposed that the congregation here would be large under the least favorable circumstances. But this was not the case. The cause of the lamentable falling away has been already mentioned, and experience proves that where a people grow up or are suffered to remain without instruction, in the distinctive principles of the church, there we can look for no lasting prosperity. We like not the liberalism which separates between things revealed. If the church system be scriptural, as we conscientiously believe with due regard to the "analogy of faith," it should be explained and enforced in all its parts. The least informed are able under judicious teaching to acquire firmness in the profession of the old faith. Indeed many are anxious to know what reason to give for the difference in doctrine and discipline which distinguishes us from others. If left destitute of such instruction it should excite no surprise that proselytes are made to the systems of yesterday from the ranks of our baptized members.

But though the very existence of the congregation at Morlatton, was for a time seriously endangered through the causes above mentioned, the day was coming when there would be a strengthening of the things that remained. In the Providence of God a minister was sent, young and inexperienced, to labor among them as his first charge.

The congregation, though at first small, has gradually increased. They have the hearing ear, and in an encouraging measure, the understanding heart. The Prayer Book is devoutly used, and by many sincerely loved. Many children have been baptized, and not a few persons confirmed. The number of communing members is seventy. Within the bounds of the congregations there were during the past summer, three Sunday Schools in which many children received instruction in the Scriptures and Catechism. There appears to be on the part of many individuals a growing interest in the truths of our holy faith, and an increasing attachment to the distinctive principles of the church. Where there exists this scriptural combination, an earnest adherence to doctrine as revealed, and to discipline as revealed, there and there only can we look for permanent prosperity. That the truth may here, and elsewhere prevail, to the breaking down the kingdom of sin, Satan and death, and to the final triumph of evangelic doctrine, and apostolic order, is the hearty prayer of him who in the Providence of God, has been called to labor in this portion of our beloved Zion.

The insertion in your columns, of the following remarks and the incident which prompts them, will confer a favour on many of your readers. They are designed to illustrate the vast importance of seamen, as missionaries to foreign nations, and to enlist in their behalf that sympathy, which exists in the hearts of all Christians, and which only requires to be told "that a brother hath need" to call forth its latent energies. The religious destitution of seamen, its consequent effect upon this valuable class of men themselves, and the monstrous stumbling block which it casts in the way of those who are striving to convert the Heathen, are fruitful topics of meditation, prayer and active exertion on the part of the Church. "The Churchman's Missionary Association for Seamen" of this port, has been organ-

With several other Publications claiming attention we have only room at present for the following notice sent by a valued correspondent. The work referred to, we have not yet seen, but from the character of the author, as well as from the following favorable judgment of one whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect we are confident that these "essays" will secure the regard of all who feel the deep importance of the subject they discuss.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I have read with great satisfaction a small pamphlet entitled "Two Essays on the Two Witness principle" by the Rev. Robert B. Croes, which I beg leave to commend to the attention of the readers of the "Banner." The argument on the contested point to which the pamphlet relates, appears to me to be entirely conclusive. And as it involves a very important principle in our ecclesiastical jurisprudence, I should like to see it generally spread before the Church. The pamphlet, I understand, has been left for sale, at the Book stores in Philadelphia, and New York, and from the conviction I entertain of its value, I trust this brief notice, may have the effect to secure to it many purchasers.

AMICUS ECCLESIE.

SELF DISCIPLINE, A Sermon before the Associate Alumni of the General Theological Seminary—by John Murray Forbes, D. D., Rector of St. Luke's Church, New York.

This able sermon discusses in an earnest and forcible manner a most important practical subject. We have marked some passages for future insertion which will show its character better than words of our's can do.

Foreign Intelligence.

The Church of England (says the English Churchman) is at present threatened with three very serious aggressions, which will require all the wisdom, energy and piety of her faithful members to ward off:—1. The introduction of Dr. Hampden to the Episcopate. 2. The erection of Sees in England for Roman Catholic Bishops. 3. The Admission of Jews to Parliament. Apart from the principle involved in it, the last is evidently of the least practical importance; but of the first two, we confess ourselves unable and unwilling to decide which has the greatest claim upon our attention, or which would most seriously interfere with the permanent welfare of the Church.

On the second point we quote the following able article from the English Churchman, involving principles which nearly concern us.

The further encroachments of the English Romanists which are threatened at the present time, lead us to make a few remarks on their very peculiar position. We see a body of men amongst us, who profess to act upon Ecclesiastical principles, and yet they keep aloof from the communion of the English Church. Now, by the sixth Canon of the Œcumenical Council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, it is declared that those are heretics "who, while they pretend to confess to sound faith, have separated themselves, and made congregations contrary to our Canonical Bishops."

It is admitted by both parties that there cannot lawfully be two Bishops in possession of the same Diocese; and that, if one be in canonical possession, the other must be guilty of usurpation. The question, therefore, to be decided is this: which of the two rival communions possesses canonical Bishops? And the inquiry must be pursued on the ordinary principles of Church discipline. The early Christians, in a case of this kind, would have traced upwards the succession of Bishops to Apostles or Apostolic men, and if one party could not prove unbroken descent from the original Pastors of the country, they would have given the verdict in favour of their opponents. As Tertullian says, (De Præscrip., adv. Hæres., c. 32.)—

Edant ergo origines ecclesiarum suarum; evolant ordinem Episcoporum suorum, ita per successiones ab initio decurrentem, ut primus ille episcopus aliquem ex apostolis vel apostolicis viris, qui tamen cum apostolis perseveraverit, habuerit auctorem et antecessorem; hoc enim modo Ecclesiæ apostolicæ sensus suos deferunt.

Let this test of Apostolicity be applied to the case before us. The hierarchy of our Church are the representatives, by uninterrupted succession, of the ancient Bishops who flourished in England centuries before the Reformation; the English Romanists, on the contrary, have no pretension to this continuity: when they first gained a distinct existence in England, they made no attempt to perpetuate Episcopacy, and thus tacitly admitted their irregular position.

In my first letter (says Dr. Milner to Sir John Throckmorton, Ecclesiastical Democracy detected, p. 121, London, 1793) I make a necessary and obvious distinction between a perfect and an imperfect Church, between one that was actually formed and another that was only in a state of germination; in short, between an establishment and a mission. I showed that we were in the latter of these predicaments, having entirely lost the succession of Bishops at the Reformation, &c.

Nothing, surely, can be clearer than the above testimony of the author of "The end of Controversy."

How this state of things came about we shall give in the words of another equally unexceptionable witness, Mr. Charles Butler, (Rom. Cath. II., 219.)—

Watson, Bishop of Lincoln, the last of the Roman Catholic Bishops who had not become Protestant at the Reformation, died in 1584. In 1598 the English Roman Catholic Church was placed under the jurisdiction of an Arch-Priest (Blackwell) vested with full authority over the Clergy, but unable to perform any functions, as he was not a Bishop. The Roman Catholics of England justly remonstrated against this, as being virtually deprived of the benefits of Episcopacy. In 1623, a Vicar-Apostolic (Dr. Bishop) was first appointed. This is an officer vested with Episcopal authority by the Pope over any Church which is in want of a Bishop, but which for some reason cannot have one of its own; the Bishop is consecrated to some See, in partibus infidelium, which had formerly a Bishop, but has now no Church. The real difference between a Bishop of a See and a Vicar-Apostolic is, that the commission of the latter is only during the Pope's pleasure.

This, it appears, the Romanists do not like, so they wish for a change. But there is also another stronger reason. These Vicars-Apostolic, being consecrated to some See in partibus infidelium, of course take the name of that See, whatever it may be. Hence Dr. Wiseman is called Bishop of Melipotamos. But where is Melipotamos? It is supposed to be in Ethiopia. Why, then, does not Dr. Wiseman go and look after his flock in Ethiopia? Above all, why does he come here to divide the Church, and set up altar against altar? These questions are so difficult to be answered, and the Vicars-Apostolic have become so much ashamed of their anomalous position, that, it is said, they have got the Pope's permission to change their delusive titles of Melipotamos, Siga, Chalcedon, &c., to Westminster, Bath, Birmingham, &c.

Now, the inference from the establishment of an Archbishopric with metropolitan privileges within the Province of Canterbury must unavoidably be, that it is intended thereby to deny to the Primate of all England any rightful possession of metropolitan jurisdiction within the limits of the assumed Archbishopric; and the erection of the City of Westminster within the already existing Diocese of London into an Episcopal See, amounts to a denial that there is a lawful Bishop of London, according to the canons and usages of the Church. According to her general rule, there can neither be two Metropolitans of one Province, nor two Bishops of one Diocese. The one of these proceedings would involve a reversal of the Canons of the Church, the other a contradiction of the ordinance of her Lord. The heads of the Romish Church are perfectly aware of the truth of these assertions. Their present proceeding is therefore an act of direct and purposed hostility towards the English Church; since it could not be ventured upon by them, except they meant thereby to proclaim that we have no Canonical Bishops, no Catholic Church, no such administrations of the Holy Sacraments among us as shall be effectual to everlasting salvation.

That any intelligent Romanist—candidly examining the historical records of the English Church, and taking the principles of the Primitive Church as his guide—will feel himself justified, before God and man, in adopting this view, we will not for a moment believe. But will the temporal head of the Church—will the Lords Spiritual and Temporal—will the Commons of this Realm, allow Roman Catholic Bishops to set up Sees in England, and thus confound and mislead the ignorant? If so, the so-called union between Church and State is at an end—the Coronation Oath is a dead letter—the Royal Supremacy a farce: there is "a clear stage and no favour," for all parties.

But we solemnly protest against any such flagrant breach of faith; and we earnestly call upon all who recognize and appreciate the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, to bestir themselves, during the recess of Parliament, and, in conjunction with their Bishops, to show by every means in their power, that they are determined to prevent the un-Catholic, uncanonical, and schismatical intrusion of Roman Catholic Bishops into English Sees which is now threatened.

DR. HAMPDEN.

The English Church papers are so filled with articles and discussions on this important question that we hardly know what extracts to make. As giving information which many are desirous of obtaining, and as a somewhat curious illustration of an "election" we give the following account of the way in which they elect Bishops in England.

DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE PRESENT METHOD OF "ELECTING" BISHOPS IN ENGLAND.—I. The congé d'élire, or license issued by the Sovereign to the Dean and Chapter of a Cathedral Church to choose a Bishop in the time of a vacancy. It runs to the effect, "that the See of A. having become vacant by the death or translation of the late Bishop thereof, the King [or Queen] has been pleased at the humble request of the Dean and Chapter to grant them his [or her] Royal license to proceed to the election of another Pastor in the place of him so removed, charging them by the faith and love wherewith they are bound to him [or her] that they should choose such an one for their Bishop and Pastor as should be devoted to God and faithful and useful to him [or her] and to the Kingdom."

II. THE LETTER MISSIVE.—To the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of A. "Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas the Bishopric of A. is at present void by the death [or translation] of the Right Reverend Father in God Dr. B. C., late Bishop there, we let you weet (know) that for certain considerations us at this present moving, we of our princely disposition and zeal being desirous to prefer unto the same See a person meet thereunto, and considering the virtue, learning, wisdom, and other the good gifts wherewith the Reverend D. E. Doctor in Divinity is endued. We have been pleased by these our Letters to Name and recommend him unto you to be elected and chosen to the said Bishopric of A. Wherefore we require you upon the receipt hereof to proceed to your election according to the laws of this our realm and our congé d'élire herewith sent unto you, and the same election so made to certify unto us under your common seal. Given under our sign, &c.

III. CITATORY LETTER to the several members of the Chapter requiring their attendance at the "election," intimating that:—"In the Quire of the said Cathedral Church they intend on the of to proceed to the election of a new Bishop and Pastor of , and at the same hour and place to proceed in the whole business of the said election with all its incidents, emergencies, and dependencies, whatsoever, until the final despatch, of the said election as, God willing, we ought to proceed."

IV. RECORD of this "election" in the Chapter Register.—"At which day, hour, and place, immediately after Morning Prayer, the Reverend Dean and Chapter of the said Church did in the south Chapel of the said Church (his [or her] Majesty's royal license of congé d'élire and letter recommendatory for choosing another Bishop being first read) with one assent and consent elect unto the said See the Rev. —, and by them so elected Bishop of A. did openly and solemnly declare in the body of the said Church before all the people there."

V. CERTIFICATE OF THE ELECTION TO THE KING (OR QUEEN).—"We the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of A. by virtue and authority of your Majesty's royal license most graciously made and granted for electing another Bishop of the said Cathedral Church, being capitularly assembled in the said Cathedral Church and there making Chapter, (saving to ourselves all the privileges that ought to be saved with regard to the said election, as well by the laws of this our famous Kingdom of Great Britain as by the ancient and laudable customs of our said Cathedral Church,) and having MATURELY AND SERIOUSLY CONSIDERED of a person meet to be elected thereto, at length we have unanimously agreed to elect the person recommended in the above Letter Missive."

VI. ADDRESS TO THE DEAN AND CHAPTER TO THE PERSON "ELECTED" HIS CONSENT.—"We the Dean and Chapter of A. &c., which said day of being come, AND PRAYERS TO ALMIGHTY GOD BEFORE ALL THINGS HUMBLY OFFERED UP, we capitularly assembled did according to the Statutes and Ecclesiastical laws of the famous Kingdom of Great Britain canonically proceed to the election aforesaid in manner and form following, to wit:

FIRST, after mature and serious consideration had between ourselves concerning a fit and proper person in that behalf to be elected, (and saving to ourselves all the privileges that ought to be saved with regard to the said election, as well by the laws of this our famous Kingdom of Great Britain as by the ancient and laudable customs of our said Cathedral Church,) we did at length agree to give our votes for you," &c., &c., &c.

The following admirable document will be read with deep interest.

The following Memorial deserves all the prominence which we can give to it: it is an historical document—

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

May it please your Majesty,—We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subject, John Merewether, Doctor in Divinity, Dean of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, most humbly lay before your Majesty the assurances of our deepest and most heartfelt attachment to your Majesty's sacred person and government.

We thank your Majesty for having graciously granted to us your Royal license to elect a Bishop of our Church, in the place of the Right Rev. Father in God, Thomas, late Bishop thereof, and for "requiring and commanding us, by the faith and allegiance by which we stand bound to your Majesty, that we elect SUCH A PERSON AS MAY BE DEVOTED TO GOD, and useful and faithful to your Majesty and your kingdom."

We also dutifully recognize the goodness of your Majesty in accompanying this your Royal license with letters missive, graciously announcing to us that out of "your princely disposition and zeal you are desirous," as we cannot doubt, "to prefer unto the same See a person meet thereunto."

And we further acknowledge your Majesty's gracious intention towards us in "NAMING and RECOMMENDING unto us," by the same letters missive, Dr. Renn Dickson Hampden, your Majesty's Reader in Theology in your University of Oxford, to be by us "ELECTED and CHOSEN unto the said Bishopric."

But we most humbly beseech your Majesty to permit us, as in duty bound, and in obedience to your Majesty's gracious command touching the qualities of the person to be chosen by us, to represent (and, if it be deemed necessary, by sufficient documents to prove), that somewhat more than eleven years ago the said Dr. Renn Dickson Hampden, then being the late King William's Reader of Theology, the said University did, as by its laws, rights, and privileges, and by the law of the land it is empowered, and on fit occasion bound to do, judge of the published writings of the said Dr. Hampden, and did solemnly decree, and by a statute in its House of Convocation duly made did enact, that the said Dr. Hampden should be deprived of certain weighty functions importing the right of judging of sound teaching and preaching of God's Word, which had been specially annexed by former statutes of the said University to his office therein; to wit, "that he be in the number of those by whom are appointed the select preachers before the University,"—and, further, that his counsel be taken in case of any preacher being called (as by the statutes of the said University every preacher who may have delivered any unsound or suspected doctrine in any of his preachings, is liable to be called) into question before the Vice-Chancellor. And such deprivation of Dr. Hampden was expressly declared in the said statute to have been decreed, "because in his said published writings he has so treated matters theological, that in this respect the University hath no confidence in him."

Furthermore, six years afterwards, the Convocation of the said University having been called together to consider the question of the fitness of repealing the said statute, so that the said Dr. Hampden might be restored to the functions of which he had been as aforesaid deprived, the said Convocation did thereupon solemnly decree that the statute should not be repealed, but should still be (and, accordingly, it still continues to be) in full force and vigour; whereby the said Dr. Hampden stands to this day denounced by the judgment of the said University as "devoid altogether of its confidence in matters theological, by the reason of the manner in which those matters have been treated by him in his published writings."

And here we deem it our duty to your Majesty, humbly to submit, that not only by the people and Church of England, but by all your Majesty's Royal predecessors, the solemn decisions of either of your Majesty's Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, on questions and matters of theology have always been deemed to carry with them very high authority, and that such is the renown of these your Majesty's famous Universities throughout the reformed portion of Christendom, that everywhere their judgment is heard with reverence and honour.

Neither may we omit dutifully to lay before your Majesty, that the office of a Bishop, to which we are commanded by your Majesty to choose "a person meet to be elected," essentially adjoins the duty of judging of the doctrine of the Clergy committed to his charge, especially of those who are to be instituted or licensed by him to the cure of souls—which high duty the University of Oxford has decreed, as aforesaid, that Dr. Hampden is, in its judgment, unfit to have confided to him; the distressing and disastrous consequences which must be expected to result from placing the Diocese of Hereford, by the strong and of power, under a person so characterized by so high authority, we are as unwilling as it would be painful to recount.

For all these reasons, and not least because, in common as we believe, with almost every considerate Churchman, we are desirous and anxious that the prerogative of the Crown in nominating to Bishoprics should be for ever established on its only firm foundation,—the confidence of the Church in the wisdom, the justice, the purity, the considerate and conscientious moderation with which it is exercised;—we most humbly pray your Majesty to name and recommend some other person whom your Majesty shall think meet to be elected by us for our Bishop, or that your Majesty will graciously relieve us from the necessity of proceeding to the election till you shall have been pleased to submit Dr. Renn Dickson Hampden's published writings (so judged as aforesaid by the Convocation of the University of Oxford) to the judgment either of the two Houses of Convocation of Clergy of the Province of Canterbury, which is now sitting, or of the Provincial Council of Bishops of the same Province, assisted by such divines as your Majesty or the said Provincial Council shall be pleased to call, or of some other competent tribunal which your Majesty shall be graciously pleased to appoint. In order whereunto we have appointed for the day of election the 28th day of December instant, being the eleventh day from the receipt of your Majesty's congé d'élire, and the last which we can lawfully appoint.

And we are the more emboldened to lay this our humble supplication at the feet of your Majesty by your known cordial attachment to our holy and Apostolic Church, and by your faithful and uniform observance of the oath made by your Majesty at your coronation,—“That you will maintain and preserve to the utmost of your power the doctrine, discipline, and government thereof.”

And even if it could be imagined that these last-mentioned considerations apply not to our case, we should nevertheless confidently rely on your Majesty's experienced regard for that dearest and most sacred right of every class and description of your subjects, the right of liberty of conscience, and on your saving at the head of your Majesty's councils a noble lord, the proudest boast of whose illustrious house, as well as of his own public life, it hitherto has been to assert that right for all men against all opponents—a right which would in our persons be trampled to the very dust, if, in spite of all our just and reasonable reclamations, we be coerced under the threatened penalties of præmunire to elect for our Bishop a person whom we cannot conscientiously believe, so long as the aforesaid judgment stands against him, to be “meet to be elected” to that most holy office.

In conclusion, we would add our fervent prayer, as well as our most earnest hope that your Majesty may long be permitted by the King of Kings to reign in the hearts of all your subjects the approved “Defender of the Faith,” “ruling all estates and degrees of men amongst us, whether ecclesiastical or temporal,” as is your sacred and undoubted right,—giving alike to all experience of the blessings of your just and beneficent Government, and receiving from all the willing homage of grateful and confiding love.

In witness whereunto we have affixed our decanal seal this 17th day of December, in the year of our Lord, 1847.

In connection with this the following speech of the Bishop of Rochester in the House of Lords deserves attention.

The Bishop of Rochester.—In the absence of so many of the right rev. Prelates more accustomed than myself to address your lordships, I feel called upon to make a few observations upon this subject. I have filled the office of Bishop for thirty-four years, and during that period I have enjoyed the friendship of at least sixty Bishops, and I must say that it was with very deep regret that I heard the determination which had been expressed in reference to the appointment in question. I believe that determination has been founded on very erroneous grounds, because in the answer given to the Bishops, as well as in that given to the lay members of the Church, the noble lord who wrote them seemed to have entertained the mistaken belief that the opposition had arisen from a certain portion of the Church to which he referred. I can positively state that this is not the case. There is no person more opposed than I am to what are called tractarian principles, and in my own Diocese, comprehending upwards of 600 Clergymen, the feeling is almost unanimous in opposition to those who are supposed to entertain extreme opinions in the Church. In one district 103 Clergymen assembled, all having different views, and yet there were only two dissentients to the address which was agreed to. That address was moved by a person supposed to have tractarian views, and seconded by one supposed to entertain evangelical views. Therefore, I think that the noble lord is deceived in this respect. I believe the noble lord has acted from conscientious motives, and I have a great respect for the noble lord personally, but I regret the determination to which he has come. We are told that the congé d'élire is issued. This may be true. I do not know what course the Dean and Chapter of Hereford may adopt. They may possibly decline the election, and in that case Her Majesty has the power of creating the Bishop. Therefore, whether they elect or not is only matter of importance as far as regards the expression of their own opinion. But after this there is another step which must be taken. All the Bishops in the province of Canterbury are obliged, before consecration, to appear at Bow Church, and go through the ceremony of confirmation, and at that assembly all opposers are called on by the Queen's Proctor to come forward and state whether they have any objections to make.

The right rev. Prelate here read, in reference to this ceremony, the following extract from Burn's Ecclesiastical Law:—“A citation against opposers, which (the time of confirmation being first fixed) is published and set up by order, and in the name of the Archbishop, at the Church where it is to be held, as well to notify the day of confirmation as to cite all opposers (if there be any) who will object against the said election, or the person elected, to appear on that day, according to the direction of the ancient canon law But if any appear, it seemeth that they shall be admitted to make their exceptions in due form of law. To which purpose, a passage in Collier's Ecclesiastical History (vol. ii., page 745,) is applicable:—‘Soon after the recess of the Parliament, Bishop Laud was translated from Bath and Wells to London, and Montague promoted to the See of Chichester. Before he was consecrated an unexpected rub was thrown in the way. At the confirmation of Bishops there is a public notice given that if any person can object either against the party elected or the legality of the election, they are to appear and offer their exceptions at the day prefixed. This intimation being given, one Jones, a bookseller, attended with the mob. Appearing at the confirmation, he excepted against Montague, as a person unqualified for the episcopal dignity; and to be somewhat particular, he charged him with Popery, Arminianism, and other heterodoxies, for which his books had been censured in the former Parliament. But Dr. Rives, who then officiated for Brent, the Vicar-general, disappointed this challenge.’”

Now, these are my grounds for believing, that if this appointment should be brought before the proper tribunal, it might not yet take place. I myself should be satisfied with its being brought before the proper tribunal. I have not the honour of knowing Dr. Hampden, but, with the exception of his holding what I conceive to be erroneous doctrines, I believe him to be a very estimable person. If the appointment were brought before the proper tribunal no doubt the result, whatever it might be, would be satisfactory, but until it is so brought my objections will remain in full force. I must state that I for one, many years ago, informed candidates for holy orders from Oxford that I should require them to have a certificate, not from the Regius Professor of Divinity, but a testimonial from the Margaret Professor. I can only add that, supposing at the confirmation, which is one of the most solemn ceremonies of the Church, and at which it is said by lawyers that Bishops are not obliged to confirm against their consciences, any legal objection should be made to the newly-appointed Bishop, I will be no party concerned in the ceremony.

At length the world has been favored with Dr. Hampden's long-expected letter to Lord John Russell. We should be extremely sorry to speak in terms of depreciation of any apology from a man in his unfortunate situation; but can even the Bishop of Norwich call the tone of that letter a tone of dignified defence? If Lord John Russell sees in it the justification of his own unflinching perseverance—a document on which the rights of a Prime Minister to inflict the utmost possible amount of vexation on the Church may peacefully repose,—truly, he is one of those who see more than other folk. The remonstrance of some fourteen or fifteen Bishops, the memorial of the head of the Chapter to which the congé d'élire has been addressed, the voice of the Church from north to south,—all these are such ordinary things that, doubtless, to characterize them all as “calumny,” “slander,” and “misrepresentation,” all originating in “the animosity,” and “under the instigation of a few individuals,” adversaries not only of Dr. Hampden, but of all that is Protestant in the Church of England, is a thing which, as soon as it is said, will carry the tumultuous assent of all indifferent persons!

The Church has now before her a full length-portrait, by herself, of the man whom the will of a Minister of State is about to exalt to the seat of a Bishop. There are four epithets of the character, as drawn by that authority, the supremacy of which Dr. Hampden is pleased to compliment himself in maintaining; and the four epithets stand together: “sober, just, holy, temperate.” Let the reader of Dr. Hampden's letter try it sentence by sentence, with the sacred text in his remembrance; and how will the writer appear? The soberness of the man who compares his own case with that of “the Apostles, reviled and evil-treated by their brethren;”—the justice of the charges he brings against those whom he calls “the younger Clergy;”—the holiness and temperance of the language in which he tries to involve the whole body of his opponents; all these points are so brought out in the weary Epistle, that it is only adding to the weariness of every reader to deign them any more especial notice.

The election took place at Hereford, on Tuesday, Dec. 28th, the result of this we gave in our last in a brief postscript. We have no space for the account of this interesting proceeding. The Dean made a most solemn protest in announcing his dissentient vote.

The following is the leading editorial of the last English Churchman.

If any candid man, who has the means of ascertaining the opinions and feeling of Churchmen at the present moment, were asked what effect Dr. Hampden's Letter to Lord John Russell has had, we presume that he would readily answer “none whatever.” Never did any anxiously expected document less satisfy the hopes and expectations of the public, or less justify the delay which had taken place in its appearance before the world. The abrupt manner in which it commences leads one to suspect that some previous communications had taken place between Lord John and his nominee; and if this were the case, it is only charitable to suppose that his Lordship had exhausted the Doctor's epistolary powers.

Many persons expected that Dr. Hampden's long announced letter would set out by stating that although he considered that he was indebted to a certain party in the Church for much of the opposition which had been made to his appointment to the See of Hereford, yet it would be the blindest folly to deny that very many excellent persons, unconnected with that party, felt that the censure which the University, by a large majority, had passed upon him, was a very serious bar to his appointment, and to the useful exercise of the functions of the Episcopate: that, moreover, they felt that many of the opinions and expressions in certain of his writings were unfortunate, if not dangerous and heretical. That in deference to the feelings of these his “weaker brethren” (if he chose to call them so) he begged to express his regret that he had given them offence; and he was ready to retract any passages of his writings which the University should point out as inconsistent with the teaching of the Church.

Had Dr. Hampden done this (there is even yet time for him to do so) we venture to say that he would have done much towards silencing his opponents. One page of his letter, and one day (instead of twenty) would have been sufficient for all purposes.

But it is unnecessary to say a word more about Dr. Hampden's Letter. It was followed by one much more important and to the purpose, viz., that of the Dean of Hereford, which will be found in another column. We beseech our readers to examine that letter carefully, and judge whether it contains a single line which could justify the first minister of the Crown in addressing the following insolent epistle to a high and irreproachable dignitary of the Church. We place it on record in this place, lest it should be overlooked—which would be a pity—

We gave this in our last.

This undignified, unprovoked, and insulting production, is dated, be it observed, on Christmas-day: probably either just before, or just after receiving the Holy Eucharist—unless his Lordship's Pastor should have refused to “violate the laws” of the Church so far as to admit to the Communion one who occasionally attends schismatical meeting-houses.

That we should find any fault with his note will, however, surprise some persons, perhaps, because it so obviously helps forward the cause which we have at heart. Nothing that we could write would so effectually rouse our readers to energetic action as this miserable little note—little in every sense of the word. One might almost hope and expect that it would rouse every earnest and independent Churchman—and especially the non-remonstrating Bishops, and the Deans and Chapters of the other Cathedrals.

A NEW BISHOP.—A saying of King George 3d, was strongly marked by his characteristic practical good sense. When the minister recommended to him for a vacant See some divine who had set forth certain unsound doctrines, which however he afterwards retracted, “I will have for my new Bishop (said the King) some man who has nothing to retract.”—Calendar.

MAINE.—BISHOP BURGESS'S VISIT TO THE PENOBSCOT.—Our Bishop has just favored us with a visit. He arrived in Bangor on the evening of the 1st instant. On the following Sunday, he preached in St. John's Church, and confirmed six persons; the Rev. O. Pinkney Hammond, the officiating minister, assisting in the services.

But the most interesting of all our services, were held in the evening, at Old Town. Prayers were read by the Rev. S. Durborrow, the Bishop administering the sacrament of Baptism to three children, after which he preached from 1 Cor. iii. 11,—“For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.” After which four persons were confirmed.

This was the first occasion, as has been intimated, on which confirmation was ever administered in this village. Many have not failed to see that it supplies a place in the Church which, in the other denominations, is not filled. We think that every time the sacrament and rites of the Church are administered, an impression is made favorable to us; for, after all, the prejudices which exist against the Church, have their origin in a want of knowledge of her true character and claims. Hence the wish of us all that the Bishop's visits might be frequent.

Dr. Burgess is probably the first Bishop of our Church, who ever visited the Penobscot region beyond Bangor. May this visitation be as the dawn of a brighter day, when the Church shall be more thoroughly established here. Let us pray that the Holy Spirit may incline the hearts of many of this people to the service of the Lord, who may be ready to devote themselves to him in the apostolic rite of confirmation. And may our Zion receive such an abundance of the influences from above as shall cause her to arise and shine, with the glory of the Lord risen upon her.

Yours truly,

and application to solemn doctrines and serious thoughts. Emblems are not images and pictures. The Church of Rome has either perverted the early Christian emblems, or in their stead substituted representations, which are made the objects of adoration. The Bread and wine of the Lord's Supper are emblems; the Church of Rome, by assuming an imaginary and most incredible conversion of these symbols into the real body and blood of Christ, has wrested them from the design of their institution. The Cross is an emblem; the Crucifix, an image. In this case the Church of Rome has substituted—for what purpose is well known—an image of the Saviour, for a symbol of his salvation.

Emblems are discovered in the primitive Church, in its earliest ages, long before either the cupidity or the imposture of the Popedom had any existence.—When the Christian worshipper enters the "Nave" of one of God's holy temples, he is reminded that he is within the Vessel (Navis) which the floods of sin and schism cannot overwhelm—the Ark of Christ's Church. When the early Christian looked upon the pictured phoenix rising from its ashes, joyful thoughts of the Resurrection cheered his heart, and dispelled the fear of death. Our forefathers—mindful of that Cup which is a fountain of life and of that Sacramental food which is heavenly manna—represented the Holy Eucharist under the emblem of grapes and wheat-ears. Reflecting also on the sharp pangs with which the cleansing stream was stricken from the Rock of Ages,—that it was the life-blood of an "harmless, undefiled" sacrifice,—they described the Eucharist again in the emblem of blood flowing from the heart and feet of the Wounded Lamb into a chalice beneath: the Christian's purity and innocence were shadowed forth in the Dove: the caged Bird was the Christian in his earthly state of privation and imprisonment, yearning to escape beyond the bars of his narrow cell, and to be released from the sorrows and restraints of his captivity: the Bird exulting in happy freedom, and seeking the lofty sky with expanded wings, this was the Christian emancipated from bondage, and soaring upward to his final rest. Innumerable were the beautiful and affecting devices of this kind which our pious ancestors employed: with these emblems,—not images,—they adorned their Churches; and these they consecrated to the memory of the dead by piously and affectionately carving them upon their tombs. When we have made up our minds to call emblems like these "Romish," we have better also resolve to surrender to Rome every thing that is Catholic, truthful, fair, and lovely.

The Monogram I H S as it appears on the "antependium," or that part of the "fair linen cloth" which hangs in front of the Communion Table, may be read as the epitaph of Him who died to bring us near to God; or may serve as a memento of what the pious disciple did, who "bought fine linen, and took Him down, and wrapped Him in the linen."

"The secret of the Altar's snow-white pall,
And of the linen-garment white and fair,
Spread o'er the glorious sacrifice when all
Have tasted. 'Tis as Jesus' winding-sheet,
And their's, who die clasping his sacred feet."

Sorrow on the Sea.

"Destruction from God was a terror to me."

JOB xxxi. 23.

There lived, a short time since, in the north of England, three little boys, whose names were Davis, Carlisle, and Fostil. Davis and Carlisle were sons of fishermen. One Sunday afternoon, these three little boys, forgetting that God had forbidden them to find their own pleasures on His holy day, amused themselves by going out to sea in a small boat, about thirteen feet long. There was one oar and one small sail in their little boat. When they had got out a few miles from land, they thought they saw some boys coming out in a boat to fetch them back again, so they set up their small sail, that they might follow their own pleasure still longer. The blessing of God did not go with them. The wind blew from the shore, and, sad to tell, their boat was driven out still further to sea. At last, to their great sorrow, the land was no longer to be seen. How often they tried to get back to the shore—but alas! they could not. Perhaps they said to each other, Oh, that we had gone this afternoon to school, or to the house of God; all this sorrow would not have come upon us! Night came on and it was now so dark, that they could no longer try to get back, and a strong gale of wind drove them yet further into the open sea. Morning came; but not a speck of land was to be seen, nor was any ship near them. They were now in great trouble, for they had not one mouthful of food, nor any water in their little boat, neither did any one of them know how to get back to land. The eldest boy, Davis, fifteen years of age, fell sick, and was ill all day; this made them more unhappy. The sun again set, and there seemed no hope of their being saved from a watery grave. How fearful to die, when we are not at peace with God, when our sins are not washed away in the blood of Christ, and our hearts are not the dwelling-place of his good Spirit. Their parents on shore tried to find their poor little boys: but they could not. Tuesday morning dawned; all day they looked out for some ship, and hoped once more to see the land; it was all in vain, night came on again, and the three poor little fellows, tired, hungry, and stiff with cold, lay down in the bottom of their boat, which was driven about by the wind and waves. When Carlisle and Fostil awoke in the morning, they looked at Davis, who was lying quite still; he never moved again, he was dead. Oh! let not your last end be like his. This, the poor children felt was the worst of all. The sea did not run very high, and their boat floated about all this third day; but now they had still less hope than ever. Night once more drew its curtain over the sky, and the two little sailors, with the dead body of their companion, spent the dark hours of the fourth night on the open sea. But God looked from heaven upon their grief, and in wrath remembered mercy. In the afternoon of Thursday, they saw a sail in the distance; the ship drew toward them, and while they looked on it their eyes filled with tears of joy. The kind captain at once took the poor boys on board his ship; but they were very ill indeed, as they had not had any food since Sunday afternoon. While the poor little fellows were being put on board the ship, they saw the sailors were going to throw the body of their companion overboard. They cried aloud most bitterly, and begged that they might take home the dead body of Davis; but a heavy splash in the water was the answer to their cries, and the waves hid Davis from their sight. The captain was a Dutchman, and he was going back to his own country; but when he got there, he was so kind as to send the two boys back to London. From London they set out for the north of England, and once more reached home, to the very great joy of their unhappy parents. What a tale they had to tell! Let none that read it forget, that sin and sorrow must ever go together; but the ways of God are safe and happy, and his paths are peace.

Dr. Hampden's Bampton Lectures.

"No man's mind can be fairly judged by such a specimen as Newman has given of Hampden's. He has in several places omitted sentences in his quotations, which give exactly the soft and christian effect to what, without them, sounds hard and cold."—Life of Dr. Arnold, p. 275.

"Hampden is a good man, and an able one; a lover of truth and fairness; and I should think that the wholesome air of such a man's lectures would tend to freshen men's faith, and assure them that it had a foundation to rest upon, when the infinite dishonesty and foolery of such divinity as I remember in the lecture-rooms and pulpits in times past, would be enough to drive a man of sound mind into any extravagances of unbelief. . . . Hampden's Bampton Lectures are a great work, entirely true in their main points, and, I think, most useful." . . . "But it is merely like the cry of Oxford one hundred and twenty years ago, when the lower house of convocation condemned Burnet's Exposition of the Articles."—Ibid. p. 276.

Again, after speaking of the Hampden controversy, Dr. Arnold goes on to say—"It is a curious case, and is completely, to my mind, a repetition of the scenes of the Reformation. When Peter Martyr went down as divinity professor to Oxford, in Edward VI.'s time, he was received by the Catholics with precisely the same outcry with which Dr. Hampden has been received by the high-churchmen, and on the same grounds."—Ibid. p. 277.

Address from fifteen Heads of Houses in the University of Oxford to Dr. Hampden, Regius Professor of Divinity.

"We, the undersigned, Heads of Houses in the University of Oxford, have seen with great concern the reports of proceedings in various parts of the country upon your proposed appointment to the see of Hereford, tending to injure your reputation, impede your future usefulness, and even create a general distrust of the soundness of your faith in our blessed Lord. Under such circumstances, although we only declare the sentiments which many of us have expressed before, and particularly upon the enactment in 1842, of the new Statute concerning theological instruction, we desire to assure you, that having, for several years, enjoyed ample opportunities of learning the tenor of your public teaching, and hearing your discourses from the pulpit of the University, we are not only satisfied that your religious belief is sound, but we look forward with confidence to your endeavors to preach the gospel of CHRIST in its integrity.

JAMES INGRAM, President of Trinity.
PHILIP WYNTER, President of St. John's.
JOHN RADFORD, Rector of Lincoln.
HENRY FOULKES, Principal of Jesus College.
THOMAS GAISFORD, Dean of Christ Church.
JOHN DAVID MACBRIDE, Principal of Magdalen Hall.
DAVID WILLIAMS, Warden of New College.
FREDERICK CHARLES PLUMPTREE, Master of University.
HENRY WELLESLEY, Principal of New Inn Hall.
R. BULLOCK MARSHAM, Warden of Merton.
WILLIAM THOMPSON, Principal of St. Edmund Hall.
JAMES NORRIS, President of C. C. C.
FRANCIS JENNE, Master of Pembroke.

Of the twenty-four Heads of Houses in the University it is known that one is past ninety years of age, and takes no part in public business. Another is Dr. Hampden himself. Four are understood to be favorable to the object of the foregoing memorial, though for various reasons they have declined to sign it. Three only have any sympathy with the movement that has been set on foot against Dr. Hampden. It is well worthy of remark, too, that several of the above signatures are those of persons by whom Dr. Hampden was formerly opposed, but whose further knowledge has convinced that, that opposition originated in misapprehension.

"The Bampton Lectures do not justly warrant those suspicions of unsoundness, to which they have given rise, and which, so long as I trusted to selected extracts, I myself shared." . . . They are "a thoughtful and able history of the formation of dogmatic terminology."—Bishop Wilberforce. [It appears that the Bishop was amongst the condemners of Dr. Hampden in 1836 and 1847, and that he had never thought of reading the book until after sentence past.—Castigatque auditque!]

"One of the impressions (says Archdeacon Hare,) produced on me by Dr. Hampden's Lectures, is thankfulness for having become acquainted with a book so learned and thoughtful, and so favorably distinguished both in these respects, and by its philosophical candor and sobriety from the bulk of our recent theological literature." . . . "A very small portion, I believe, of the condemners has any notion of the nature and purport of the work, which they are so eager to condemn. It is an historical more than a dogmatical work,—a work of historical and philosophical criticism, applied to an important period in the development of Christian Theology."—Archdeacon Hare.

And Hallam, in his Literature of the Middle Ages, [I cannot at the moment turn to the particular page] describes Dr. Hampden as the only Englishman, past or present, since the revival of letters who had penetrated into the wilderness of scholastic Philosophy.

The extent and manner, in which Dr. Hampden's Lectures have been garbled and misrepresented by Messrs. Newman, and Co., for their own party purposes, are such as can hardly be credited by honest men.* With the proofs of this you shall be amply supplied in the course of a few days.

A. M. OF CH. CH., OXFORD.

P. S. I cannot but think that Dr. Hampden's assailants will perceive, ere long, the grievous error they have committed by embarking themselves in the same boat with Mr. Newman and his fellow voyagers from Oxford to Rome.

* A respectable clergyman of the Church of England, writing on the subject, states, that so artfully have the misrepresentations of Dr. Hampden's book been managed, that few candid men, not having the means of reading the work for themselves, can be much blamed for not suspecting them. "I, at least for one, (he adds) could not have believed the extent of them, had I not actually compared the apparent extracts with the work itself!"

Missions in Pennsylvania, I.

In former articles, the urgent claims of the Church Missions upon our liberality, and the general meagreness and inadequacy of the contributions in the several dioceses, were plainly set forth. With equal plainness, yet in a spirit of gentleness and love, we would now show why Pennsylvania is the SIXTY-SEVEN CENT DIOCESE. Many congregations, it is well known, give very largely of their means for the support of General Missions. It may seem strange, then, that the average is so low. But this is readily explained; the following list will serve to throw much light on the subject. Taking the parishes in rotation, as reported in the journal of our last Convention, we find the following report from fifteen churches.

Churches.	Communicants.	Collected in all.	Gen. Missions.

What shall we say of those fellow-Christians who make up the foregoing list? That they are asleep? Has the sweet-toned bell of St. Thomas's aught to do with this long and quiet slumber? How is it that for a whole twelvemonth these SEVEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-NINE soldiers of Christ have not once bethought themselves of the necessity of stationing sentinels on the outposts of Emmanuel's encampment, and sending scouts into the enemy's land; or at least, have furnished no supplies for keeping up the war outside the walls of their own towns.

This lack of service results not from want of love, we think; but rather from want of thought. May the writer presume to think a minute or two on behalf of some of his readers? He thinks, then, that there has been no necessity for this great deficiency. To descend from high conceptions and lofty reflections, comparing mean things with great, we shall be understood by the most humble and utilitarian mind of this working day, matter-of-fact world. What does the polish on your boots cost per annum? The question is addressed to every male member of the above parishes, and to all others who read this page. If your boots are blackened by yourself, and only once a week, the yearly cost of time, brushes and blacking, cannot be less than fifty cents. Yet have you given so much in the same time for China, Africa, and the new states, that the poor of those lands may have the gospel preached to them? If the work has been done daily, the cost is increased nearly seven-fold. How much less than this have you given for missions?

But do you think more of well-polished boots than of the heathen and their christian teachers? God forbid! Why then have you practically said so, seeing the world, whose keen eye is upon us, judges our estimation of any thing by the amount we are willing to give in order to secure it? How many of the above seven hundred and sixty-nine communicants are males? and how many of them can satisfactorily answer these questions? What proportion of the one hundred and fifty-five members of — have made their missionary offerings equal to their outlay for shoe-blackening? O, brethren, brethren, think carefully on these queries; assign to high things and low their relative values; and pay in proportion. S.

WANT SUPPLIED.—The following letter, with ten dollars enclosed, is in answer to the editorial in the Banner of January 22d, headed, "Wants." In the name of the missionary and people whose need has been thus quickly and kindly supplied, and in our own behalf, as a grateful proof that our appeals are not in vain, we thank these young ladies of "the Hannah More Academy." Fruits like these are the best recommendations of an institution for the education of the young. If the young members of the Church are taught thus early to realize the blessedness of charity, and to deny themselves that they may contribute from their little store to supply those who are destitute of the privileges they enjoy, we may hope better things for the future than the present can boast of. We trust that this example may "provoke others unto love and to good works," and we pray that these daughters of the Church, who have thus meetly "shown forth their thankfulness" for "the wonderful conversion" of St. Paul, may so live in "the light of the gospel" and "follow the holy doctrine which he taught," that they may be "children of the light," and in its blessed beams, find present peace and eternal joy.

DEAR SIR:—The enclosed $10, is a sum raised this morning among the boarders of this Institution, for the purpose of sending a S. School Library from our own publications, books selected from The Protestant Episcopal Union, in answer to the call for a destitute Sunday School in Indiana.

We would here take the liberty of stating, to induce others to do likewise, that this is the second Library which our School has purchased in less than a year, for destitute places, and add that if one half of the Female Institutions would respond to the calls made, there would scarcely be found a Sunday School of "the Church" without these precious books. Our school consists of a limited number. When schools are crowded with fifty to one hundred boarders, we say from experience, they would find much more pleasure in furnishing these precious little volumes to those deprived of the same privileges, than in all the money wasted in candies, jewelry, or finery. Who would not prefer sending the means of enlightening, the destitute portions of our West, to the mere gratification of the palate, or personal decorations? Let the young of the Church be taught self-denial, and we shall not hear of so many appeals passing unheeded.

TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS.—We hope our readers will think charitably of the few errors of this kind, as well as of the errors of other kinds, be they few or many, which have resulted from editorial inexperience in the late conduct of the Banner. We shall try and profit by all the hints, past, present or future, given us, so long as they do not require us to go in contrary directions. We hope it will not be thought telling tales out of school, if we inform our readers that types are subjects very difficult to govern. They sometimes give voice to thoughts, almost against the will and judgment of their ruler, and at times they rise up against the thoughts, committed to their care, and either spoil them or murder them outright. The few instances of this kind which have occurred, and we are thankful to say they are very few, are to be attributed to the restiveness of subjects when brought under a new control.

To our correspondents we beg leave to say, if you wish to see your articles correctly printed, let them be correctly and legibly written.

We remember long ago, long before our own editorial destiny was "manifest," being at the house of an "old editor," when a worthy gentleman, though rather an eccentric one, called to secure a notice of a book he had just been publishing. It was his first effort, and there were symptoms that it would be his last. The rebellious types had sorely tried him, and he sought comfort from one whom he thought might have shared his experience. The following dialogue was heard with some amusement by the disinterested listener.

"Do you ever have any typographical errors in your paper, Doctor?"

"Oh, yes sir, frequently!"

"Well, how do you find they set on the human mind?"

We trust that as our readers have not only "human" but humane minds, the errors of our types will "set" lightly upon them. For our own part we forgive these unruly members all, but the outrage of changing in our last number "Silou's brook" into a stream called "Silou!"

REV. DR. SCORESBY.—In copying the following from "the Churchman" we trust it may not be deemed intrusive to say how deeply and truly his many friends in this city sympathize with this Rev. gentleman in the trying domestic affliction, the death of Mrs. Scoresby, of which letters here received, gave him the first painful intelligence. All who have formed the acquaintance of this gentleman, so distinguished for his scientific attainments, have been won by the personal qualities which equally commend him to the heart. There is an anxious desire felt by many in this city, to hear Dr. Scoresby's lectures. One who has spent twenty-one years in the Arctic seas, and is possessed of so much general knowledge, added to the practical knowledge which has led him to so many discoveries in science, must be a delightful lecturer. This opinion we have heard expressed by those, well qualified to judge, who heard him lecture in St. Mary's Hall, and Burlington College.

"We have much pleasure in publishing the following correspondence. Having had the satisfaction of hearing the Rev. Dr. Scoresby lecture, on the occasion referred to, we can truly say, that, for ourselves we should have been highly delighted to hear the reverend gentleman again, and that those who were prevented, by the festivities of the season, or, probably, some other causes, from attending the two lectures, lost a very rich intellectual treat, which they will long have occasion to regret. We still hope that Dr. Scoresby may return on his way homeward through New York and comply with the wishes of his numerous friends, both clerical and lay, whose signatures would have been added hereunto, had time and opportunity permitted. On the truly Christian and praiseworthy object, which the lectures were intended to promote, and which has our unqualified approbation, we purpose on no distant occasion to speak commendatorily, considering it to be, especially at this time, one of no common importance to the Church, and to the poor individuals intended to be benefited by the proposed laudable undertaking of the Church and Hospital of St. George the Martyr.

New York, January 15th, 1847.

Rev. Sir,—There is a very general desire with those who are true lovers of science, as well among those of us who heard, as of those who by previous engagements were unavoidably prevented from attending the delivery of your two Lectures for the benefit of the Church and Hospital of St. George the Martyr, on the "Principle, construction and operation of the Gigantic Telescopes of the Earl of Rosse," to have them repeated.

May we venture to solicit such a favor? and the rather, as all who had the pleasure of hearing them, have, without exception, expressed their unqualified approval and high appreciation of your Lectures, and those who were not so favored, but have the ability to distinguish between what is really good and that which has only its semblance, would, we feel assured, be equally gratified with ourselves, if the opportunity were afforded them.

We sincerely hope, therefore, that it may be compatible with your engagements to consider and kindly comply with our request, and thus oblige, Rev. Sir,

Your very faithful friends and servants.

Rev. Dr. Scoresby, &c., &c., &c.,

Riverside, near Burlington, January 17th, 1847.

Gentlemen,—The letter which you did me the honour to address to me on the subject of my lectures on the Earl of Rosse's Telescopes, only reached me after my arrival here. I regret, that I cannot reply to it, as, under other circumstances, I could have wished. But, though I do not venture to engage for a repetition of the lectures, as you kindly solicit at New York—my return thither being very uncertain,—I am most sensible of the friendly courteousness of your application; and I should not do justice to myself were I not to add that my sense of this courtesy is deeply enhanced by the consideration of the distinguished names attached to that application.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen,

Your faithful and obliged friend,

WILLIAM SCORESBY.

To the Rev. Dr. Berrian, Anthony Barclay, Esq., &c., &c.

D. D.'s AND A. M.'s.—The following extract is made from "the Christian Advocate and Journal," a Methodist paper. We should think the facts that the Methodist society is suffering "an astonishing decrease in membership," in proportion to the increase of learning and education among their ministry and people, would lead them to think seriously upon the nature of their system. The following account is from one of their ministers. There is an honest simplicity in this worthy old gentleman's style which pleases us. We argue that he must be advanced in years from the title of "Uncle Henry or Uncle Smith," and surely the last sentence we quote shows that his must be a "green old age."

Dear Brethren,—I should long since have ceased to tax you with my communications if my good friends would let me alone; but preachers as well as people urge me to write. The judgment of some I respect. One asks it as a particular favor to "write once more before I go hence." Even young people address me thus: "O Uncle Henry, or Uncle Smith, do write again for the Advocate—do write more," &c. So let this be my apology; though it is labor for me to write anything now, when sight and memory are both impaired.

I have been deeply afflicted and sorely grieved on account of the astonishing decrease in our membership for the last two years. And I find that I am not alone in this, as several of your correspondents have expressed themselves freely on this mournful subject. Among them I find my dear old friend and brother, Thomas Wilkerson, of Tennessee, who was my colleague fifty-one years ago, in what was then called the far West. I have wept and mourned over this state of things in our Church till my heart has been made sick; but, thank God, I am somewhat comforted by looking at the bright side of the picture, which I wish always to do. There certainly has been a coming up or improvement in many things that our fathers hardly thought of. But let us not be high-minded, but be humble and fear, lest this very thing should prove a snare to us, and work out our ruin. Some of these improvements are of rather a doubtful character it is true, but the most of them are evidently of God, and must work for good.

Some, who are constantly looking at the dark side, are ready to say, in what things have we improved, or come up? Forty-five or fifty years ago we had no Missionary Society—no missionaries among our neighboring Indians, people of color, &c. though every travelling preacher was considered a home missionary. We had no missionaries in foreign lands; we had no Bible Society; we had no Sunday schools, or were just beginning to enter upon this great enterprise, for the Church and nation's good. We had no Christian Advocates to plead our cause before the public. Our Book Concern was quite a small concern; but see what it has come to—what it is now. The Methodist Society was the only temperance society in the land sixty years ago, [except the Friends—Ed.] but some of its members violated their solemn pledge, and little notice was taken of it, unless they got drunk outright. Our friends were, in general, less liberal in their contributions toward the support of the Gospel, and charitable and benevolent institutions. We had but few churches fifty-eight years ago, and these few were mostly very sorry ones. We had few, if any learned men in the ministry, &c.; but only see what a number of D. D.'s we have now, besides A. M.'s!

A COMMUNICANT OF THE CHURCH who has had much experience as a Teacher in all the branches of an English education, is in want of employment. He would take charge of pupils for private tuition. Good references can be given: apply to the Editor of this paper.

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

"The way to judge of our religion is by doing our duty and theology is rather a divine life than a divine knowledge."
"Disputation cures no vice, but kindles a great many, and makes passion evaporate into sin."
"Christianity is all for practice; and so much time as is spent in quarrels about it, is a diminution of its interests."
"Every man understands by his affections more than by his reason."
"If a man be very hungry, you must give him meat before you give him counsel."

The following is taken from Dr. Gregory's "Sixth pastoral letter to the Parishioners of St. Paul's Church, Syracuse." This admirable letter shows a pastoral faithfulness which cannot but secure the rich blessing of God upon Minister and people.

Since the worship of Almighty God is the most important ordinance of religion, and the most effectual means of religious improvement, it should be regarded as one of the surest proofs of growth in Christian piety, that a congregation values more and more the opportunity of frequent worship in the Church. Nothing can be better adapted to our spiritual wants than the Daily Service, as prescribed in our book of Common Prayer. Its faithful use has never been without a blessing to a Church. Without it, the Sunday services lose half their effect. Without it, the advantage of a connected reading of the Holy Scriptures as prescribed in the Church's Calendar is lost. Without it, the observance of the Holy Days and Seasons of the Christian year, is to most persons wearisome and unintelligible. Without it, we hardly realize "The Communion of Saints." Without it, six days of the seven are dedicated to the world, at a time when devotion to the world is the greatest snare of Christians. Our only hope of resistance is the "Strength" which is promised to them that "wait upon the Lord."

If it be asked why, in a city of 15,000 people, there is not one Church open for daily worship, I am ashamed to give the reasons. With some it is slloth; they cannot rise and go forth at the early hour of Morning Prayer. With some, it is avarice; they grudge the expense. With some, it is covetousness; they cannot spend the time from worldly occupations. With some, it is shame; they cannot bear the reproach of being among the "two or three" who are gathered together in the name of Christ. With some, it is indifference; they care for none of these things. But all these obstacles have in some parishes, been overcome; and I trust will soon be here. There are among us devout souls who long for the daily worship of God in his sanctuary. Let them cherish the desire. He from whom it came will grant it in his time.

To this we append a description of the "Free Chapel" erected by the congregation of St. Paul's. This account is instructive in many respects. It gives some valuable hints respecting that most practical subject, Church Architecture, and it shows how much may be done under the guidance of taste and judgment at little cost.

The Chapel is a rectangle, 54 feet long, and 25 feet wide. This form was given it, because it is built on the rear of the lot leaving the front of 90 feet in depth, for a Church proper, some future day. The present edifice is designed for the purpose of a chapel, only while a congregation is gathered which may need a larger one; leaving this, perhaps, for a Parish School or some other pious use.

The walls are of stone masonry, supported in the front tern side, by simple buttresses which vanish under the roof. The height of the walls is 12 feet, and from the floor the roof is 26 feet. The roof has a deep pitch, the perpendicular elevation being 14 feet, and is supported by the gables of 13 sets of principal rafters with ties. The plastered wall is raised up close under the roof, leaving the ties and rafters visible.—These with the strut above and arches below, make triangular openings in every bent; and by means of gothic tracery, each of these openings is formed into a trefoil arch. The points are cut from two inch plank, and simply nailed to the ties and rafters, producing a very pleasing architectural effect. The roof timbers, the benches, the chancel and all the interior wood work is stained and varnished, and closely resembles oak. The chancel is an arched recess, 12 feet wide and 7 feet high, at the north end of the Chapel; and from the upper point of this recess, the light streams through a round, gable window, 12 feet in diameter, of the richest colors. In the centre of the window is the sacred monogram, I, H, S, on a purple ground of diaper work, the S intertwining the other letters, and holding in front of the whole the decorated symbol of our redemption. A wreath of the lily of the valley around the outer edge of the window, completes the design.

In the same position, at the opposite end of the Chapel is another window of the same size; the design of which is a wreath of gold in the centre with palm branches underneath and seven stars above; the whole resting on a blue ground, and surrounded by a circular wreath of laurel or branches of the bay tree. These two windows, than which nothing could be more appropriate or beautiful, were the gift of Robert B. Minturn, Esq. New York, and were designed by his worthy Pastor, the Rector of the Church of the Holy Communion.

Each side of the chapel is lighted by four pointed windows, two central ones having one mullion, and the window heads enriched with colored glass, where the ruby, the topaz, the emerald, the amethyst, and the lapis lazuli bend their deep colors, and give a pleasing air to the plain and simple architecture.

On either side of a central alley 3 1-2 feet wide, is a row of wooden seats 9 feet 3 inches long, the ends of which are ornamented with a simple octagonal moulding, and formed after the pattern of those in Grace Church, Van Vorst, N. J.

The chancel floor is elevated two steps. The railing is composed of perforated tracery, displaying in miniature, the same figure as in the trefoil arches under the roof. The Lectern is a simple board supported by a cluster of three buttresses, and covered with a crimson cushion. The Altar is of wood, in pannels, with tracery in the corners, and lined with crimson. The centre pannel in front contains the letters I, H, S, in gold. The board of the Altar is also covered with crimson. The Holy Table stands against a Reredos or Screen, eight feet wide and ten feet high, terminating in two pinnacles on either side, and three ogee arches with ornamented crests in the centre.

The floor of the Chapel is covered throughout with a carpet of crimson and black, wrought into small figures resembling the rich diaper ground work of stained glass windows; and the benches are so arranged that the worshippers can conveniently kneel upon the floor. The chancel carpet is of a lighter color, and its figures suggestive of the sacrifice of the cross. The Chapel is lighted for evening worship, by bronze chandeliers, and brackets.

A marble font is provided by offerings of the children of the parish and Sunday Schools, and will be ready by Easter. The Vestry Room is on the right side of the chancel, and opens into it: its size is seven feet by five.

The south entrance to the Chapel is covered by a parvis, or porch, six feet square; and its steep roof is crowned with a decorated cross copied from the little Church of Skelton, in Yorkshire, England. The exterior of the north or chancel wall is surmounted by the Christian symbol, after the pattern of one on the east gable of Merton College Chapel, Oxford; and the other gable displays in miniature a turret from the north western transept of Peterborough Cathedral. All these, and also all the exterior wood work, hood moulds, mullions, etc., are painted the color of Newark stone.

The entire cost of the building when completed will be $350. It would have been less, had it not been necessary, on account of the situation of the lot, to build the foundation wall six feet high. The seats, carpets, chairs, chandeliers, lectern, communion table, and other furniture, will be $250 more. It will furnish seats for about two hundred persons; and is one more added to the examples, now rapidly increasing, of sacred edifices, simple, serious, and church like, impressing once on every beholder their purpose and their use, and yet within the means of every rural or village parish. Had we been permitted to build our Chapel of wood instead of stone, the cost would have been less. From this it may be seen, with how small a sum, our new and feeble parishes may provide themselves with Christian Sanctuaries, under the direction of some one who has a little skill in Church architecture.

Pennsylvania.—We have received a full account of the proceedings at the meeting of "the Convocation of Northern Pennsylvania." We are compelled to condense the notice.

The clergy met in St. John's Church, Huntingdon, Huntingdon Co., on the 18th ult. There were present the Rev. Messrs. Natt, Field, Heister, Lightner, Morris and Clark. There were several sessions of the Convocation, attended with the performance of Divine Service and preaching by the clergy present. The Holy Communion was also administered. The interesting narrative concludes in the following words:

Thus closed one of the most interesting meetings for mutual improvement, and for the advancement of the interests of the Church, which it has ever been our privilege to attend.

The clergy were encouraged and strengthened in the work of mutual counsel and advice, and returned to their respective parishes, realizing that the Lord had been with them in fulfillment of His promise. The utmost unanimity pervaded our counsels. A missionary spirit was fostered, and what has hitherto been a strange thing in this portion of the Church, the clergy have learned to feel an interest in each other's success; and the parishes to feel that they are parts of a whole, and have a real interest in their mutual welfare. The extended limits of our Convocation rendered it difficult for all the clergy to attend, inasmuch as Huntingdon is in one of the extremes. Still it is worth a ride of ninety miles over rough roads to meet with such interest and encouragement as we found in the meeting which has just closed. A missionary spirit is fostered among us, and we look for the time when in every village and in every township, a missionary will be found, carrying in and with the services of the Church, the gospel of our blessed Lord. Several important missionary stations within our limits, are unsupplied through want of men and money. We look to the Convocation as an important instrument for the extension of the Church in the destitute regions within our limits. We need them and we need the money to support them. We need tracts, bibles, and prayer-books for distribution. And we need especially the prayers of Christians for grace and strength from God to fit us more thoroughly for our work and labour of love.

And now a single word concerning St. John's church, Huntingdon. It is a beautiful Gothic structure, an ornament to the town, a credit to the ladies whose pious industry reared it; and an honorable monument to the memory of the faithful pastor whose death in Huntingdon inspired the wish for its erection.

The exterior is graceful and symmetrical, and the interior is equally neat and appropriate. A mural tablet in the chancel recess bears an inscription which states that the Church was erected to the memory of Rev. John Waller James, Rector of Christ church, Philadelphia, who died in that place in August 1836. The church was reared by the unwearied exertions of the ladies of his parish. The Rev. Mr. Field is labouring there with success.

New York.—CONFIRMATIONS BY THE BISHOP OF PENNSYLVANIA.—Second Sunday after Epiphany, Jan. 16th, in Zion Church, Little Neck, confirmed eight persons.

In the evening confirmed—in St. Matthew's Church, New York.

Connecticut.—CONSECRATION OF ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, WATERBURY, JAN. 12, 1848.—By Rt. Rev. T. C. Brownell, Bishop of the Diocese of Connecticut. The Church of St. John's is situated at the south-west corner of the Public Square, facing toward the East—a few rods west of the old edifice. The corner stone was laid on Saturday, the 6th day of June, 1846—by Right Rev. T. C. Brownell. The style of architecture adopted is intended to be purely Gothic, and is copied from drawings obtained from the antique Sacred Temples of the middle ages. The construction of the walls is of a massive thickness, flanked by buttresses to correspond—the material a grey granite of an agreeable and uniform shade, obtained from the native hills of our own immediate vicinity. With the exception of certain parts necessary for the display of architectural effect, the stone work is laid unhehwn, presenting to the eye a stately pile as immutable and enduring as time itself. And though perhaps somewhat inferior in dimensions to some of the Metropolitan Churches—the front is confessedly imposing, and in the felicity of its perspective is not transcended by any of its contemporaries in New England.

The dimensions of the Church, including buttresses, and chapel attached, occupies an area of 11,704 square feet, classified as follows:

Extreme length from out to out	154 feet.
Extreme width " "	76 "
Main building inside of buttresses	112 "
Breadth " "	64 "

The front of the edifice presenting a view, though not without precedent, is still somewhat unusual in the architecture of the Gothic Temples of this country. The effect, however, must be admitted to be favorable to the expression of the character and design of the style intended by the architect. On the right rises the principal or bell Tower, finished with Spire, elevated 186 feet to the top—the square of the Tower being 20 feet, and including buttresses 31 feet. Opposite on the left, a turret appears, giving to the whole perspective a harmony and grandeur, at once agreeable, imposing and majestic.

THE CONSECRATION.—The preliminary service prescribed in the order of Consecration was performed by the Bishop—the sentence of Consecration being read by the Rector of the Parish, Rev. J. L. Clark.

At the close of the consecration service, before the commencement of the regular morning service, the celebrated solo, from Handel's Oratorio of the Messiah, was beautifully sung by Mrs. Parson's of Hartford—followed by the Chorus, "Lift up your heads O ye gates," from the same Oratorio.

"Rejoice greatly O Daughter of Zion,"

Morning service was performed by Rev. Dr. Clark, Rector of Christ Church, Quincy, Mass. assisted by Rev. Dr. Holcomb, Rector of Christ Church, Watertown. In the ante-communion service, the Bishop was assisted by Rev. Dr. Jarvis.

The Consecration Sermon was delivered by Rev. Dr. Mead, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Norwalk, from the following words:

"And Jacob awaked out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not.

"And he was afraid, and said, How dreadful is this place! this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of Heaven."—Gen. xxvii. 16, 17.

We have neither time nor room to give even a sketch of the discourse, having devoted so much space in our columns to the occasion at large.—Suffice it to say, that it was strictly applicable, argumentative, and dignified.

At the close of the Sermon the Grand Hallelujah Chorus finished the musical exercises of the morning.

The Benediction, by the Bishop, terminated the ceremonies of consecration.

AFTERNOON.—Confirmation.—At two o'clock, the congregation again assembled, and, so far as numbers were concerned, we saw but little diminution. Service was performed by the Rev. Mr. Paddock, Principal of Cheshire Academy, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Fisher, of Hartford. The Rev. Dr. Todd, Rector of St. John's Church, Stamford, preached the sermon, from Heb. ii. 6.—Of the doctrine of baptism, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment.

After the conclusion of the sermon, forty individuals, most of them in the morning of life, presented themselves, and were confirmed by the Bishop.

The Waterbury American.

CONFIRMATIONS.—During his late visitation the Bishop of Connecticut administered the right of Confirmation as follows:

In New Haven—Trinity, to 20 persons.

" " St. Luke's 4 "

West Haven—Christ Church, 6 "

Waterbury—St. John's 39 "

Plymouth—St. Peter's, 18 "

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Samuel C. Kerr, late of the Diocese of Maryland, has taken letters dimissory to that of Mississippi, and accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Woodville, Miss.

The Rev. Mr. H. Hunter having removed to Grosse Isle, Michigan, requests all communications for him to be directed to "Trenton, Wayne county, Michigan."

Rev. N. P. Knapp has resigned the rectorship of St. John's church, Montgomery, and become the Rector of Christ church, Mobile.

Correspondents and publishers are requested to notice this change.

Miscellaneous.

Whoever looks, and as he looks, thinks of the myriads of inexplicable things that occur in the fluctuations of human life, will draw lessons of wisdom from the snow and the rain and the binding of the rivers in fetters of ice. Job understood this subject well, and if we had the faith and the trust of Job, we should not so frequently as it is feared we do, rebel against the order of Providence, and "fret against the Lord" because the wind blows too roughly, and the air, the sun, or the clouds do not suit our fancies nor harmonize with our pleasures.—If with the same holy man just quoted, we would keep it in mind that "our days upon earth are a shadow," we should care less, murmur less, and love God more, and thus there would be peace at the last.—Gospel Mess.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—In the public schools of the Sandwich Islands, according to the report of Mr. Richards, the minister of Public Instruction, the number of pupils is 18,644. The number of ordained clergymen, 43; of whom 26 are Protestants, and 17 Catholics. Besides these, who are all foreigners, there are seven natives (Protestants) who have been licensed to preach the gospel. Within the last year or two the population has slightly increased; but taking a period of ten years together, it has diminished.

THE CHURCH AT THE CAPE.—It appears from the advices of September 18th, received from the Cape of Good Hope, that the amount of the expenditure for the colony, for 1846, had been voted by the Legislature at 179,981l. 12s. 7d. Of this, 10,908l. had been voted for the ecclesiastical service, and 8,000l. for educational purposes. There were separate grants for the Established Church, for the Dutch Reformed, for the Lutheran, for the Scottish, for the Roman Catholics, and for the Wesleyans.

Church and State Gazette.

FAMINE and disease are committing such awful ravages among the peasantry of Austrian Galicia, that in almost every village a third, and in some places even the half, of the people have died.

Mr. H. Grattan stated in his place in Parliament, that 115,929 persons had died for want of food in Ireland during the late famine. That in 140 parishes, containing 1,600,000 persons, there was not a single resident landlord. Lord Fitzwilliam stated at least two millions of people would require relief this winter.

THE WAY TO ESCAPE DROWNING.—A Dutchman was relating his marvellous escape from drowning, when thirteen of his companions were lost by the upsetting of a boat, and he alone was saved. "And how did you escape their fate?" asked one of his hearers. "I did not go in the boat," was the Dutchman's placid answer.

The Camden Society are about to publish some newly discovered and valuable letters of Queen Elizabeth to James VI. of Scotland, written between the years 1581 and 1594. They relate to the Armada, Babington's conspiracy, the trial of James's mother, and other occurrences of that eventful period.

A FREE GOSPEL.—"Give me freedom in everything," said a man to us a few days since. I have been a member of the church for forty years, and up to this time it has not cost me a penny. That's what I call a free gospel!"

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH IN IRELAND.—There are in Ireland, at this moment, 2735 Roman Catholic priests, 2205 Roman Catholic churches, 25 colleges, 59 convents, 93 nunneries, and 42 monasteries.

That is well which is said of Agricola by Tacitus, "Seire omnia, non noscere;" he saw every thing; but did not let on. This is great in managing children and newspapers too!—Missionary Banner.

The Old Man's Dream.

BY MRS. M. N. M'DONALD.

An old man slept in his elbow chair,
At close of a Summer day,
And his cheek was fanned by the idle wing
Of a zephyr in its play,
And he recked not the sound of a busy wheel
That was humming its ceaseless lay.

A weary wight was the old man now,
And he slept, though a hammer's fall
Was clinking still, with its heavy stroke,
Close down by the cottage wall;
For he labored all day in the factory,
The busiest of them all.

But he woke at last with a sudden start,
And then with a smile said he,
"Oh a beautiful dream I have surely had
Of a far off country;
Good wife, lay by thy wheel a space,
And I'll tell it unto thee.

"Not here by the lattice pane I sat,
Nor slept in my elbow chair,
For my limbs were the active limbs of youth,
So tall and straight and fair,
And my dim old eyes they had found their light,
And dark were my locks of hair.

"I was young again as I once had been,
And I roamed away at will,
With a glad free step o'er a spreading plain
And a bright and breezy hill,
And I was not forced to toil for bread
Within the roaring mill.

"A shadowy veil of golden haze
All over the landscape lay,
And methought, as I looked on the fairy scene,
'Twas the morn of a Summer day:
But never a Summer's sun, I ween,
Shone out with such heavenly ray.

"It tinged the breast of a lovely stream
Which flowed through that region wide;
A broad, still river, that peacefully
In the sunlight seemed to glide,
With soft green pastures and flowery fields,
Sloped down to its silver tide.

"And I minded me well if thou were there,
Though I was not all alone—
And I said, 'Good wife, shall we meet again?'
Then a low, yet pleasant tone,
Made answer, 'She'll come to thee by and by,
But the time is still unknown.'

"And I laid me down by that shining stream,
'Neath a cool and grateful shade.
Where harps, methought, in the leafy boughs,
A murmuring music made;
And sweet was the rest of that grassy couch,
And the winds that round me played.

"There was no hum of the jarring wheels—
Each sound of labor slept—
And they told me—I saw bright creatures there—
That an endless rest they kept,
And, but that all tears were wiped away,
For gladness I could have wept.

"Our children's faces and forms I saw—
There was not a cloud between—
I knew them all, they were fairer grown,
And yet were the same, I ween;
And they came to my side as they would have come
Had we parted yestere'en.

"I looked on each in my dream but now;
The smile of our gallant son,
And the soft blue eyes of my darling Jean,
With our queenly Marion,
And softly shed o'er each fair young head
A golden glory shone.

"They spake to me kind and loving words,
And pointed me far, to where
The dazzling gates of a city stood Upward in the silent air,
And told me the Lord of that happy land
Would give me a portion there.

"Oh, sweet was the calm of my spirit then—
So blessed as I seemed to be,
That I would not have asked another boon
Save this, of a surety,
That thou mightst have shared my joy, good wife,
In that far off country."

Another day and another eve,
And the old man slept again
In his elbow chair when his toil was done,
As he sat by the lattice pane,
And the good wife put her wheel aside
And called him, but all in vain.

She called him twice, and she called him thrice,
Her hand on his shoulder pressed,
But he gave no heed, and his silvery hair
Drooped down on his quiet breast,
For the weary man, with his life toil o'er,
Had passed to the Land of Rest.

The Life of Mrs. Godolphin. By JOHN EVELYN. Edited by the Bishop of Oxford. APPLETONS.

In the spirit of thankfulness we have received the fair Memoir of Mrs. Godolphin, written by good John Evelyn, which the Bishop of Oxford has so gracefully chaperoned into the literary world; and we hasten to slice some extracts from so interesting a work that we may give our readers a taste of its excellence.

It is rare indeed that so great a gap of time lies between the author and his critics: while our pens are commonly employed in commenting on the new-blown volumes of to-day, the produce of living men, we find the worthy Evelyn in his antiquated garb offering us a work as new and unknown as the newest of the press, amidst the spruce and jostling crowd of modern publications. The long dormant memoir of his saintly friend has now for the first time burst "into this breathing world;" and we can well imagine the innocent pride which would have warmed the good man's heart could he have foreseen a Bishop of the Church acting, with evident relish, as the usher to this offspring of his pen. It is not a little remarkable that after such long concealment the manuscript should have found at last a birthday so seasonable and well-timed. Had it burst from its shell at an earlier day, it would have fluttered for a while almost without remark, or at least without effect, and sunk into a premature and undeserved grave. A century ago how few would have had any heart or relish for such a work! But it will not be wasted on this generation: we are wanting now to learn what manner of children the English Church can really rear; we are beginning to look back to the fruits of her former grace; and every fresh saint whose features we are able to scan helps to cheer and strengthen us in our attachment to the Church of our fathers. While a thousand theories and a thousand arguments confuse and stun our ears, we thankfully refresh ourselves with that best rhetoric, the real histories of real life, which prove the richness of our Church's soil.

For our own parts we must confess it is no slight satisfaction to feel ourselves once more on the "terra firma" of real biography amid real people and scenes and facts, after so much ballooning amid the clouds of fiction. We have been drugged and surfeited with tales; and though we delight in imaginary pictures of life, provided they are moderately supplied, it is possible to be drenched as well as cooled by the waters of imagination. We prefer varying the strata of fiction by alternate layers of reality; and we abhor a monopoly of fiction as much as we dislike a despotism of facts. There is something highly discouraging in the constant contemplation of heroes and heroines of air; and after gazing at the vast forms of unreal life through the magnifying glasses of imagination, there is a temptation to sink into inactive despair. When a race of moral giants has been stalking before our eyes, we feel that our powers stretched to tiptoe height would leave us at a dwarfish distance after all. We may like to look at giants, but practical imitation is not attempted: whereas, while the accounts of real life, and memoirs of real persons, once of like passions, with ourselves, may raise a high standard before our minds, we are comforted by the consciousness that that standard may be reached.

But besides something like an overflow of religious tales, these imaginary works have, of late, taken an unsatisfactory and unhealthy turn; they have been dipping into controversy, contrasting one system with another, and conducting theological arguments by the aid of lovers and young ladies amid all the light machinery that belongs to tales. Now, though the temptation may be strong in controversial times to plunge into that troubled sea, yet fiction leaves its proper sphere when it embarks therein. Arguments will be but half carried out; tastes and feelings will be made the chief grounds of conversion from one system to another; contrasts will be partial or incomplete; systems will be judged wholesale by particular instances, and those instances imaginary; the defects of one matched against the virtues of another; the defects exaggerated in this tale, the virtues in that; while even the most conscientious endeavour to represent schools, or opinions, or practices impartially, finding a vent only through the contrast of imaginary characters, will be treated as partial and one-sided. Away with the airy web of imagination when we want thoroughly to argue great religious questions! Fiction should deal with characters, not arguments; and though characters may represent systems, or the effect of systems, yet that indirect mode of commending a system should be used dogmatically, as though there were none other in the world. Direct controversial fictions must be unsatisfying; we could not but despise a person who could be argued out of his Church by a tale; a proselyte so won would be but a doubtful gain; a member so lost would be but a doubtful loss. Another tale might wash out the impression of the first. The able author of "Tremaine" long since made the experiment of tricking his readers into a formal theological discussion through the medium of a novel; but a paper-box cannot be successfully inlaid with iron; and the third volume into which he ingeniously inserted his discussion, will be found commonly to have escaped that peculiar colouring which a well-thumbed novel is apt to gather in its passage through the reading world. The discussion was universally skipped.

It is on these grounds that we lament the appearance of such works, amongst others, as "Margaret Perceval," and "From Oxford to Rome." In the latter production, we know not what to believe or to doubt, as the veins of truth and fiction are continually running into each other. It has, indeed, worked some good without intending it, as it led to a correspondence which made a fresh exposure of the disingenuousness into which Romish principles seem to lead naturally ingenuous minds. For the authoress, we cannot but feel sincere concern; and we can only hope that she may find sufficient strength to extract herself from a position in which her conscience, as far as we can detect its own freer motions, is not altogether at ease, and to return to the bosom of that Mother, towards whom she casts some "longing lingering looks." As regards "Margaret Perceval," it is just one of those cases in which we really desire to see the play of Hamlet with the part of the Prince of Denmark left out. We warmly admire all but the principal portion of the tale; and though the contrast between the Anglican and Romish Church forms the Hamlet of the book, the pivot on which it turns, we look upon it as an intrusive episode, and hasten for our enjoyment to the underplot and lesser scenes which are written with all the author's force and ability. As we rank ourselves among the most cordial of her admirers, and hope we have not only been interested but improved by her former works, we feel less scruple in giving these candid and friendly hints. When we again greet her on the literary field, we hope to see her confining herself to the task, in which she so well succeeds, of simply striving to make the members of our Church more earnest, more holy and consistent in their lives, without reference to any of the over-laden or defective systems that surround us.

We must not, however, keep our readers standing at the threshold of Evelyn's biography, but without further preface, must lead them into the inviting chambers of his fair handy-work. Margaret Blagge, afterwards Mrs. Godolphin, whose Isaac Walton he is, was some years younger than Evelyn, though she died before him; and, accordingly, to use the vague phrase of classical dictionaries, she "flourished" in the shameful reign of Charles II., when the English mind, stiffened and congealed by the fanaticism of the preceding period, and then relaxed by a sudden thaw, broke into the opposite extreme of wild licentiousness. There was, indeed, a remnant of bright souls who served God with the stricter rule, and having passed through troublous times had learnt the comfort as well as "the beauty of holiness." It thus became an age of strong contrasts; what light there was, was very light, while the darkness was very dark; and in the most dissolute portion of our history we are able to number the most able and pious of divines, the most devout of lay members of the Church. Mrs. Godolphin's mother had had her share of troubles; her husband, Colonel Blagge, an unwavering adherent of Charles I., having suffered all the hardships of a steadfast loyalty: but trouble had done its proper work, and Evelyn bears witness, that "she was a woman soe eminent in all the virtues and perfections of her sex, that it were hard to say whether were superior her beauty, witt, or piety." A good mother often repeats herself in her child; and while Mrs. Blagge was able to hand down her natural gifts of wit and beauty to her daughter, she took especial pains to crown and guard those gifts with the principles of piety,—that her child might not be wanting in the best of her own possessions. Her forwardness in the culture of the soul was met by a corresponding aptness on the child's part, "whose extraordinary discernment soone advanced to a great and early sense of religion." On such good ground did the good seed fall, that she was brought to be confirmed by Bishop Gunning at an unusually early age; and the bishop, it appears, "was soe surprised at those early graces he discovered in her, that he thought fit she should be admitted to the Holy Sacrament when she was hardly eleven years of age." An early confirmation and an early communion are often of the very highest service in fixing strong religious feelings, and in ripening the religious character. We often wish that, in particular cases, age was somewhat less considered in the present day, and that young persons of a decidedly religious turn were sooner invited to receive the strong meat of the Church; they would thrive like trees growing on a sunny wall. Margaret Blagge certainly profited by her early use of those means of grace; "for, from that moment forwards," says Evelyn, "young and sprightly as she was, she was observed to live with great circumspection, prescribing to herself a constant method of devotion, and certain days of abstinence, that she might better vacate to holy duties, and gaine that mastery over her appetite, which, with all other passions, she had strangely subdued to my often admiration."

There was full need of all this preparation; for she was soon to be launched on as dangerous waters as a young spirit was ever constrained to cross. After but a short school-time for her soul, she was called upon to act with all the decision of a matured character in scenes that were sufficient to shake the principles of any who were not ripe scholars in heavenly things. The Duchess of York demanded her for her maid of honour; and she was thrust alone upon that glittering court, where religion was a jest, and dissoluteness in honour: "a surprising change of aire," truly exclaims Evelyn, "and a perilous climate for one soe very young as she, and scarcely yett attained to the twelfth year of her age." Even in a court like ours, at this present time, where what is honourable is duly honoured, it must be a strange fiery trial to live for a world to come, and to keep a vivid sense of heavenly things amid all the pomps and pride of life and grandeur that glare upon the mind; though there may be no temptation to be immoral now, yet there must be temptation to become "lovers of the world." To resist being worldly must be the great struggle; and the more so, because this being "worldly," consists not so much in any definite tangible actions, as in a general tone, and turn, and temper of mind. What, then, must have been the trial of a mere girl, when she found herself alone in a vicious court?

She continued with the duchess till her death, when she was transferred to a like office in the household of the queen. She was thus compelled to continue in that "perilous climate" of court life, at a time when those who possessed, like herself, the shining but dangerous gifts of wit and beauty, were wont to desecrate them by dressing up and gilding vice with increased attractions. But when she found herself bound in that glittering captivity, she fastened herself all the more resolutely to the cross; and that she might the better keep a thoughtful undazzled mind amid all that stir of pleasure, she wisely prepared for herself a code of rules bearing upon her particular temptations, which would act as checks or staffs to steady her in that slippery place. It is always interesting to see what means the saints before us have successfully employed in the management of their souls; and Evelyn happily was able to preserve the rules of his friend, the pith of which we shall extract for our reader's benefit:—

"My life, by God's grace, without which I can doe nothing. I must, till Lent, rise att halfe an hour after eight a clock; whilst putting on morning cloathes, say the prayer for death, and the Te Deum: then, presently to my prayers, and soe either dress myselfe, or goe to Church prayers. In dressing, I must consider how little it signifyes to the savinge of my soule, and how foolish 'tis to be angry about a thing so unnecessary. Consider what our Saviour suffered,—O Lord assist me!

"When I goe into the withdrawing roome, lett me consider what my calling is; to entertaine the ladys, not to talke foolishly to men, more especially the king; lett me consider, if a traytor be hateful, she that betrayes the soule of one is much worse;—the danger, the sin of it. Then, without pretending to witt, how quiet and pleasant a thing it is to be silent; or, if I doe speake, that it be to the glory of God.—Lord assist me!

"Att church, lett me mind in what place I am; what about to ask, even the salvation of my soule; to whome I speake,—to the God that made me, redeemed and sanctified me, and can yett cutt me off when he pleases,—O Lord, assist me!

"When I goe to my Lady Falmouth's, I ought to take paines with her about her religion, or else I am not her friend; to shew example by calmness in dispute, in never speaking ill of any body to herr, butt excuseing them rather.

"Goe to the queene allwayes att nine, and then read that place concerning the drawing roome, and lett my man waite for me to bring me word before publike prayers begin. If I find she dines late, come downe, pray and read, namely, that concerning prayer; and think why I read, to benefitt my soule, pass my tyme well, and improve my understanding,—O Lord, assist me!

"Be sure still to read that for the drawing roome in the privy-chamber, or presence, or other place before prayers, and soe again into the drawing roome for an hour or soe; and then slipp to my chamber and divert myselfe in reading some pretty booke, because the queene does not require my waiteing; after this to supper, which must not be much if I have dined well; and att neither meale to eate above two dishes, because temperance is best both for soule and body; then goe upp to the queene, having before read and well thought of what you have written. Amen.

"Sett not upp above halfe an hour after eleavan at most; and as you undress, repeate that prayer againe; but, before, consider that you are perhapps goinge to sleepe your last; being in bedd, repeate your hymne softly, ere you turne to sleepe.

"If I awake in the night, lett me say that (for which she had collected many excellent passages, as I find among her papers) psalm.—Lord, assist me!

"In the morning, wakeing, use a short devotion; and then, as soon as ever you awake, rise immediately to praise him. The Lord assist me!"

These admirable rules, framed by a young person living at a dissipated court, are enough to show how entirely her spirit was divorced from the thoughtless multitudes among whom she moved; and while doubtless there were many to envy her her high place, we are able to see the daily watchfulness and anxieties which that exaltation cost her; behind all the glitter and show of those royal scenes, we may detect the feet of this young girl treading as it were on ploughshares as she strove to walk with God. In another part of her diary we find the peculiar temptations to which she was exposed in such a court still more pointedly alluded to.

"As to pleasure, she says, they are speaking of playes and laughing att devout people: well, I will laugh att myselfe for my impertinencies, that by degrees I may come to wonder why any body does like me; and divert the discourse; and talke of God and morality; avoid those people when I come into the drawing-roome. especially among great persons to divert them; because no raillery almost can be innocent; goe not to the Dutchess of Monmouth above once a weeke, except when wee dress to rehearse, and then carry a booke along with me to read when I dont act, and soe come away before supper.

"Talke little when you are there; if they speak of any body I cant commend, hold my peace, what jest soever they make; be sure never to talke to the king; when they speak filthily, though I be laugh'd att, look grave, remembering that of Micha, there will a tyme come when the Lord will bind up his jewells. Never meddle with others business, nor hardly ask a question; talk not slightly of religion. If you speake any thing they like, say 'tis borrowed, and be humble when commended. Before I speake, Lord, assist me; when I pray, Lord, heare me; when I am praised, God, humble me; may the clock, the candle, every thing I see, instruct me; Lord, cleanse my hands, lett my feete tread thy pathes. Is any body laughed att, say it may be my case; is any in trouble, say, Lord, in justice, I deserve it; but thou art all mercy; make me thankful."

We see here the difficulties of her post, the dread of attracting the notice of the king, of being drawn into frivolous conversation with the courtiers, of even seeming to countenance ridicule of holy things which were habitually ridiculed, of letting her wit carry her away into a mode of discourse of which her conscience disapproved. We cannot but admire the judgment and good sense, as well as the piety, of the secret rules by which she tried to secure herself against the perils of her condition. It seems to have been her aim to avoid all charge of singularity, and yet not to yield even in appearance to the profane spirit that leavened the conversation of the court. She shrunk from any display of religiousness, and yet desired in such ways as became her youth and station boldly to keep her ground as a disciple of Christ. It is at all times difficult, to young persons especially, to mix Christian prudence with Christian zeal, not to do too much or too little in the way of confession. Over-forwardness is as hurtful to the cause of truth as over-backwardness; and it requires no little skill to catch the middle current between rashness and cowardice. Margaret Blagge seems to have united in a singular degree the wisdom of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove; and while with that reserve which earnestness inspires, she would not protrude her religious opinions, yet she showed herself not wanting in courage by refusing to laugh at the irreverent witticisms that flashed around her, by being silent and looking grave, and by bearing the ridicule which such modest piety was sure to provoke. We all know, even in our more reverent day, how much bravery it requires to be silent and wear a grave look when witty sayings tinged with irreverence are uttered in our presence by those who are older or higher in rank than ourselves. And, again, when the fear of God stirs up our courage, and we feel it sinful to seem to approve of a light way of speaking, we are apt to be indiscreet in our way of checking unseemly mirth.

But Margaret Blagge had not only to contend with the external temptations arising from her position at court; she had her own sources of trial seated in herself. Wit and beauty are not at any time easy possessions to use to the glory of God; they are just the qualities that make an instant glitter in the world; they give their owners much power of fascination; they tempt them to spread them out to catch admiration; and hence they often become like very swords cutting the soul off from God and giving it to the world. It is hard either to sheathe such powers or to be religious and serious in wielding them. We need not transport ourselves into the gay palaces of "the merrie monarch," to learn the danger of possessing wit and beauty. We see in these less dangerous times and in more ordinary positions how apt they are to minister to vanity and self-conceit, when there is no temptation whatever to break the rules of decency and outward propriety of life. Oftentimes when we see some little world dazzled by a fair face which is lighted up and still further beautified by a lively wit, we might well wish, for her own sake, that plain looks and a common-place understanding were the portion of the fair conqueror moving so proudly through the fields of victory. To be the idol of a little circle of devotees, to be gazed upon and listened to with marked delight, to draw up like the sun the dew and vapours of constant praise, to be the oracle and star of many admirers, is a sore trial to flesh and blood. And hence we so often behold women the most endowed with natural gifts frittering away their life in a ceaseless round of gaiety, without any serious business or any serious thought, treading a vain and frivolous round of selfish amusement, without any higher or nobler mark set before their souls than "to shine in society."

That Margaret Blagge had these gifts, Evelyn bears witness. "Wee will now then looke at her," he says, "as att Whitehall, whither she came from St. James to waite upon her majesty, after the death of the dutchess, when she was not above sixteen. I had not then indeed the honour to know her; butt I have heard from others, that her beauty and her witt was soe extraordinary improved, as there had nothing been seene more surprizing and full of charmes; every body was in love with, and some almost dyeing for her." In another place, he says she was "looked upon as a little miracle; and indeed there were some addresses made of the greatest persons," and she had "the reputation of a witt, which made her the life of conversation and the pretty miracle at court." But all these natural powers of conversation and vivacity were under constant control; she felt their danger, and was practising continual severity upon herself, that she might not be transported in moments of excitement beyond the bounds of charity and religion. Amid all the desecration of wit around her, she was thus enabled, like Addison afterwards, to turn that keen instrument against vice and folly; and by a constant method of self-government she acquired such mastery over her intellectual gifts, that she attained a singular and happy art of giving a serious turn to her conversation, without appearing to drag in the subject of religion, in a forced unseasonable way.

"She was ever at that sprightly age," says Evelyn, severely carefull how she might give the least countenance to that liberty which the gallants there doe usually assume of talking with less reserve; nor did this eclipse her pretty humour, which was cheerful and easy amongst those she thought worthy her conversation . . . for she ever mingled her freest entertainments with something which tended to serious, and did it in such manner, as allwayes left some impressions extraordinary, even upon those who came perhaps with inclinations to pervert the most harmless conversations; soe it was impossible for any to introduce a syllable which did not comply with the strictest rules of decency. She would often check the vivacity which was naturall, and perfectly became her, for feare of giving occasion to those who lay in waite to deceive."

And after Evelyn knew her, he declares that, "Her conversation was a treat, and I began to admire her temperance, and tooke especial notice, that however wide or indifferent the subject of our discourse was among the rest, she would alwayes divert it to some religious conclusion; and soe temper and season her replies, as shew'd a gracious heart, and that she had a mind taken up with heavenly things."

In the advice she had once occasion to give, we see her own method of discipline.

"As to what wee say ourselves, wee must take care that wee talke not to be the wittiest in the company; to acquire praise to ourselves above our neighbours. We may divert people, and be innocently merry; but then wee must not designe to praise ourselves, nor please ourselves in the thoughts of it, butt in some short and silent prayer, desire God to keep us low in our owne eyes, as Lord, make me poore in spirit, that I may inherit the kingdom of heaven."

It was doubtless this happy faculty of making "vertue and holyness a cheerful thing," that gave her an influence over her companions at court. Her lightness of heart and guileless hilarity gave a visible contradiction to those deceitful maxims of the world which represent religion as an austere and bitter taskmaster. As she had been "a young apostless planting religion in the barren soyle" of the household of the Duchess of York, so this young girl was soon able, in the still more "barren soyle" of King Charles's court, to cast some good seed in the stony places, and to see the fruit of labours that were carried on with as much of tact and discretion as of earnestness and zeal. All this was done without stepping from her place; she did not put herself forward in any prominent way.

Though she herself adhered to our own rule, "that wee should not preach in the withdrawing roome," yet

"Even in the court how many of the greatest there, were made to looke upon religion as a serious thing, yett consistent with their post. . . . There are yet some who owe their tincture to this lady, and will, I hope, retaine it. 'Twere easy to shew whom, by her counsell and address, she had rescued; some from fatal precipices in that giddy station; others whom she has instructed, that were ignorant and careless; some that she gained to a severe course, who were listning to folly and ruine; in a word, it was the pleasure of her life, and the business of the day, to cast about how she might improve it to those advantages."

Theological.

From the Rev. Dr. Ogilby's Matriculation Address, to the Students of the General Theological Seminary.

You, dear brethren, are preparing, (if God will,) to be leaders in this great contest. You, too, have been subjected by competent authority, with your own consent, to a preparatory discipline. Your future success and your final victory will mainly depend, under God, upon your dutiful, faithful, and zealous conformity to the laws of that discipline. Suffer me then to "stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance," and to call your attention to some of the more important of those laws, which you are pledged to obey, and which you may not disobey, save at the peril of your own souls, and of the souls of others.

1. The first, obviously, of these laws, and that on which all the others rest, is that you cultivate personal holiness. "Without holiness, no man shall see the Lord." This, then, is incumbent on every Christian, Layman or Clergyman, whose first duty is "to work out his own salvation." But it is doubly incumbent on those who aspire to the holy Ministry; for one of the chief duties of a Minister of CHRIST towards others, and a chief instrument in his hands, under God, of converting sinners, is "in all things to show himself a pattern of good works;" to "be an example of the believers in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity." If "a Pastor should never undertake to teach a virtue which he has never practised himself," (as a holy Bishop* of our Mother Church, who realized this standard in his conduct, has said,) how large a field of labor is opened to you, and how weighty a responsibility is imposed upon you, by this first law, which binds you to cultivate personal holiness. Doubtless, much of the failure of "the Ministry of reconciliation" to prevail with sinners, is owing to our falling in practice so much below the standard which we set up in our preaching. For, though the unworthiness of the Minister does not make void the Word, or Sacraments, or ordinances of God;† it nevertheless sadly hinders the attainment of their great object, viz., the salvation of souls. For, remember, God sends the Minister, as well as gives the Word, and ordains the Sacrament. The Ministry is a Divine ordinance, designed to promote directly the salvation of souls, and the edification of the Church, through the sanctified sympathies of our regenerate nature. In truth, the generality of men, in spite of all distinctions and denials, will see Christianity, (I had almost said CHRIST,) in its Ministers; will estimate its character by their conduct, and will feel its power through the influence of their lives. No marvel then, that, in view of the awful truth, that the Ministers of CHRIST "watch for souls as they that must give account," St. Chrysostom exclaims, "It is a wonder if any ruler in the Church be saved!"

*Bishop Wilson.

And yet, you must not so interpret this, as if CHRIST confers the grace of ordination, in order to his perdition on whom it is conferred. Far from it. It is, indeed, a "grace," which, rightly esteemed, and duly improved, will ensure us hereafter "a crown of glory." But, if lightly esteemed, or perfunctorily used, will surely prove a curse and a shame! And, as before said, the first step towards qualifying yourselves to esteem and use it, as CHRIST would have you, is to cultivate personal holiness. He, who has striven by self-examination, by self-humiliation, by self-denial, by constant and fervent prayer, by diligent use of all the means of grace, to "work out his own salvation," will have acquired, through God's grace, a lively sense, both of the soul's inestimable value, and of the trials and toils he must encounter, who would rescue it from the dominion of the world, the flesh, and the devil. He will thus be prepared to sympathize with, and to succor others, in the fearful conflict with sin and Satan, even as our "merciful and faithful High Priest" "Himself hath suffered, being tempted," that he might be "able to succor them that are tempted."

And let me in this connexion caution you against one of Satan's wiles, whereby he often doubtless hinders the growth in grace of those who minister in holy things, as well as of those who are preparing for that Ministry. Since most of our daily studies and pursuits have some bearing on the work of the Ministry, there is danger of our being tempted half unconsciously to ascribe to them a sort of sacramental character, and to substitute them, in greater or less degree, for those positive religious observations and devotional exercises, which others cannot evade on this plea. And yet a little reflection will show the fallacy of such a notion; for there is danger on the other hand, that the constant regularity of our ordinary duties in the work of the Ministry, or in preparing for it, will cause us to contract a mechanical habit in their performance, and to go through them as a mere matter of routine. This, indeed, will certainly be the case, unless we try our spirit and motives by constant self-examination, and unless we quicken our minds and animate our hearts by continual prayer to God; so that we shall feel in the performance of every daily duty, that we are standing and acting in His presence, and under His eye, whose honored agents and stewards we either are, or aim to be; and to whom we must soon render, before men and angels, an account of our stewardship.

Your obligation and responsibility in this behalf, dear brethren, are enhanced by the consideration, that through the favour of God, and the provident care of His Church, you are in the enjoyment of singular opportunities and advantages for the cultivation of personal holiness. Beware lest you fail to see and own this fact. There is no position or situation in this world that has not some drawback or difficulty. Such, no doubt, may be found here. But surely, dear brethren, it is your fault, and will be your folly and crime, if you fail to discover and thankfully to acknowledge your singularly great and almost unequalled privileges. Retired from the din and bustle of the world, released from the burden of its cares, set apart to sacred study and devotion, your path of duty marked out for you by the Church, guides provided to aid you in pursuing it, God's blessing invoked by her each night and morning on your daily course, her watchful and anxious eye ever on you to warn and to incite; if you fail to grow in grace and in personal fitness for the holy office to which you aspire, you may not plead your want of opportunity in bar of judgment. The fulness of your privileges will, in that case, be a grievous aggravation of your fault, and of your punishment. See to it, then, dear brethren, as you value your own souls, as well as those that may hereafter be committed to you, that you neither disparage nor neglect the means and helps here provided, to aid you in the cultivation of personal holiness.

II. The second great law of all spiritual discipline, is one that is doubly binding upon you as Candidates for Holy Orders, viz: the law of humility and of submission to just authority. This was the very first law to which He, whose disciples you are, and whose Ministers you aspire to become, paid voluntary obedience. The law of personal holiness He could not otherwise than obey, seeing that by virtue both of His Divine nature and of the Divine conception of His humanity, he was absolutely "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners." But He, who "thought it not robbery to be equal with God," when He entered upon His mysterious work of love, voluntarily "humbled Himself" by "taking upon Him the form of a servant," and in that capacity He chose to submit His will to the will of His FATHER, who sent Him. "Lo! I come to do Thy will, O God!" And herein He has left us an "example that we should follow His steps."

Nor is it enough for us to follow only what we take to be God's will. This indeed would be too often to follow our own will, substituted, at the suggestion of Satan or of our own deceitful hearts, for God's will. Our blessed LORD could not mistake His FATHER's will, for "He and the FATHER were One." His submission was therefore perfect and entire, He Himself being the interpreter of the Father's will. But submission is so alien to our nature, which, while yet untainted, fell through pride, that to secure our humility and submission, we must, in many cases, give heed to some less prejudiced and more competent interpreter of God's will than our own minds and consciences can be. Not indeed so that our minds shall be slack in the attempt to study and to understand His will; or our consciences dull or slow to apply to the regulation of our lives, whatever we surely discover of God's will, by the aid of His Word and SPIRIT; but so that, in all doubtful cases, we may submit cheerfully to the arbitrament of the Church, or of those whom she has set over us; and that in all cases, where she has plainly spoken, we shall promptly and dutifully obey, at the sacrifice, if need be, of our own inclinations, feelings, and opinions. Thus shall we have a sure test of our readiness to follow our LORD, in His example of humbling Himself, and of submitting His will to His Father's.

This law of humility and submission, from which no Christian, of whatever office or grade in the Church, is exempt, is especially binding, dear brethren, upon you, who are placed by the Church, with your own consent, in a state of pupilage, under teachers and governors, for the very purpose, among others, of testing and maturing your humility, docility, and submission. To this end the Church has made you, in the first place, subject to the paternal discretion of the Bishops to whose jurisdiction you severally belong, and has recognized in them the right to receive you as Candidates or not, at their option, and to sever that relation whenever they see fit. This she does, not merely in recognition of their vested rights, but for your spiritual advantage, that you may be taught the lesson of dependence upon, and submission to, a will other than your own. And then, since your Bishops cannot be always with you to conduct your training themselves, she has provided for that purpose this Seminary, in which, with your Bishop's consent, you are placed under the guidance of teachers whom she appoints, and are required to pursue a course of study, and to submit to a discipline which she has marked out. She has thus made adequate provision for hedging in your will, and for preventing your minds and hearts from running riot, to the injury of yourselves, and others of her children.

It is true that a perverse and stubborn will may break, or slip off, the easy yoke which CHRIST and His Church impose for its restraint, and that the mind and heart of those whom such a will impels, will reject the mild checks which her maternal discipline lays on them. But to such, I speak not: thanks to God's grace, I speak in the assurance that there are none such here. You own, I know, the obligation of the law I am discussing: I only seek to help you to perceive its full scope, and to move you herein "to be strong in the grace that is in CHRIST JESUS."

Padre Scio's New Testament.

MR. EDITOR:—

Having had occasion, a few days since, to consult a Spanish version of the New Testament, a copy from the press of the "American Bible Society," was placed in my hands. I had but turned over a page when strange to say, the words "Haced penitencia," do penance (Mat. iii. 2.) stared me in the face: with the help of a concordance I found that many other passages rendered the same word, as here. Upon further examination I found that the same version, in Luke i. 28, has the Hail Mary as devout as any Romanist could wish, "Dios te salve, llena de gracia."

In Matt. xxv. 59, the words y los ancianos, "and the elders," are omitted after "los sacerdotes."

It also omits a whole sentence, in Rom. xi. 6, after the words, "la gracia ya no es gracia."

The original of Ephes. v. 32, is translated, "Este sacramento,"—instead of "misterio,"—by which marriage is called a sacrament. Again, it countenances the Romish error of the worship of images, rank idolatry, in the famous passage in Heb. xi. 21, which it renders, "y adoro la altura de su vara," and adored the top of his rod, whereas the true reading would be "adoro sobre la altura, &c.," adored upon the top, &c.

These, Mr. Editor, are a few of the peculiarities of this translation, published by Protestants. A moment's reflection convinced me that the copy, from which I quote is no other than a rendering of the Roman Vulgate, which conviction was confirmed by the advertisement on its title page, which owns its translator to be the Papal Bishop of Veggovia. /S/

It may be proper to add, in this connection, that many of the errors in this Spanish version, are to be found in the French translation published by the same Society. What a strange inconsistency! A Society pretending to be protestant against Romish errors, prints for general distribution a version which many believe to be in important points erroneous! An association calling itself exclusively protestant to adopt and circulate the Romish translation calling upon christians to do penance, is certainly a development unthought of in these days.

A protestant society, for the distribution of "the unadulterated word of God," instructs "the ignorant and foolish," in the Romish heresy of adoration of images, appealing to the example of the faithful Jacob! Hear what the Rheims Theologians say in this place, "Some translators who are no friends to this relative honor (image worship) have corrupted the text by translating it, 'he worshipped leaning upon the top of his staff,' as in our authorized version. Does the 'American Bible Society' subscribe to this annotation of the Roman? I presume not; although it follows the Roman text."

Again, protestant gentlemen, who often profess a holy horror of any tampering with the Sacred writings, publish a version of the word of God, which omits portions of the text, maintained by the same gentlemen, in their English publications, as genuine.

Now, it is not a pleasant duty, by any means, to speak thus of men, who are sincere in their efforts to spread the knowledge of the blessed Book of God, but a regard for them, as well as a reverence for the Holy Scriptures, impel me. If they have not seen, and taken steps to correct the oversight, it is surely time, that their attention should be publicly directed to it.

Adrian's Address to his Soul. — see p. 28. p. 78

MR. EDITOR:—

Your correspondent, "Jam," is mistaken in ascribing to Toplady the translation, in your last paper, of this "celebrated sportive effusion." Toplady's paraphrase, or rather accommodation, begins (if I mistake not) with the line—

"Deathless principle, arise!"

It is more christian in matter and developement than Pope's accommodation of the original, but not as finished:—neither of them says what Adrian said. The version quoted by your correspondent—may rank as a translation, tolerably close for rhythm and rhyme, and in the want, among people of our tongue, of equivalent words and of course equivalent notions for the Latin diminutives. It was simply intended to show, not how a christian ought to regard his soul, but how an imperial heathen regarded his; affording the reader, in such English as occurred during its hasty composition, the half-jesting half-philosophical caress with which the emperor would pet the half-believed immortality he bore within him. This translation appeared for the first time in the Churchman more than fourteen years ago, and afterwards in the Protestant Episcopalian, vol. v. p. 178. And the versifier is well known to you, being your very humble servant the subscriber.

"Thou gentle little thing of air"—

Not only does the want of English diminutives, in which lies the spirit of the original effusion, render it difficult to translate the piece accurately, and much more to put it in respectable metre; but the semi-sceptical tone of Adrian, as to whether the soul be a soul, enhances the difficulty by limiting the choice of language. Adrian does not even call the soul a creature: that sweet word for poetry would infer a Creator, which idea the original contains not; the soul being there accounted a mere existence, the mere "fixed fact" of a thing separable from the body. And what sort of a thing? simply "animula;" which means a dear or "poor little soul" or spiritual substance, or may mean, by tension of the context, and in grosser infidelity, a "little breath" or modicum of airy substance. The figure called personification will make the latter sense admissible, and the bantering tone (it may be) of the loving expressions goes far to justify it. There are therefore theological impediments, as well as verbal, to an accurate yet flowing version.

On reading again my scrap in your paper, I was beguiled into another hasty attempt,—just to try what I could do with some of the fond diminutives, though without the ipsis-ima verba for them in English. The result, I fear, is even more deplorable than the former; and well it may be, for the very conceptions, in their doting exiguity, are not vernacular with us. Edification, however, may be gleaned from this petty operoseness, in viewing and pondering the extreme diminutiveness of the creed of a pagan philosopher, and comparing it with the ample and clear faith of those who are "taught of God."

Asking your indulgence for the re-insertion of the two first, I subjoin the three pieces—the Latin—my former attempt—and the "counterfeit presentment" just moulded.

Ever moving,
Ever roving,
Thy body's guest and fellow here,
Art going? Tell me where:

And cold, thy suppleness will fail,
Thou'lt naked be,
When gone from me;
And I shall lose thy wonted glee.

NO. 3.

Thou little darling living thing,
Tireless on thy tiny wing,
Ever here, yet ever free,
Ever there, and yet with me;
Minute and bland and gentle dear,
Thy body's guest and fellow here;
Art off in earnest? Tell me where,
To what regions, sky or air?
Poor slender sprite, then slender both and pale,
Unwarmed by me thy radiant glow will fail,
Instantly frigid,
Finally rigid;
Weak shade, thus alone!
Long fondled inmate, thou wilt houseless be,
Naked, lov'd phantom, when unclothed of me:
And I, left alone,
I ever must lose thy perpetual glee.

There, reader,—that is all,—all that Adrian had in his mind, —though possibly not all that he had in his heart. And now, methinks, I hear worthy "Jam" exclaim, Eheu! jam satis! Quite right: 'tis but a small affair,—far too small to be an apology for my obtrusiveness. The following account of one of our most important Diocesan Institutions, was prepared by the Editor of this paper, at the request of the Bishop of New Jersey, for "the Missionary." It was furnished in answer to an intelligent Correspondent (of the Missionary) in the far West desiring information as to the Institutions, and operations of the Church, here and in England.

THE BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

My dear Bishop: At your request, I have compiled the following brief account of this noble and important Institution of the Church. My sources of information have been the original records of the Society, and all its Annual Reports; kindly placed at my disposal, by the present zealous and efficient Secretary, James M. Aertsen, Esq. I have performed this duty, with the greater readiness, because, while I think there is no subordinate institution which has greater claims upon the general sympathies of the Church, I am also convinced that the merits of this excellent Society are not as widely acknowledged, nor even as extensively known, as the interests concerned demand.

It is regarded, often, as a mere local or diocesan Institution; and, consequently, the Diocese, which is thought to be the sole recipient of its benefits is left to bear the chief burden of its support. It will be one object of this short history to show, from facts, that this Society is Catholic, in its object, as well as its name. Bishop White was indeed the Diocesan of Pennsylvania, and lived in Philadelphia: but what American Churchman would allow, that the interest which attaches to his venerable name, is confined to these narrow limits? Who, in the wide spreading borders of our Church, does not feel that it is his right and privilege to have a portion in all that bears this goodly name? And, with a view to secure this general interest, the founders of this Society gave it a name which they judged would appeal to the warmest sympathies of the Church at large; and, at the same time express its noble object, which is, to benefit the whole Church, guided only by a desire to supply those parts whose need was greatest: therefore, they called it THE BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY. This is proved by the first fact which meets our notice, in the history of this Society's origin. The design was suggested at a meeting called to consider the wants of the Church in one of our remotest dioceses. The incipient measures, which gave rise to this Society, occurred upon the day marked by the consecration of a zealous and devoted Bishop of the Church.

The Rt. Rev. Dr. Otey, having been invited, on the evening of his consecration, (January 14, 1834,) by the executive Committee of the Domestic and Foreign-Missionary Society, to give a public statement of the condition and prospects of the Church in Tennessee, a meeting was held for that purpose in St. James' Church. In the addresses made on this occasion, the importance of the Prayer Book, as a ready means of providing for the spiritual wants of the destitute portion of our Church, was referred to; and Dr. DeLancey made some remarks, upon the good which might be effected by a society for its free distribution as a Tract. "The Rev. Dr. Bedell," (says the first Secretary Dr. Littell, in 'a historical sketch of the preliminary meetings,' recorded among the minutes,) "expressed himself as much pleased with the idea; which he said had not before occurred to him. And it was very favorably received by all present. The want of a society, for the distribution of the Prayer Book, having long been felt, and an impulse being thus given, it was determined by several lay gentlemen, to make an effort for its formation. A meeting was accordingly held on the 6th of February, at the house of Mr. William H.

Newbold, from whom the proposition came in the first instance, to take into consideration the expediency of the measure." There were present, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Onderdonk; the Rev. Messrs. Boyd, James, and Morton; Messrs. Musgrave, Aertsen, Welsh, Wayne, Newbold, and Dr. Littell.

After discussing the outlines of a Constitution presented, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Onderdonk, Drs. DeLancey and Bedell, the Rev. Mr. James, Dr. Littell, and Mr. Newbold, were appointed a Committee to form a Constitution. This Committee reported to a meeting, held on the 13th of February, Bishop Onderdonk in the chair. They submitted "a Constitution, which, after having been read, deliberated upon, and amended, was adopted." A public meeting was at this time agreed upon, to be held in Christ Church; for the purpose of bringing this object before the notice of the Church.

This meeting was held on Tuesday, the 12th of February, 1834, and a large assembly convened at this time. Bishop White presided; Bishops Onderdonk and Doane being also in the Chancel.

The object of the meeting was stated, and earnestly commended, in addresses, by the venerable Presiding Bishop, and by the Assistant Bishop of Pennsylvania. The following Resolutions were then offered, with appropriate remarks, by the Rev. Dr. Bedell:

"Resolved, That the lapse of ages has but tended to strengthen the conviction that the Prayer Book is one of the distinguishing excellencies of the Church to which, under God, is mainly attributable her remarkable exemption from 'false doctrine, heresy and schism,' in times past, and her prospects of 'unity, peace and concord,' for the time to come.

By the Rev. Dr. Mead:

"Resolved, That, while it is the duty of all Christians to extend to others the inestimable privileges which they enjoy, the obligation is the more imperative upon Episcopalians, from their possession of a Liturgy, inimitable in its beauty and sublimity, and admirably adapted to all the purposes of true devotion."

The Committee appointed to report a Constitution, and suitable persons as officers under it, having retired for this purpose, the meeting was addressed by Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, who had been requested to do so, and who presented the following resolution.

"Resolved, That the free circulation of the Prayer Book, is one of the principal means of promoting the cause of religion, and the Church; and that the destitution of many parts of our Atlantic States, and the rising dioceses of the West constitute an appeal which should awaken the sympathies and call forth the liberality of Episcopalians."

The Committee through its Chairman, James S. Smith, Esq., reported a Constitution, and also the names of persons as officers, which were adopted.

The first article of this adopted Constitution, expresses the object and scope of the Society, "Article 1st. This Society shall be called 'The Bishop White Prayer Book Society.' Its object shall be the circulation of the Prayer Book within this Diocese, and also wheresoever the Society may deem it expedient."

By Article 2nd, the Society is made to "consist of all Episcopalians residing in the City and County of Philadelphia, who pay annually such sum as shall be appointed by the Board of Managers."

"The contribution of twenty-five dollars, at any one time, shall constitute a member for life; and a contribution of fifty dollars at any one time, shall constitute a Patron, with the rights of membership in both cases."

In Article 3d, it is provided that "Churches out of the City and County of Philadelphia, may form auxiliaries to contribute to the funds of this Society." This admirable provision of the Society, which would give it great efficiency, if carried out, has been little regarded by the Church at large: as we shall show by an abstract from the statistics of the Society.

To this account of the origin, object, and Constitution of this Society, might be added a most interesting history of its particular transactions, during the fourteen years of its existence, drawn from the annual reports and printed minutes. The former documents, as we might expect, from their able authors, are most valuable papers, and furnish a rich store of important information. It is not our present lot to know the issue of such efforts, nor is it within our province to judge of results which the all-seeing eye alone can discover; yet there is little hazard in saying, that this noble Society, from the good accomplished by it, stands in the very first rank of the Institutions of the Church. And it is mournful to think, that it largely shares the withering influence, felt by all our Institutions, in days when the fountain and springs from which that charity, which is twice blessed, flows, are too much dried up in the Christian heart. The following statement, taken at some pains, from the annual reports, will show how freely the benefits of this Society have been bestowed: and how limited and contracted, in proportion, have been the sources from which its means have been received. With such a sparing hand have these returns been made, that at times the Board of Managers have been obliged, partially to refuse the most urgent calls, or altogether to stop the distribution of Prayer Books.

During the fourteen years of its existence, "The Bishop White Prayer Book Society" has distributed Prayer Books to the following dioceses and objects. As the list has been made hastily, and by one not much used to figures of this sort, its general accuracy alone can be vouched for.

Appropriations of Prayer Books from 1834 to 1847, inclusive:

Pennsylvania,	29,325		59,464

We leave these figures to speak for themselves, and tell the history of how much this Society has done for the best interests of man, without reference to locality; and how little has been done for it, in return, except in the immediate vicinity. If none can tell the history of a single Prayer Book, who can declare the amount of good which must have resulted from the thousands of this precious volume, distributed by this noble Christian charity? If an object, and a name, which appeal to the warmest sympathies of the Church, could secure the liberal and free-hearted support of the Church, then we may safely conclude that she has no subordinate Institution more worthy of the regard of her members, than "the Bishop White Prayer Book Society."

DR. HAMPDEN'S CASE—ITS TRUE ISSUE.—We have received long communications on both sides of this vexed question. After mature deliberation, we are convinced that our duty will best be discharged by giving only a history of the case, derived from the English Journals, that our readers may judge for themselves, of its merits. There are strong symptoms that if we open our columns to correspondents, we will revive a Transatlantic edition, with additions, of the Hampden controversy.

In order to a right understanding of this interesting case, the question at issue, should be borne in mind. This is not—"is Dr. Hampden a heretic,"—but "is the prima facie evidence of his unsoundness in the faith such as to warrant the demand for an inquiry on this head, and to make the refusal of such an inquiry, by the Crown and by Dr. Hampden himself, an act of tyranny and injustice to the Church?"

None will deny that a Bishop ought to be free from just suspicion of unsoundness in the Faith, as well as of want of piety. So universally has this been admitted by all free Churches, that in the primitive age, before the interference of imperial dictation, the clergy and laity either freely elected their Bishop, subject to the veto of the neighboring Bishops; or the Bishops of the province elected him, with the concurrence of the clergy and laity. And the mere dissent of either of these parties, without assigning the specific reasons, made the nomination of the other party a nullity. Our own Church has followed this same rule in substance. In England however the State has destroyed the freedom of elections, guarantied to the Church by the very first article of Magna Charta. Since

Henry VIII., the sovereign (following herein Papal precedent) usurped the prerogative of election, leaving to the Chapter, mockery of their ancient right, only the empty form. The redress left the Church in case of improper appointments to the Crown, is to oppose the consummation of the nomination, petitioning the throne to withdraw it; or by objecting formally at the "Confirmation" of the election, and procuring legal inquiry into the merits of the case.

And this brings us back to Dr. H. The real question is, repeat, "is the prima facie evidence of his unsoundness in faith, such as to warrant the remonstrances and petitions addressed to the Crown or its Minister, to induce; either the withdrawal of the nomination, or its suspension till after inquiry had been made respecting Dr. H.'s orthodoxy; and failing this, does it justify the effort made at the ceremony of "Confirmation" to compel by legal process the inquiry refused by the Minister of the Crown?"

Now we fearlessly maintain, that the prima facie evidence against Dr. H. (whether he be really unsound in the faith or not) is strong enough, not only to justify such petitions, remonstrances, and legal resistance, but to make each and all, in their order, necessary to the safety of the Church. Let it be borne in mind that the Episcopate was not ordained for the honour of an individual. No man has a right to be a Bishop; but the Church has a right to orthodox, learned and godly Bishops. The burden of proof has always, in all free Churches, been thrown upon the Candidate, or (which is the same thing) upon those who nominate him. Were the Church of England free from ministerial tyranny, the mere dissent of fourteen Bishops (to say nothing of the Dean of Hereford and of a vast multitude of the clergy and laity of that and the other Dioceses, of every shade of opinion,) would at once have made Dr. Hampden's election a nullity, without any investigation whatever. And yet, at most unjustly, on the principle that the Candidate for such an office should be generally known and approved. And yet when fourteen of the Bishops (themselves the nominees of the Crown) suggest reconsideration and inquiry, and when petitions for inquiry from every quarter of the Church go up to the throne, the Minister of the day presumptuously and insultingly opposes his individual judgment of Dr. Hampden to this consent of Bishops, Clergy, and Laity, and refuses all investigation, driving the election through by force of legalized tyranny.

Dr. Hampden may be as orthodox as St. Athanasius, or as St. Paul in point of fact. But seeing that his written publications have been the subject matter of formal censure years ago; and that they have ever since subjected him to suspicion, on the part of men of all parties, of unsoundness in the doctrine of the Trinity itself; that he has not only not retracted what he has written, but has recently reaffirmed it all; and that a large body of the Bishops, Clergy and laity of the Church (with a unanimity unknown in England since Sancroft and his noble compeers led the opposition to James II.'s madness) have raised the question of his orthodoxy and called for investigation; we are bound to hold that the attempt on his part and on that of the Minister to throw dust in people's eyes by the false imputation of personal and party hate to his impugnors, and the refusal of investigation on this score, betray the consciousness of a bad cause; and that his consecration, without such inquiry, will be an outrage upon the rights of the Church of England, and a violation of liberty of conscience, so flagrant as to impose upon the members of the English Church the duty of striving forthwith, until success crown their efforts, to reclaim and recover for their Apostolic Church her ancient freedom.

It will appear at once, from this view of the case, that all argument going to prove the orthodoxy or heterodoxy of Dr. H., is beside the immediate question. For this reason (as well as because we cannot consent to fill the columns of the Banner with controversial matter), we must decline a second communication from "A. M. of Ch. Ch., Oxford."* This communication, which would fill some columns of the Banner, consists entirely of extracts from Archdeacon Hare's pamphlet, one of the legion of publications on this subject. If we gave this, we would feel it our duty to give also the able Review of this pamphlet from the English Churchman, which would occupy some eight columns of our paper, and which would show conclusively how little real weight this individual defence of Dr. Hampden had, in opposition to the load of evidence against him. And on this account we also respectfully decline to publish a very strong and able communication against Dr. Hampden from one of the most distinguished Presbyters of the Church.

For the same reason we have not published Dr. H.'s own letter in self vindication; though there is this additional objection to its publication, viz, that it affirms that his present opinions are in keeping with his former writings, which have excited the prevalent doubts respecting his soundness in the faith.

In confirmation of the above views we take the following extract from the conclusion of "the English Churchman's" review of Archdeacon Hare's pamphlet.

And what do Dr. Hampden's opponents want? Merely that Dr. Hampden may be tried according to the regular forms of our Ecclesiastical Law. The Archdeacon himself admits (p. 4.) that "this is a simple and easy course, honest and straight-forward." Why then are Dr. Hampden's accusers (they do not condemn him, that must be left for the proper judge to do, if he is guilty) to be abused for wishing to take this course? If "it would greatly add to his peace of mind," why have proceedings against him been quashed in the Diocesan Court of Oxford? The fact is, that Dr. Hampden is using every means to avoid a trial, for he has a pretty good notion what the sentence would be. And the Ministry are using every artifice to get him made Bishop of Hereford without an investigation of the heresies alleged against him. Is this "an honest and straight-forward course?" If he is an innocent man, why does he not meet his accusers in open Court, like the Bishop-Elect of Manchester? Whatever Dr. Hampden and the Ministers may think, the Church will never be satisfied till Dr. Hampden is fairly tried in open Court. If he is found innocent let him be Bishop of Hereford by all means, but not otherwise.

We now give from history, as found in the English Churchman, the last act performed in this drama or tragedy.

DR. HAMPDEN.—CONFIRMATION OF THE ELECTION OF DR. HAMPDEN.—This important event took place on Tuesday. The preliminary proceedings, in Doctors' Commons, were as follows. The Chancellor of the Diocese of London, (Dr. Lushington) and the Master of the Faculties (Sir J. Dodson) having entered in procession what is called the Dining Room of the Arches Court, were shortly followed by Dr. Hampden, attended by Mr. Underwood, the Chapter Clerk of Hereford, and Drs. Bayford and Twiss, as his Advocates.

The introduction of his "Lordship-elect" to the court having taken place,

Mr. Underwood said:—

"May it please your Lordship, I exhibit my proxy for the Rev. the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, and present to your Lordship a certificate of your being elected to be Bishop and Pastor of the said See; and pray and once again earnestly request and entreat that your Lordship will be pleased to give your consent to the said election."

Dr. Hampden then read the following:—

"In the name of God, Amen. I, Renn Dickson Hampden, Doctor in Divinity, regularly and lawfully named and elected Bishop and Pastor of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, agree to accept of such election of myself and my person, as made and celebrated on the part and behalf of the Rev. the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, earnestly requested and entreated, trusting in the clemency of Almighty God, to accept of such election of myself and my person, so as is premised, made, and celebrated to the honor of Almighty God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and do give my assent and consent in this writing to the said election."

Dr. Hampden then affixed his signature "R. D. Hereford (elect)," to the document.

All the parties then proceeded to Bow Church, Cheapside, in which an immense crowd had assembled, long before the time appointed for the commencement of the service. The galleries, the nave, and the aisles were crammed, with the exception of those pews which were set apart for the use of those immediately concerned in the proceedings of the day. Even the pulpit was, in course of time, filled with laymen. Among those who were present we observed—the Dean of Hereford, the Rev. Dr. Vivian, Rev. Dr. Wright, Rev. Messrs. Hughes, Hessey, E. Hawkins, E. Repton, Bennett, Jackson, Scott, Dodsworth, Webb, Irons, Richards, Wade, C. Miller, Jebb, Eden, M'Leod, Pocock, Bittlestone, Blunt, Wix, Powell, and, indeed, a host of Clergymen. A few minutes before eleven o'clock the (Jew) alderman of the ward, Mr. Salomans, made his way through the crowd; and took his seat in the corporation pew; and shortly afterwards the Vicar-general of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Burnaby, came from the vestry in his robes, accompanied by his assessors, Dr. Lushington and Sir J. Dodson, who all three took their seats at a table placed in front of the reading-desk, near to which were seated, in the middle aisle, Mr. F. H. Dyke, principal registrar of the province of Canterbury; the advocates for the Chapter of Hereford, Dr. Bayford and Dr. Twiss; Mr. Glenny, proctor for Dr. Hampden; Mr. John Burder, of Parliament-street, Dr. Hampden's secretary; Dr. Adams, Dr. Harding, and Dr. R. Phillimore, advocates for the opposers; and Messrs. Townsend and Roberts, the proctors who instructed them.

Shortly after eleven o'clock the Venerable Archdeacon Hamilton entered the reading desk, and commenced the Litany Service. At its conclusion the commissioners took their seats as at Doctors' Commons, the Vicar-general (Dr. Burnaby) as President, having Dr. Lushington at his right hand, and Sir John Dodson on the left.

Mr. Francis Hart Dyke, Principal Registrar for the province, read the letter from his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury appointing the commission.

The Proctor, (Mr. Underwood) then addressed the Commissioners as follows:—

"Right Worshipful Sirs—I exhibit my proxy for the Rev. the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, and make myself a party for them, and do present unto you the letters patent of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, issued under the great Seal of Great Britain, for the confirmation of the election of the Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden to be Bishop and Pastor of the said Episcopal See of Hereford, and do pray that the same may be read."

Dr. Burnaby—Let the said letters patent be read. They were read.

The Proctor said—I humbly pray that you will be pleased to take upon you the duty of the said confirmation, and to decree that it be proceeded in according to the form of the said letters patent, and in the exigency of the law.

The Vicar-General replied—In obedience to the command of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, we do take upon us the duty of the Confirmation of the said election, and do decree that it be proceeded in according to the force, form, and effect of the said letters patent, in the presence of Francis Hart Dyke, notary public, principal registrar of the province of Canterbury.

The Bishop elect was here conducted from his pew to the table, and requested to seat himself at the table opposite the Vicar-General.

The Proctor then, standing by the side of the Bishop Elect, said—I present unto you the Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden elected Bishop and Pastor of the Episcopal See of Hereford, and do here judicially produce his Lordship; and as Proctor for the said Dean and Chapter, do exhibit an original mandate together with a certificate thereupon endorsed, touching the execution of the said mandate, against all and singular opposers, and do pray they may be publicly called.

The Vicar-General—Let the opposers be publicly called.

Mr. Barber, the Apparitor-General, made the following proclamation:—"Oyez, oyez, oyez, all ye who may, or shall, or will object to the Consecration of the Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden, Doctor in Divinity, as Lord Bishop of the Episcopal See of Hereford, now come forward and state your objections, and you shall be heard."

Mr. Richard E. Townsend, Proctor, then stepped forward and said—Right Worshipful Sir, I appear for the Rev. Richard Webster Huntley, Clerk, Vicar of Alberbury, in the county of Salop and Diocese of Hereford, Master of Arts of the University of Oxford; the Rev. John Jebb, Clerk, Rector of Peterstow, in the county and Diocese of Hereford, Master of Arts of Trinity College, Dublin; and the Rev. William Frederick Powell, Clerk, Perpetual Curate of Cirencester, in the county of Gloucester, Master of Arts of the University of Cambridge, and exhibit proxies under their hands and seals respectively, and declare I oppose the Confirmation of the election of Doctor Renn Dickson Hampden, Lord-elected of the office of dignity of Bishop of Hereford.

The Vicar-General.—Have you your objections in writing?

Mr. Townsend having turned to procure his objections.

The Vicar-General.—I have to state that we are acting here under the mandate of the Crown, issued pursuant to the provisions of the statute of the twenty-fifth of Henry the Eighth, chap. 20, and consequently we conceive that we are bound to proceed without suffering any hindrance or delay.

Mr. Townsend.—Right worshipful Sir, I bring in a libel in writing—

Dr. Lushington.—You have no right to bring in a libel; you are not permitted to appear here; and, Mr. Townsend, you know well that, according to Ecclesiastical practice, you can have no right to bring in a libel till you are permitted to appear.

Dr. Addams.—I appear for—

Dr. Bayford.—(on the part of the Dean and Chapter)—I object to my learned friend being heard at all. The objections have already been disposed of. My learned friend appears for no one, and, therefore, according to the practice of the Court, he cannot be allowed to proceed.

Dr. Burnaby.—On what do you wish to be heard, Dr. Addams?

Dr. Addams.—On the statute.

Dr. Burnaby.—We confine you to that.

Dr. Addams.—Certainly, I shall not address a word to the Court on any other subject.

Dr. Lushington.—You must distinctly understand that you are only to argue the question, whether, notwithstanding this statute, you have any right to be heard at all.

Dr. Addams.—I am aware of that, and shall strictly confine myself to that question. I shall now proceed to consider the question; and I undertake to satisfy the Court, unless I am very much mistaken, that according to the true construction of this statute, it has nothing whatever to do with your proceedings, and certainly I shall be surprised if the ultimate decision of the Court is, that it is incompetent to entertain these objections urged against the said elected Bishop of Hereford, and if the Court decline to entertain these objections by reason of, or on the supposition that by so doing they may fall within the penalties of præmunire.

Dr. Bayford.—I appear here for the Dean and Chapter, and I must oppose the discussion of this question.

Dr. Addams.—I beg pardon; I am not to be interrupted—I know your pugnacity.

Dr. Bayford.—My learned friend stands here for no one. There is no party present, and the Court has already declared that it will hear no one.

Dr. Lushington.—No, no, Dr. Bayford; we have said nothing of the kind. We have only declared that we will not hear Mr. Townsend; and Dr. Addams is about to speak on the question whether he has a right to be heard or not. &c., &c.

After this question had been fully discussed, Dr. Lushington gave the following decision.

"I shall follow this up no further than by expressing my conviction, as one of the Commissioners, without saying that any one would incur the penalty of præmunire, that I conceive it my duty to refuse to allow the proposition which is now offered, and to proceed to the Confirmation of Dr. Hampden."

Sir John Dodson entirely concurred with what had been stated by his brother Commissioners.

Dr. Burnaby having directed the confirmation to be proceeded with in the usual way.

The Proctor said—I accuse the contumacy of all and singular persons cited, intimated, publicly called, and not appearing, and on pain of such their contumacy pray that they and every of them be precluded from the means of further opposing against the said election, the manner thereof, or the person elected in this behalf; and also that it may be decreed to be proceeded to further acts in this business of Confirmation, the absence or contumacy of the persons so cited, intimated, publicly called, and not appearing in anywise notwithstanding, and I porrect a schedule which I pray to be read.

Dr. Burnaby having read the schedule and signed it,

The Proctor proceeded—In pain of the contumacy of all and singular persons cited, intimated publicly called, and not appearing, I give this summary petition in writing, which I pray to be admitted; and that it be decreed to be proceeded summarily and plainly; and that a term be assigned me to same immediately.

Dr. Burnaby replied—We do admit this, your summary petition, so far as the same may by law be admitted, and do decree that it may be proceeded summarily and plainly, and we do assign you a term to prove this your summary petition immediately.

The Proctor then said—In pain of the contumacy of all and singular persons cited, intimated, publicly called, and not appearing, and in support of proof of the matters contained in my said summary petition, I exhibit a certificate touching and concerning the election of the aforesaid Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden, Doctor in Divinity, to the said election, and her majesty's letters patent before read, and I allege that all and singular the matters set forth in the said exhibits respectively were and are true, and so had done as therein contained, and I pray all of them to be admitted, and that a term be assigned me to hear sentence instantly.

Dr. Burnaby.—In pain of the contumacy of all and singular the persons so as aforesaid cited, intimated, publicly called and not appearing, we do admit these public instruments, and do assign to hear sentence instantly.

The Proctor.—I pray all and singular the said opposers to be again publicly called.

Dr. Burnaby.—Let the opposers be again publicly called.

The Apparitor-General then made his proclamation as follows:—"Oyez, Oyez, Oyez, all ye who shall, or may, or will object to the consecration of the Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden, as Lord Bishop of the Episcopal See of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, now come forward and state your objections, and you shall be heard."

These words were received with shouts of "Mockery, mockery."

The Proctor then said—I accuse the contumacy of all and singular the persons so as aforesaid cited, intimated, publicly called, and not appearing, and I pray them to be pronounced contumacious, and in pain of such their contumacy, that it be decreed to be proceeded to the pronouncing your definitive sentence, and I porrect a schedule, which I pray to be read.

Dr. Burnaby then read the second schedule and signed it.

The Proctor.—The Lord Bishop-elect is ready to take the oaths required in this behalf.

Dr. Burnaby.—Let the oaths be taken.

The Lord Bishop-elect, kneeling, then took the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, simony and obedience.

The Proctor then said—The Lord Bishop, elected and confirmed, and myself, pray a public instrument and letters testimonial to be made out of and concerning the premises.

The Vicar-General.—We do decree as prayed.

We copy the following pithy editorial from the Churchman.

Another and a very important act in the Hampden case has been played through. Farce of the broadest kind has interposed at least one grotesque scene in the drama. We have lived to see fathomed the unutterable depths of folly and absurdity, which the English form of Episcopal elections involves. It is well that they are known. At whatever price, it is best to know the worst. The experimentum crucis has its value. And we could almost be thankful to Lord John Russell and Dr. Hampden that they have called up from the realm of shadows all the lies and hypocrisies and mockeries—all the profanities and wickedness which exist under the awful name of Law—all the scandal and absurdity which attends every step of a Bishop's appointment. A free election in which there is no choice—a prayer for God's blessing and direction on that which is already settled and fixed in a Minister's bureau—a Confirmation and examination when there is nothing to confirm and nobody to examine: these things are all consistent. Only they have degrees: there is a climax even in such mischievous insults to common decency and common sense. It is reserved for the Sanctuary to witness the hideous proclamation—"All manner of persons who shall or will object . . . come forward . . . and they shall be heard," followed immediately by the judicial sentence—"We sit here to confirm the election . . . we judge that no one has a right to be heard on any question connected with it."

Thus it is: words cannot add to the effect of this contrast. Let it do its work: let it be known; let it be published in the length and breadth of England. This is English law: Henry the Eighth's law. And we have no fear of the result. Write it out: proclaim it: friends and enemies placard it—post it. And the shouts of "oh! oh!"—"shame!"—"mockery!"—"humbug!"—with which Bow Church rang on Tuesday will win a larger echo, and call out a deeper answer than such as provoked it can yet anticipate.

"We do find that the election was rightly and lawfully made," because, "we do decline to take any evidence about the election at all." "We do confirm the said election," because "we will not hear whether it ever took place." "We do pronounce all opposers contumacious," because "we have gagged and choked them." "Oyez, oyez, oyez: all manner of persons who shall or will object, come forward," because "we feel it to be our duty not to permit you to appear." Yes, good gentlemen: jump off the Monument and fall soft—thrust your hand into the fire, and don't burn your fingers—swallow six ounces of arsenic, and don't die—come forward, and don't appear—object, and hold your tongue—you shall be heard, only you shan't speak.

"All the Fusts" have already appeared in the Christmas pantomimes—the Court of Arches is a prolific mine for jests—and we think that its late interpretation of English law is too good a thing to be lost upon those whose vocation it is to shoot folly as it flies. Only, let us add, that it is our own fault if this insult be repeated. There is not a miserable Sect—not a tumpety Corporation—not a shabby Loan Society or Mechanics' Institute, which would be trampled thus upon and abused. The Church of England has the remedy in her own hands.

In the same form and manner "the Confirmation" of the Election of the Rev. J. Prince Lee, as Bishop of Manchester, was gone through with. His objector Dr. Guttridge, was silenced in the same summary manner, though the Bishop elect has himself brought the matter of this individual accusation to the test of a fair and open trial.

As some misapprehension has arisen with regard to the course of the Dean of Hereford, we give the following to show that he was not, as some suppose, at last frightened into acquiescence in a measure which has, from beginning to end, met with his manly and unshrinking opposition, despite the pains and penalties threatened.

The Dean of Hereford has addressed the following letter to the Times—

Sir,—It is with exceeding regret that I find myself under the necessity of calling your attention to the fact that many inaccuracies appear in the account given in your paper of the 29th instant of the proceedings at the election of a Bishop of Hereford. No doubt that account was supplied in great haste, and hence the inaccuracy in several important respects, which has led to inferences not entirely consistent with that position which it was my purpose to occupy on this trying occasion, and which, notwithstanding the efforts which were made to perplex and embarrass me, I assert I did consistently maintain, calmly, but firmly.

That I have done so faithfully and disinterestedly, I can call Heaven to witness; and I am most anxious, if Lord John Russell will permit me, as I have already intimated in my letter to him, to lay before the world every document, whether of correspondence or other communication, with reference to this or any other occasion in which I have been concerned with the Bishopric of Hereford. I maintain that I have made no compromise, and where the words Dean and Chapter were used by me as the official organ of the capitular body, I distinctly stated that I was dissentient, and that the expression was adopted as a necessary form, a majority claiming the election, against which I objected. I would rather have died on the spot than have betrayed the slightest trace, or have felt the very minutest sensation of inconsistency or vacillation. And whatever may be the consequences, I desire not to shelter myself under any technicalities, or expressions, which the claims of the chapter and the forms of usage or law may have rendered necessary to be used.

In regard to the announcement in the choir of the election, I purposely erased the words, "the Dean and Chapter" have elected, and substituted the words, "a majority of the Chapter of this Cathedral Church have elected," &c.; and previously to that, that I might not even in semblance appear to act inconsistently, I, on reading the certifications, &c., to the Queen, Archbishop, and Bishop elect, remarked that it ought not to be "the Dean and Chapter," but "a majority of Chapter," as I was dissentient; but this was overruled by the numbers present, and I did not think it necessary to press it. I afterwards declined to affix the seal personally, which was done by the three Canons residentiary.

I do not wish to specify other inaccuracies; enough for my purpose has been done, and I confidently rely on your doing fair justice towards me, allowing me to bear the precise share of blame or credit which I really deserve.

You will make what use of this letter you think proper, of which time will not allow me to take a copy; and

I remain, Sir, your faithful humble servant,

JOHN MEREWETHER, Dean of Hereford.

Hereford, December 31, 1847.

Among "Communications" our readers will, we think, find matter of great interest. These are the kind of communications it gives us pleasure to receive, because they afford interesting instruction. It is especially to be desired, that correspondents should deal less in controversial matters and more in practical and useful information. They will at least obtain one object by so doing, which is not an unimportant end of writing—they will be read. We hope that the able author of the first communication, will prove that his signature is significant of his good intentions towards us, and "TRY AGAIN." And we trust that the friend who has given such interesting information, of a kind always acceptable, will not let his pen rest in "the catacombs." We are sure there is more in the Journal than has seen the light, and we will welcome the vision.

We take this occasion to say that matters of historical interest concerning our old parishes, like the notice of "Herbert," will find a ready and perhaps permanent place of record in the Banner. We have already given the account of the old Swede's Church at Morlatton, (for which we felt much obliged to the kind correspondent,) and we shall always feel we are doing service to the Church, in helping to make known and to preserve her earlier records, which may be valuable materials for the future historian.

THE BANNER OF THE CROSS.—The Missionary has neither time nor room for personal matters; fully occupied, as both are, with "Christ and the Church." But then the Missionary keeps a heart, which sometimes will be touched. It will be deemed no want of interest, in any other quarter, to say that the Missionary has always had a peculiar interest in the Banner of the Cross. Its conception was in New Jersey. The ever to be lamented Winslow contemplated the revival of the Missionary, that used to be, under that name. It has been edited successively by several highly valued friends. It has always shown the kindest regard for the interests and institutions of this Diocese. More than all, it has been ever true to "Christ and the Church:" firm, faithful, fearless, and yet, moderate, generous, and gentle; speaking the truth in love; conciliating, but not compromising. The Banner of the Cross has done good service to the cause, whose name it bears. Its recent editor, Mr. James S. Newbold, who is still its proprietor, should have a full share in all that is here said. As a layman, not prepared for such a service by previous training, taking it up at short notice, retaining it far beyond his expectation, he has administered it with an amount of intelligence, a soundness of judgment, and a serenity of temper, which have gratified all his friends, and have done him honour, as a Christian and a man.—Missionary.

The rest we must omit as it concerns the present editor of the Banner—and is he fears almost too good to be true.

It is with no common feelings of satisfaction that we copy the following correspondence. It is a most pleasing duty to record such instances of Pastoral faithfulness and consequent affectionate regard from Parishioners.

Rye, January 5th, 1848.

To the Wardens and Vestry of Christ Church, Rye: Gentlemen,—Having accepted an invitation from the Parish of Christ Church, Hartford, to become their Rector, I herewith present to you my resignation of the Rectorship of this Parish, which I wish to take effect on the 1st of February.

You will readily imagine that I have not decided to sever the tie which has united us so long and happily, without a great and painful sacrifice of feeling. I came among you fresh from the walls of the Seminary, in your presence received the full commission to the Priesthood, and have continued to go in and out among you, to labour thankfully and contentedly for your spiritual welfare—not only in the Pulpit, but in every house, I have been permitted to preach the blessed Gospel, while in every house I have found a welcome and a home.

I have earnestly striven to wipe away your tears, while your happiness has given always a new impulse to my own. I have no divisions to heal, no heartburnings to remove, no injuries to complain of—peace and harmony have rested upon our Church, every member of the congregation has a place in my warmest affections, in my unceasing prayers, in my daily memories of this place—and if I have wronged any, by word or deed, I am sure they will not aggravate the woes of this parting hour by refusing me their forgiveness.

And now, gentlemen, permit me to say, that I consent to the pain of leaving this my first and happy Parish, only because I cannot resist the conviction that duty to my Divine Master, and to the Church of which I am an humble minister, requires me to go; because I may not refuse to obey what seem plainly to be the leadings of Providence.

Dismiss me then, my dear friends, with the same kindness, confidence and affection you have ever shown me, and above all with the promise that you will never cease to pray for me.

May God direct you in your choice of another Pastor, may you secure one who will be to you a Shepherd indeed, and who will be wise in winning many souls to Christ—may the richest blessings of Heaven rest upon you all, and may we meet at last as members of that great flock, which shall repose "in green pastures by still waters," under the eye and cure of the "Shepherd and Bishop of souls."

Believe me, my beloved friends,

Most faithfully and affectionately,

Your servant, for Christ's sake,

P. S. CHAUNCEY.

Rye, Jan. 13th, 1848.

The Rev. Mr. Chauncey having presented to the Vestry his resignation of the Rectorship of this Parish, to take effect on the 1st of February, it was unanimously

Resolved, That we accept his resignation with no common feelings of sorrow at the prospect of a separation, and beg to assure him of our conviction, that nothing but the strongest sense of duty would have induced him to leave a Parish, every portion of which presented some interesting association, and a people who were united to him by the most tender and heartfelt attachments—who believe that he has ever "felt and prayed for all," and to whom he has been in every respect, so acceptable.

Resolved, That while we recognize the duty of submission to that merciful Being who ordereth all things for our final good, we cannot refrain from saying, that we greatly deplore the necessity which calls from us our beloved Pastor, whom we shall miss not only from the Pulpit, but from our homes, from the beds of the sick and dying, and from every place where duty called him—while wherever he may go, the blessings of the poor, whom he has relieved and taught, will follow him.

Resolved, That we record our testimony to the fact that for the last thirteen years he has ministered to us at all seasons, with cheerfulness, earnestness and sincerity, and that his chief anxiety and highest ambition have been, that the cause of Christ should be promoted in our midst, and every individual of his flock be reconciled to God.

Resolved, That amid the regrets, not only of his own congregation, but of this whole community, we offer him the assurance of our earnest prayers that God may watch over him and fit him for his more arduous and extensive field of duty, and that when his work on earth is finished we may be united to him again in that happier and brighter abode, from which "we shall go no more out."

Old Trinity Church, Wilmington, Del.

MR. EDITOR.—It may be a source of gratification to some of your readers to learn that after a lapse of nearly twenty years, during which this venerable building has been almost entirely deserted, it is again to become vocal with the praises of God, and His worship to be revived at its altar.

Wilmington, Delaware, Dec. 2nd, 1847. (Signed) J. A. Merrick

The original of this communication is in the possession of the Rev. Mr. Brooks

Wilmington, Delaware, Dec. 2nd, 1847

Dr. Onderdonk: his second communication is evidently meant.

On last Sunday it was opened for Divine service both Morning and Afternoon, and will continue to be opened twice every day for the future.

The Rev. D. H. Macurdy has been invited to become assistant to the Rev. E. M. Van Deusen, the Rector of the Parish, with the especial charge of the old parish church: the Rector to officiate alternately in it and the chapel; and has consented to do so, at least temporarily.

The parish is a very old one, at least for this country; having been in existence more than two hundred years.* Its first members were members of the Church of Sweden; which had been reformed more than an hundred years before emigration from that country to America commenced. The reformation in Sweden resembled in its religious features, that in England. Some of its Bishops, as well as the inferior clergy and the laity in general embraced the principles of the Reformation; and hence the Apostolical succession was preserved, and the Church continued to be Episcopal; its public worship being conducted by a liturgy resembling that of the Church of England. Thus the Church of Sweden, like that of England, was not a new Church, but a branch of the old, original, Apostolical Catholic Church, reformed from the human additions, corruptions, and abuses of Rome.

The Swedes, when their first colonies came to America, were essentially a religious and devout people. The congregation which was the germ of the present Trinity parish, erected its first Church, on the shore of the Delaware, on the side of the Christiana river opposite to that on which the present parish church stands.

It was built of logs, and probably, about the year 1646. At events in 1697, it had become so old and ruinous as to render necessary to erect another. The corner stone of the present edifice was laid on the 28th of May 1698. Records are preserved of the Swedish Rectors from the first, the Rev. Erick Bjork, who arrived in 1697, to the last the Rev. Lawrence Girelius, D. D., who returned to Sweden in 1791. Well executed portraits of two of them, the Rev. Messrs. Acrelius and Borell, are now served in the vestry of Trinity Church.

From the departure of Dr. Girelius to the present day, the Rectors have been clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church. And from his time the service and sermon which previously had generally been in the Swedish language, have been in English. Since April 6th 1830 the congregation has been worshipped in Trinity Chapel, erected in Wilmington; the Church being upon the banks of the Christiana, about one mile from the city.

From 1830 till Aug 21st 1842, the old church was closed. During this time much of the wood-work had become so much decayed as to require renewal. This the vestry were enabled to effect through the liberal bequest of a descendant of the Swedes. On the day above mentioned, the old church, as restored, was reopened for Divine service. And from that time services were held in it occasionally. The building is yet in an excellent state of preservation, the walls being quite sound. The old pulpit, from which the gospel has been proclaimed for 150 years, remains, as do the chancel rails. The altar is recent, but constructed of the wood of a handsome chest brought over by one of the original Swedish settlers. Just outside the chancel a stone which marks the grave of the Rev. Peter Tromberg, who was Rector of the parish for seven years, and died in 1748. The eastern end of the Church was originally covered with Latin inscriptions, in iron letters; most of which have fallen off, or been carried away as relics. These inscriptions it is proposed to restore. The following is a translation of them.

CHRIST OUR KING.

The first confirmation (of which there is any record) in this parish, was held by the Rt. Rev. William White, D. D. Bishop of Pennsylvania, in July 1793. Sixty-three persons were then confirmed.

Within the six or seven years last past, the population of Wilmington has increased rapidly; and the city has extended itself considerably in the direction of the old parish Church. This, and the strong hold the venerable edifice has upon the affections of the population generally, have inclined the present Rector to believe, that a new congregation might be organized here. Accordingly in July last he commenced afternoon services there, when the chapel was closed. These services have been continued regularly since that time. A Sunday School is also being opened; and the attendance upon both has afforded gratifying evidence of interest upon the part of the people.

The services of the Rev. D. H. Macurdy having been secured as Assistant Minister, the Church will hereafter be opened regularly on Sundays morning and afternoon.

Mr. Macurdy entered upon his duties on Sunday last; and was enabled the Rector to complete his arrangements for the benefit of the parish. The seats are all free; and the services supported by the weekly offerings of the worshippers, which are aided with the use of the Offertory, both morning and afternoon.

* For the following statistics we are indebted to the excellent discourse of the late Rector, preached at the reopening of the Church in 1842.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

Steamers, locomotives and magnetic wires are bringing the distant parts of the world so rapidly together, that I sometimes fear a "collision" and look to wake up some morning and find that England is just over the way, and Italy or Greece attainable by means of an "excursion ticket" good for "there and back within the twenty-four hours." In this reasonable state of uncertainty, I fear to offer you the following extract from a journal kept some years ago in a then foreign land. But I know you are a judicious man. If, therefore, you think I am yet in time to tell something not familiar and common-place to all your readers, use your own discretion and print the articles.

THE CATACOMBS.

January 10th, 18—. We rode out this morning to a church in the vicinity of the city (Rome,) through the crypt of which the Catacombs may be entered. Guided by a monk in his sombre dress, and armed with lights for the occasion, we descended a flight of steps beneath the foundation of the building, and found ourselves in a low passage way, which it is said, branching out in various directions, and with varying width and height extends upwards of fifteen miles! On both sides of the passage as far as we penetrated, the niches in which the dead bodies of early Christians and martyrs had been deposited were visible, but their bones had long since been removed, and now all the excavations were empty. The stone slabs also which once covered these "sleeping places of the dead" have all been taken away, and most of them I believe set in the walls of the Vatican, forming a Lapidarian gallery both curious and instructive. Here the orthodox Christian of the present day may read the names and ages and histories of those who died long centuries ago in defence of the faith which he now professes. There will the disciple of the Romish Church look in vain for anything to support his peculiar theory. No mention will he find of the adoration of the virgin, or of relics, or of saints; no hint of purgatory, no sign of a papal supremacy, but on the contrary much which contradicts these modern dogmas, and proves the faith of the martyrs entombed once beneath them, to be quite another creed than that of Pius IV.

On one of the stones thus preserved we read the title of Pope, synonymous at first with that of Bishop. Hic positus Papa sanctimioo vixit annis LXX. But we look in vain for any hint of the attribute of universal rule connected with the title, yet here in the place from whence such mural tablets are taken, all the Bishops of Rome were buried till A. D. 462!

Again, among the tablets preserved, we find those which speak of Presbyters and speak of them as married. Locus Basilii presb. et Felicitatis eius sibi fecerunt. The tomb of Basilus the presbyter, and Felicitas his wife. They made this for themselves. A deacon is also named in the same manner. Claudius Atticanus lector et Claudia Felicissima coix (coix.) Again—Petronia, a priest's wife, the type of modesty. In this place I lay my bones; spare your tears dear husband, and daughter, and believe it is forbidden to weep for one who lives in God. Buried in peace, on the third nones of October, in the consulate of Festus (A. D. 472.)

The Fossor, or grave-digger was another officer in the ancient Church, and a picture of one armed with lamp, pickaxe, and other implements of his trade, was found in the tomb of Callistrus. But as you have no types, Mr. Editor, in which to "set up" such a "form," I shall forbear to give you a copy of this curious relic. Take this epitaph in its stead. Terentius Fossor Primativi coingi et sui. Which I suppose stands for, Terentius the Fossor for Primatira his wife and himself. Some have fancied that the young men who came in and carried out Ananias and his wife Sapphira were of this class, though with what authority beyond their own fancy I do not know.

These stones are further interesting as preserving to us very ancient Christian emblems. Thus we find inscribed upon them the Christian Monogram,* sometimes with the addition of the Alpha Omega, the whole occasionally enclosed in a circle. The palm branch also frequently occurs, and the mystic fish, and the dove bearing an olive branch in his mouth followed by the word Pax, also the anchor and sometimes a ship of the rudest kind. But I forget, Mr. Editor, what I lately remembered about your types, and forbear to offer you any more signs so strange to printers' eyes. At times we meet with representations equally rude of animals which once were supposed to signify the instruments or agents of the martyrs' death, but now are regarded as illustrating the name of the buried individual, and also pictures of those implements of trade which the deceased once used, but which were formerly supposed to be representations of the weapons employed for his execution.

We are wandering, however, Mr. Editor, from the Catacombs to the Lapidarian Gallery, so I must beg you to return with me to those gloomy chambers where, if there is to be seen there is much to be felt, beside a dread of becoming bewildered and lost amid their tortuous windings, a fear which I confess dwelt somewhat painfully on my own mind, and on the minds of my companions. The original object of these immense

* This was described in our last paper, p. 34, as follows.—
ED. BAN.

"The celebrated Monogram inscribed by the orders of Constantine upon the labarum, or standard of the cross, was undoubtedly Greek. It was formed from the first two letters of our Lord's sacred title Xpistos, the Anointed; as we learn from Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian, who is describing the famous standard in the section of which we quote the following part:—"A long spear, overlaid with gold, formed the figure of the cross, by means of a piece transversely laid over it. On the top of the whole was fixed a crown, formed by the intertexture of gold and precious stones: and on this two letters indicating the name of Christ, symbolized the Saviour's title by means of its first characters, the letter P being intersected by X exactly in its centre; and these letters the Emperor was in the habit of wearing on his helmet at a later period."

excavations was probably to obtain building materials for the city which rises above some of their passages. Afterwards they were used by the persecuted disciples of Christ as places of refuge and of sepulture, and by them, no doubt, enlarged. They now form a huge labyrinth, where the incautious visitor would soon lose himself and perish miserably, a fate which has befallen many, and led to the closing up of a large number of passages, and to great caution in regard to the admission of strangers. We advanced some distance along the gallery and entered several chambers in this great subterranean house of the dead, but our guide seemed loth to extend our visit, and we did not tarry long. The death-like stillness of these dim underground passages when we stood for a moment to examine some excavation—the muffled sound of our footsteps as we advanced, obeying the gesture of our ghost-like guide, who ever and anon turned to beckon us forward, shielding his taper with his hand or heavy sleeve—the gloom out of which we passed and on which we encroached with our little circle of flickering light, all impressed the mind with a feeling of dreariness and desolation not easily described. These, then, were the same passages along which the steps of those who fled from the fierce pursuit of Pagan persecutors passed so frequently, that at length their most tortuous turnings and intricate crossings became familiar walks. Along these dismal galleries they bore their dead, and there, in those empty niches they buried them. Then in this wider opening, this enlarged nook, which might be called a chamber, they built their altar, and while their foes in the busy city above them were celebrating Bacchanalian feasts and beastly orgies, the disciples of Christ bowed in lowly reverence and broke their bread and drank their sacramental cup, and vowed to love and serve their Lord in newness of life. Now how changed the state of the world. The very bones of these persecuted Christians are removed from their resting place and enshrined as objects of adoration, in temples erected on the very sites of heathen fanes! The places once used as prisons for the Christian, are now places of pilgrimage for those who admire his courage and would do honor to his memory. The faith once persecuted, is largely patronized, and a cross is erected to protect a ruin which in its palmy days was used as a theatre where the agonies of those who loved that emblem of their faith might be witnessed and enjoyed by the multitude! Things, indeed, are much changed both below and above ground in Rome, and no where is this truth more powerfully realized than in the dark windings and silent chambers of the catacombs.

Diocesan Intelligence.

Pennsylvania.—On Sunday morning, the 6th inst., Mr. Benjamin J. Douglass was admitted to the holy order of Deacons, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter, in St. Matthew's Church, Franciscville. Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Stratton, and the lessons appropriate to the service, by the Rev. Mr. Miller. A sermon was preached by the Rev. J. M. Douglass, after which a charge was delivered to the congregation by the Rt. Rev. the Bishop. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. Hare, the Rector of the Church.

SWORD'S ALMANAC.

This day published, Sword's Pocket Almanac for the year of our Lord 1848, containing lists of the Clergy in each Diocese, the Constitution and Canons and Statistical Information of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America.

For sale by R. S. H. GEORGE,
Jan. 1 S. W. corner of Chestnut and 8th st.

Just Published by the Episcopal Female Tract Society.

The Blind Slave in the Mines; the Roll Call; Patient Suffering; a Tract upon the Lord's Supper; also, 4 Tracts for boys, viz: The Reward of Disobedience, Truth and Honesty, Tom White, the Post Boy, and a Conversation upon the character of the Prophet Daniel, between Mr. Russell and his Scholars; the last written expressly for American Boys. Those who wish to improve the rising generation, and to curb the riotous and licentious spirit of the youths who infest our streets, especially on the Sabbath Day, might effect some good by purchasing a supply of these tracts, and distributing them, with affectionate exhortations, among these neglected idlers, who are pleased to receive them, and generally listen with respect to the conversations of those who appear to take an interest in their welfare.

They can be procured at the cheap Bookstore of Mr. Simons, at the corner of Fifth and Spruce streets, where purchasers can obtain very valuable books, at a reduced price; and also a variety of useful articles. All the publications of the E. F. Tract Society, which are in print, can be procured there. Tracts are so very cheap, that there are few persons who cannot afford to do good by purchasing a few to distribute. There have been such innumerable demands upon their Depository during the past year, that their gratuitous distribution must necessarily be limited, until they can procure the requisite funds to replenish their stock, by donations, and by their sales.

BEZA'S LATIN TESTAMENT,

FOR SCHOOL AND COLLEGE USE.

GEORGE S. APPLETON, 148 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, has now ready Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Jesu Christi. Interprete Theodoro Beza.

This new edition of the well renowned translation of Beza, is beautifully and very accurately printed from stereotype plates cast in England, supervised and corrected by a highly competent scholar.

The now acknowledged propriety of giving students of languages familiar works for translation,—thus adopting in the schools the mode by which the child first learns to talk—has induced the publication of this American edition.

Of the work, itself, it is hardly necessary to speak. Its publication was suggested by the favor with which the authors lectures on the Epistles were received at the Academy of Lausanne. The translation thus heralded, was received with a favor which, with Protestant Christians, it has never lost. Several editions were published during the life time of Beza, to which he made such improvements as his attention was directed to, or as were prompted by his familiarity, as Greek Professor, with the original. Since 1556, when it first appeared, at Geneva, this work has kept its place in the general esteem; while more recent versions have been so strongly tinged with the peculiarities of the translators as to make them acceptable to particular classes only.

To facilitate its introduction into schools and colleges, it is published at a low price, and furnished to teachers and the trade at a liberal discount. Teachers will be supplied with a copy of the work for examination gratis, on application, post paid.

The trade, to whom it will be furnished on the usual account, are requested to forward their orders.

The Fifth Commandment.

"Honour thy father and thy mother."—Exodus xx.
 "Lord have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law."—Communion Service.

I knelt within the house of God
 At a gentle mourner's side,
 And duly after each command
 Her quiet voice replied:—
 "Oh Lord! have mercy and incline
 My heart to keep this law of thine."

Once, only, from her silent lips
 No sweet response was heard,
 In answer to the pastor's voice
 No gently murmured word.
 "Honour thy father and thy mother," fell
 Silent, unanswered, like a dying knell.

Oh! what a tale that mourner's silence told,
 How sad a page of human life unrolled,
 Silent; for well she knew that prayer or vow
 For those, the lost and mourned, were mockery now.
 And close she drew her veil, and bent her head,
 And well I knew, she communed with the dead.

Who reads the tale? Oh! canst thou lift thine eye
 Thou happy one and see a father by?
 Is there a crown of glory round his brow,
 Slow is his step, and his voice feeble now?
 Beware! beware! the fount is almost dry,
 The ground is fading 'neath the watchful eye:
 A little while to look, to love, to pray,
 Then seek his place, and he shall be away.

Hast thou a mother? she who, day by day,
 Taught thee to lift thy infant lips and pray;
 She who hath pitied thee, when others scorned,
 Wept thy soul's sickness, and in dangers warned;
 Hath borne with all thy youth's impetuous pride,
 When this world's gauds have lured thee from her side;
 And doth she suffer yet, and love and strive,
 Thy care-worn mother—is she yet alive?
 Oh! use the precious moments, bend thee now,
 And print a duteous kiss upon her brow:
 A little while, and all thy care in vain
 Would purchase back such blessed hours again.
 A little while, and when the pastor's word:—
 "Honour thy parents," shall be duly heard,
 Thy mournful soul will muse upon the line,
 Nor dare to answer:—"Lord, my heart incline."

From the English Review.

The Life of Mrs. Godolphin. By JOHN EVELYN. Edited by the Bishop of Oxford. APPLETONS.

But she who was guiding the feet of others felt her own need of help and encouragement in a path so difficult. Such a court was, after all, to such a spirit, little else than a crowded wilderness. She was indeed alone. Religious isolation is, at all times, a trial hard to bear. We want to unbosom ourselves, to give vent to our warmer thoughts; to put the cases of conscience that perplex us before friends who will enter into our perplexity; to be stirred up, in times of despondency, by their cheering words or example. If it is a trial to be dwelling with those who are simply uninterested in our religious views and struggles, what must it be to have our lot cast in a profane and irreverent world, which opposes or despises religion altogether? No wonder the lonely and anxious spirit of Margaret Blagge yearned for a religious friend. She had, indeed, been accustomed to consult the Dean of Hereford in any spiritual strait; but this intercourse seems to have been chiefly by letter, at that time a slow, and at all times an imperfect mode of intercourse. What she wanted, in addition to that excellent adviser, was one living closer to her, moving somewhat in the same scenes, to whom she could more constantly apply,—whose very presence would help to nerve and steady her; and who would be able, from actual sight and experience of her difficulties, to understand her needs. In this desire for friendship, she was instinctively drawn towards the good and gentle Evelyn. He was just that sort of character which was likely to attract a woman of strong religious feeling, who wanted to be patiently and considerately met in all her little straits and trials. But Evelyn had only seen the lighter side of her character. He had long been thrown into the same scenes, but he had only crossed her in her more sprightly moods. He had accordingly catalogued her with that herd of vain giddy women, who basked like summer-flies in the sunshine of a court. He found her to be "a very agreeable lady," but nothing more; though his wife, in entertaining her at their "poore villa" of Sayes Court, "discovered such extraordinary charmes, markes of vertue and discretion," that she reproved his "infidelity;" yet he confesses "he was brought to believe with soe much difficulty, that it was almost seven yeares" before he could be "hected out of his contracted humour;" and he "fancied her some airy thing, that had more witt than discretion." Closer intercourse, however, brought him to confess his wife's discernment: he admits at last that "she might not be that pert lady" he had fancied; and, as she was eager to obtain his friendship, that it might support her in her religious course, she took every occasion of contriving an intimacy. When his prejudice began, by frequent visits, to abate, "she conjured me, he says, "not to baulk her holy cell; and I was not a little pleased to be soe solemnly diverted, and finde my selfe mistaken, that soe young, soe elegant, soe charming a witt and beauty should preserve soe much vertue in a place where it neither naturally grew nor much was cultivated; for, with all these perfections, vivacity and apprehension, beyond what I could expect, she seemed unconcerned and steady; could endure to be serious, and gently reprove my moroseness, and was greatly devout; which putt me out of all feare of her railery, and made me looke upon her wi a extraordinary respect." The more her real character began to unfold itself before him, the more we find him warming in his expressions of admiration; till at last he exclaims, "What a new thing is this! I think Paulina and Eustochius are come from Bethlehem to Whitehall; and from this moment I began to looke on her as sacred, and to bless God for the graces which shoone in her. I dayly prayed for her, as she had enjoined me, and she began to open some of her holy thoughts to me; and that she had totally resigned herself to God; and with these incentives, who, that had any sence of religion, could forbear to value her exceedingly!"

Margaret Blagge was now able to entreat Evelyn to become her guide and her adviser. "I would have a friend," she said to Evelyn: "In that name is a great deale more than I can express." And when Evelyn began, in the courteous language of the day, to express the honour which her friendship would confer, she bid him "leave his complimenting and be her friend, and looke upon her as his child." Quite characteristic of the age was the formal method in which the friendship was sealed; "there standing," says Evelyn, "pen and ink upon the table, in which I had been drawing something upon a paper like an alter, she writt these words: 'Be this the symbol of inviolable friendship, Mary Blagge, 16th October, 1672; and underneath, 'For my brother E. . . ; and soe delivered it with a smile.' "Tis certaine," is the exclamation of the warm-hearted and excellent Evelyn, "I no more looked upon her as Mrs. Blagge, but as my child indeed."

Evelyn kept his word. He became a staff on which she could lean in all her spiritual needs; and though he continued to encourage her in corresponding with "that reverend and learned divine," the Dean of Hereford, in all times of difficulty, he became on all ordinary occasions "the depositarie of her pious thoughts and resolutions;" and, being ever at hand, was able to advise and sympathise with her in all the daily trials of her faith. As this friendship gave him a decided insight into her character and mode of life, we have the advantage of gazing at a picture drawn from life, and of seeing her in a variety of natural attitudes, as they were observed and caught by her friendly painter. By this means we learn the methods by which she was enabled to live so much above the world, in scenes where the world was fluttering before her with all manner of fascinations. We cannot resist laying before our readers some of the details of her holy life, as it is not enough to gaze at the great outlines of an exalted character—to take a rough view of its vast proportions; it is useful to draw near, to examine it more closely and in detail; to search into the manner of its growth; to learn how it throve and waxed so strong; for it is by going into these particulars, by learning the rules and modes of management which were used, that we gain real instruction for our own progress in spiritual life. We avoid wasting our time in experiments—in visionary and untried methods of self-control.

"Were it never soe dark, wett, or uncomfortable weather, dureing the severity of winter, she would rarely omit being at the chapel att seven a'clock prayers, and if a communion day, how late soever her attendance were on the queen, and her owne extraordinary preparation kept her up, she would be dressed and att her private devotions some houres before the publick office begun."

This leads him to narrate an amusing stratagem by which she secured her early rising, a matter to some constitutions of daily difficulty.

"Finding one day a long pack threadpassing through the key-hole of her chamber doore, and reaching to her bed's head, and inquiring what itt signified, I at last understood, itt had been to awaken her early in the morning, the centinell, whose station was of course near the entrance, being desired to pull it very hard att such an hour, whilst the other extrem was tyed fast about her wrist, fearing her maid might oversleep herself, or call her later than she had appointed."

There are, we believe, a variety of ingenious machines and contrivances in vogue for the encouragement of early rising; and where, as was the case with Dr. Arnold, it is a constant effort to get up, we cannot but recommend any such tricks as these. As general indolence is clearly the common fault and temptation of the women of the higher classes, so it is no trifling matter to gain a victory early in the day. Beat indolence at cock-crow, and we may continue to triumph through the day. Where there seems to be almost a superfluity of time, and it hangs upon the hands like waste goods, and the day is not marked out into compartments of duty, and there seems nothing particular to do but to write notes, or read novels, or make calls, or deliberate with milliners, then of course there appears no reason for early rising. But must not there be something fearfully wrong when there is not a well-arranged mode of life, when no positive course of action is marked out, when we do not see duties, or when we wait till they come to our door and ask us to do them: and when without any definite object of existence we idle away the day in selfish littlenesses? We know it is easy to talk boldly of early rising overnight, while we are sitting with all our faculties alert by our evening fire; we know that the snug warmth of the morning counterpane is apt to thaw the stoutest resolutions, and arguments the most irresistible are apt to become limp and unstarched as we lie in a sort of drowsy felicity; but still, without letting the reader into our own practices, we do heartily recommend all sorts of stratagems to those who cannot otherwise conquer a lazy spirit.

But, to return from this by-lane into which we have been tempted to turn aside—

"Besides the monthly Communions, she rarely missed a Sunday throughout the whole year, wherein she did not receive the Holy Sacrament, if she were in towne and tollerable health; and I well know she had those who gave her constant advertisement where it was celebrated upon some more solemn festivals, besides not seldom on the weeke days assisting at one poor creature's or others; and when sometimes being in the country or in a journey, she had not those opportunities she made use of a devout meditation upon that sacred mistery, by way of mental communion; and O with what unspeakable care and niceness did she use to dress and trim her soul against this heavenly banquet, with what flagrant devotion at the altar. I have seen her receive the holy symbols, with such an humble and melting joy in her countenance as seemed to be something of transport, not to say angelic—something I cannot describe.

"How would this lady rejoice att the approach of the Lord's day. She has often told me, she felte another soule in her, and that there was nothing more afflicted her, than those impertinent visitts on Sunday evenings, which she avoided with all imaginable industry; whilst seldome did she pass one without going to visitt, pray by, or instruct some poore religious creature or other, tho' it were to the remotest part of the towne. . . In a word, she was alwayes soe solemnly chearfull upon that day, and soe devout, that without looking into the kalender, one might read it in her countenance.

"Upon festivall days, she never omitted the offices of the Church; taking those opportunities of visiting poore sick people, relieving and comforting them; and then would lengthen her evening retirements with proper meditations on the mistery, or commemoration; for which she had of her owne collection apposite entertainments. . . How extraordinary were her recesses and devotions on every Friday, when she rarely stirred out of her little oratorye butt to publique prayers, and then would end in the evenings in visitts of charity; and did observe the Lent with strictness, till finding it much impair her health and delicate constitution, something of those severe mortifications she was persuaded to abate; only the holy weeke her exercises were extended to all the parts of duty, and more solemn preparation, spent in an uninterrupted course of penitentiall and extraordinary devotion, yett without superstitious usages or the least moroseness.

"Upon such anniversaries, she would be early at the chapel; and sometimes I have known her shut upp in the church after the publique offices have been ended, without returning to her chamber att all, to prevent impertinent visitts and avocations.

"Thus spent she the Sunday, feasts, or fasts; nor were the extraordinary weeke dayes other than Sundays with her, when none came to interrupt her course. . . Noe sooner was she descended from her bed, but she fell on her knees in profound adoration; and all the tyme of her dressinge, her mayd was reading some part of Scripture to her, and when her assistance was necessary, she would take the booke herselfe and read to her mayd. . . She withdrew to private devotion in her closet till her servant advertysed her it was time to goe to chappell. . . Nor did her forenoone devotion determine here; she not seldome might be found in the chappell att ten a'clock in the longer office. Nay, and I have sometimes mett her above in his majestyes little oratorye before dinner, if conveniently she could slipp away from the mixt company of the withdrawing roome, whilst the queene sat out; and this she did, not out of singularity or superstitious devotion, or that she thought herself obliged to it, butt (as she has told me) to avoid occasions of idle and impertinent discourse, which was almost unavoidable in the ante-chambers."

Margaret Blagge, we repeat is a fresh and happy illustration of the combination we speak of; she was winged on both sides; and it was by her prayers and her practice that she flew so high towards perfection. We have already seen—that besides her observance of daily prayer, "of fasts, festivals, of Holy Communions, private reading and meditation," she was wont to "visit, pray by, or instruct some poor religious creature or other;" but Evelyn give us ampler records of her active and positive charity:—

"She was allwayes," he says, "doeing some good offices for one or other; gave frequent and considerable reliefe to poore and indigent people, and not seldome made me her almoner, and the hand to convey it where she could not well herself; butt of this and the many visitts she, in her own person, made (delicate as she was), to refresh and comfort the sick and miserable, even amongst the most wretchedly poore; nott without great inconveniencye to her health, I shall give account hereafter."

We are reminded of that excellent saying, once uttered in our presence by a frail and delicate woman, who was inclined to overtax her strength in the cause of religion, "It is better to wear than to rust." And all this, observes her admiring and humble biographer:—

"Being yett hardly enter'd her nineteenth yeare, an age that few, in her circumstances, see soone sett out att, and would that I begun as early, and as early finished."

He speaks of her also as—

"Employing most part of Lent in workeing for poore people, cutting out and making waistcoates and other necessary coverings, which she constantly distributed amongst them, like another Dorcas, spending much of her tyme, and no little of her money, in relieving, visitting, and enquireing of them out." "I have already told," he continues, "how diligently she would inquire out the poore and miserable, even in hospitals, humble cells and cottages, whither I have often accompanied her, as far as the very skirts and obscure places of the towne, among whom she not only gave liberall almes, but physitions and physick she would send to some, yea, and administer remedies herself, and the meanest offices. She would sit and read, and instruct, and pray whole afternoones, and tooke care for their spiritual reliefe by procureing a minister of religion to prepare them for the holy sacrament, for which purpose she not only carry'd and gave them bookes of salvation and devotion, but had herself collected diverse psalmes and chapters proper to be read and used upon such occasions."

Then he goes on to speak of the number she relieved,—

"No fewer than twenty-three, whom she cladd at one time," and she employed a poor widow, "to informe her of sick and miserable people, who accompanied her to their habitations, and brought them clothes, money, and medicines . . . by her she distributed weekly pensions, looked after orphan children, putt them to schoole, visited the prisons," "paid rent for indigent housekeepers," put forth apprentices, "visited and released prisoners, of which I thinke I can produce a list of above thirty restrained for debt," and he has often "knowne her slip away and breake from the gay and publike company to make a stepp to some miserable poore creature, whilst those she quitted have wondered why she went from the conversation; and more they would, had they seen how the scene was changed from a kingly palace to some meane cottage, from the company of princes to poore necessitous wretches, when by and by she would returne as chearfull and in good humour, as if she had been about some worldly concerne, and excuse her absence in the most innocent manner imaginable."

Hitherto we have been following this saintly woman in her victories over herself and her world; but, that we may be assured we have been tracing the real route of a real conqueror of the world, and have been dealing with real flesh and blood, her truthful biographer, as an exact painter, has not brushed past the blemishes of his friend, nor hung any skilful drapery over the weaker portions of her life. The exposure of her defects convinces us, that he has not overcharged her with perfections in the other parts of his accounts, especially when the transaction he reveals was one which gave him personally peculiar pain, and touched him to the quick. We have already shown the zeal with which Evelyn advised his friend to end her nine years' engagement with marriage; a zeal which involved him in long and frequent communications. We may judge, therefore, of his pain, when, for the first time, the compact of friendship so seriously made and so long revered, was broken asunder. She was secretly married to Mr. Godolphin at the Temple Church; and, to add to great unkindness an actual sin, she continued to feign herself unmarried before Evelyn. The reason either of the secrecy, or the prevarication, does not appear. There were none present but Lady Berkeley, and the maid of the bride; indeed, so long was the secret kept, not only from the world, but from Evelyn, that she accompanied Lady Berkeley to Paris, at which court Lord Berkeley was appointed ambassador; and it was not till she returned home that she confessed her marriage. During her stay in France, she lived in the greatest retirement, and "nott soe much as once appeared att court all the tyme of her being att the ambassador's house; and, tho' the report of such a beauty and witt had so forerun her arrival, that the French king was desirous to see her in that att Saint Germain; yet she soe ordered matters as to avoid all occasions of goeing thither, and came back to England without giving that great monarch the satisfaction of one glance." She had, of course, put herself into a delicate position; and it would have been doubtless painful to her, to have appeared publicly and continually at court as an unmarried person, especially, as Evelyn takes care to inform us, that in that court, "the vertues of strangers did not allwayes protect the sex from inconveniencies."

She seems to have even avoided seeing what we call 'the sights' of Paris, if we except "a cloyster of nuns, whose manner of liveing did not displease her, whilst nothing of their superstition could endanger one soe well principled in her religion." Her remarks upon nunneries are sensible. "Since I came to Paris, she says, I have hardly been out of doores to visitt any body, butt there has been a priest to visitt me; butt, without vanity, I thinke I said as much for my opinion as he did for his . . . soe as you need have no fear of me on that side. God knows the more one sees of their Church, the more one finds to dislike in itt; I did not imagine the tenth part of the superstition I find in itt, yett still could approve of their orders. Their nunneries seem to be holy institutions; if they are abused, 'tis not their fault; what is not perverted?"

She seems never indeed to have breathed the faintest sigh nor cast one wistful look of love towards Rome. She found her lot cast in the English Church; there she stayed, not only with content, but thankfulness; there she found all the nourishment essential to the soul. If ever her heart had beaten with any desires for Rome, it would have been before her visit to France; for if the influence of example could have swayed her mind in the choice of a Church, the life of Charles's injured and unhappy queen would have long before drawn her to adopt the principles which her royal mistress so consistently and modestly maintained. But even then, when Romish practice in that particular instance was shaming Anglican principles, she wisely refused to judge of the English Church by her unworthy sons in a cloudy age, or to accept the corrupt doctrines of the Church of Rome, because a portion of her members, fed by the truths which she retains amid the dross, rose above the average height.

Untainted therefore by the religious atmosphere of France, right glad was Mrs. Godolphin, for so must we now call her, to escape the tediousness of what was splendid exile. On her return Evelyn was quickly at her side; the secret of her marriage was of course divulged; and while her well-trying friend, who had been really grieved, "she should soe industriously conceale a thing from one to whom she had along communicated her most intimate thoughts," gently reproved her for her fault; she seems to have confessed it with so much hearty sorrow as quickly to have quenched his mild displeasure. We find her accordingly a frequent guest at that good specimen of a quiet, godly, cheerful English home, Sayes Court. On Lord Berkeley's return from France she took up her residence in what Evelyn calls that "pretty habitation" which had been built for her in Scotland Yard, "settling with that pretty and discrete economy so natural to her; and never was there such an household of faith, never lady more worthy of the blessings she was entering into, who was soe thankfull to God for them."

Evelyn soon saw that he had no reason to regret his commendations of marriage, or his advice to his friend on that subject. All his hopes of her usefulness, and all his notions of her fitness for a post so responsible as that of mistress of a household, were fully realized. With evident joy he declares that, "she was none of those who would have excused her coming to the divine and royall feasts, because she had married an husband; slacking in nothing of her former zeale and labours of love, without the least impeachment to her domestick charge. Soe dextrously she knew to reconcile both these duties, that I believe there never was family more an household of faith." She instantly gave herself to the care and improvement of her servants; she entered upon this part of her duty with pious heartiness, not considering them as the mere living furniture or breathing machinery of her house, to be fed well and paid honestly that they might do with skill their round of work, but as a spiritual charge entrusted to her by God for a spiritual end. The engagement between herself and those under her, she was loth to look upon as a cold compact that turned only upon work and pay. She had far warmer feelings and warmer interest in her dependents; and, accordingly, in her eager love for their growth in godliness, "she provided them bookes to read, prayers to use by themselves, and constantly instructed them herself in the principles of religion; tooke care for their due receiveing of the holy sacrament." How soon the mere mechanical respect which modern servants are apt to pay, might be changed into warmer reverence and regard, if modern mistresses would but warm towards their servants. But while Mrs. Godolphin was thus ruling her household in the fear of God, she was not a whit the less active in caring for her poorer brethren abroad. She continued to be a visitor of the sick, and a bountiful helper of the poor. And this is a point much to be regarded by the mistresses of families in these times; they are not, to use Bishop Andrewes' quaint expression, to "tread inwards," that is, to confine their energies within the circle of home life. Charity should doubtless begin at home, but not end there; and while children and servants claim the first place in their regard, they should soe economise their time as not to neglect their duties abroad.

Happily passed the useful days of Mrs. Godolphin's married life. She had but one wish, that she might be "the mother of a child." At the end of two years this wish was granted; and two days after receiving the holy communion, which she took to prevent "all possible surprises," and to strengthen her in "the conflict she was to enter upon," she gave birth to a boy. She seems to have had long before some sort of presentiment of her death. On one occasion she had seriously told Evelyn she should die before him; and on his visiting her a short time before her confinement, she confessed to a "more than ordinary impulse that she should not outlive the happiness she had soe long wished for." At first there seemed nothing but reasons for thankfulness for the preservation of her life; and she continued in a "faire and hopefull condition," till after the baptism of her child. Evelyn and his wife were present at the baptism, and returned home "full of joy and satisfaction;" but on the Sunday following they were startled out of their joy by the news which Mr. Godolphin sent of his wife's alarming illness. "My poore wife," he writes, "is fallen very ill of a fever, with lightness in her head. You know who says the prayers of the faithful shall save the sick; I humbly begg your charitable prayers for this poore creature and your distracted servant." Evelyn and his wife, true friends in the hour of adversity, hastened to the scene of distress, and found the illness increasing fast. Evelyn instantly bestirred himself to get the best medical aid; but this, strange to say, was not easily to be had. The occasion gives us a curious and unhappy insight into the condition of the medical world of that day, and makes us reflect with pride on the tenderness and vigilant humanity which are the noble characteristics of the profession at this present time. Mrs. Evelyn seems, and probably with reason, to have distrusted the physician that was at first employed, and "thought it advisable to call an experienc'd person in cases of this nature." "Butt itt was soe very long ere the doctor could be found, and soe late ere he came, that through the frequency and violence of the fitts, which were now delirious, her spirits were soe far wasted, that tho' he were of the same opinion, and that something was omitted, yett would he by no intreaty be perswaded to apply any thing but in conjunction with other phisitians." Evelyn himself sallied out in search of further aid; but he says, "Itt being farr in the night, itt was with extraordinary difficulty that I gott my ancient dear and religious friend, Dr. Needham, since with God, and then but valetudinarye himselfe, to come. Others who were sent for, wearied as they pretended with toyle would not be prevailed with to rise, except Doctor Short; soe as till now, there had been little attempted." Time in such a case was every thing; and we can only wonder at the heartless selfishness of those who let a little fatigue stand in the way of saving life. When aid came it was too late. She languished till the next day; and then "with the most ardent prayers and offices of the holy man, who continually attended," and the not less ardent prayers of her most faithful friends, to aid her on her passage, she breathed away her soul, and her spirit rose, we trust, into the regions of a better world. She died in her twenty-fifth year, young in age, and ripe in grace, in the very bloom of life, in the maturity of faith. Her husband, who rose to great honours in the state, lived and died a widower. He had but one wife, for he could find but one Margaret Godolphin.

We incline to let the curtain drop here, and not weaken the effect which even these gleanings of such a biography may be hoped to work, by any reflections of our own. The fate which in our youth awaited "the moral" which was always appended to "Æsop's Fables" might well warn us of the inutilty of adding any such conclusions to tales that speak for themselves. Least of all are we disposed to say any thing of a controversial kind, after surveying so sublime a character that belongs to the Church at large, that is an example to all who bear the name of Christ, and desire to see the power of a living faith. We might well dispense with controversy for a time, and refresh our eyes with gazing at features that seem to look down upon all the littlenesses, and heats, and feuds, that surround us here on earth, and to lift us above the wrangling spirit of the world by their own heavenliness. And yet, after looking upon a form so beautiful, we must point to the means which were used to attain that combination of spiritual charms; we must remind our female readers that it was by an early and faithful use of the ordinances of the English Church, that Margaret Godolphin became the saint she was. She was a daughter of our Church, a light of that Divine system, which, by God's grace, has been continued amongst us to this day—nay, which is now rising into fresh vigour, by the energy of renewed and quickened life. Since Mrs. Godolphin's time the Church, so to speak, swooned away; now it is fast recovering from the swoon. We have in our generation to bear some of the evils of recovery of health, some irregularity of action, some heats and flushings, some uneven flutterings of heart, that are commonly the accompaniments of returning health. At such a time the influence of women, while it is great, is also critical. It becomes them especially to throw themselves into a course of sober piety, to resist fashions in religion, and new modes and new theories. To assist them in such steadfastness and sobriety, and yet to encourage their naturally enthusiastic temperament in a course of practical and lofty zeal, such a biography as that of Mrs. Godolphin's will be of the highest use. It will take them away from controversy; it will show them a high standard of excellence in their own Church; it will suggest duties; it will direct them in the mode and extent of their devotion; it will open a field of usefulness, whatever their circumstances may be. We know not how many of those ardent minds, who, in the midst of the excitement attending a state of transition from great lukewarmness to great thoughtfulness, allowed themselves to be carried from the safe borders of their own Church, might have been stayed, if, in the moment of their overwrought and morbid feeling, when they were unable to judge calmly, they had had sober-minded, staunch, yet earnest sisters, wives, or mothers at their sides, showing in a course of active, consistent, judicious piety, the grace which does flow in the English Church.

And not only must we consider the value of sober, yet warm-hearted women in the difficulties of controversial times, but we must consider their value as a means of staying that other and very opposite current of evil which runs strongly at this time; we mean the current of worldliness, vanity, self-indulgence, luxuriousness, and frivolity. Margaret Godolphin shows us the power a mere girl may have in winning souls, provided she enters upon her work in no Quixotic or indiscreet or forward spirit, but in that calm, noiseless, deep, and earnest way, which betokens deeply-rooted principles. Might not many a worldly family be leavened by the women of the house? might not many a father, or husband, or brother, be won by the conversation of the wife, or the sister, or daughter? That the female members of the English Church may not be wanting in high-minded zeal, in self-denying devotion, in soberness and moderation, in these anxious yet hopeful times, is our earnest hope and our earnest prayer! May many Margaret Godolphins be raised amongst us to the glory of God, and the edification of the Church!

"As a flame touches a flame, and combines into splendor and to glory: so is the spirit of a man united unto Christ by the Spirit of God."

From Chambers' Journal.

Joseph Train's Account of the Isle of Man.*

THE name of Mr. Train has become widely known, in consequence of the acknowledgment of Sir Walter Scott of the obligations he lay under to him for hints towards sundry of the Waverley Novels. Now passing into the vale of years, after a creditable fulfilment of all the common duties of life, he appears to us as an admirable specimen of the genius of self-taught and self-raised men. While possessed of strong poetical tastes, he has gone beyond the ordinary range of his class in a zealous cultivation of historical antiquities, of which we have here goodly proof in two volumes, embracing all that can be desired of the past and present of the Isle of Man. We delight to see the worthy veteran successfully bringing so laborious a task to a close.

The very peculiar history of this little outlying portion of the empire; its long possession of an independent race of princes; its retaining even till now institutions proper to itself—render it an object of curiosity beyond any similar space of British ground. Mr. Train has done all that we should think possible in recovering its early annals, and throwing them into a intelligible narrative; a sad view they give of bloody wars, and popular sufferings. A portion of his work, devoted to the superstitions, the manners and customs of the people, is more attractive to the general reader. Statistics, however, and even the natural history of the island, are not overlooked. The author seems to have aimed at exhausting the subject in all respects, and he has pretty well succeeded in his purpose.

Man comprises two hundred square miles, much of it hilly and waste, and about fifty thousand inhabitants. With lighter taxation than England, it returns about £70,000 of revenue. The people are Celtic, and speak a language resembling the Gaelic of our Scottish Highlanders. They have retained old customs and superstitions longer than any other people under the British crown. Will it be believed that the kindling of Baal fires—that is, celebrating the anniversary of the pagan god Baal or Bel—was observed on the 1st of May, 1837? Or that a trial, equivalent to a trial for witchcraft, went on before a jury of Manxmen in December, 1843? On this occasion, while a poor woman was in the course of being asked if she ever came in any shape or form to do John Quine an injury, a wag let loose a rabbit in the court, when all became extreme confusion, and the jury, with eyes staring, hair on end, and mouths distorted, exclaimed, "The witch! the witch!" nor was the uproar quieted, till one of the crowd seized and killed the animal. There still survives in this island, in the same latitude with the county of Cumberland, a fairy doctor of the name of Teare, who is resorted to when all other aid fails. "The messenger that is despatched to him on such occasions is neither to eat nor drink by the way, nor even to tell any person his mission; the recovery is said to be perceptible from the time the case is stated to him." Farmers delay their sowing till Teare can come to bless the seed. Mr. Train has seen and conversed with this strange pretender.

"The first time I saw him he was mounted on a little Manx pony, that seemed aware of its master having neither whip nor spur to quicken its pace, as it moved tardily along the wayside. The seer is a little man, far advanced into the vale of life; in appearance he was healthy and active; he wore a low-crowned slouched hat, evidently too large for his head, with a broad brim; his coat, of an old-fashion make, with his vest and breeches, were all of loaghtyn wool, which had never undergone any process of dyeing; his shoes, also, were of a color not to be distinguished from his stockings, which were likewise of loaghtyn wool.

"Mr. Kelly, chief magistrate of Castletown, was kindly driving me in his gig to Port St. Mary, whither also Mr. Teare was proceeding; and where, he informed us, he was to remain for the night. Aware that it was not agreeable to many, even of the most intelligent Manxmen, to hear direct allusions made by a stranger to any of the superstitious observances of the lower orders of the people, I avoided as much as possible making any inquiries that might give offence. Mr. Kelly, seeing, however, from the nature of my questions, and from my travelling in the mountains, and associating with the peasantry, that my chief object was to become acquainted with all the existing peculiarities of the people, on our arrival at the inn generously introduced me to the great fairy doctor, as a person eminently qualified to give me all the statistical information which the island could afford. After communicating to the seer my object in visiting the island, Mr. Kelly remarked with a magisterial air, 'I know, Mr. Teare, that by probing the secret springs of nature, you can either accelerate, retard, or turn aside at pleasure the natural course of events, but you must make oath before me, in presence of this stranger, that you never call evil spirits to your assistance.' The seer assented, and the oath was administered with due solemnity by the magistrate, who after listening to some singular stories from the doctor, departed for Castletown, leaving us to spend the evening together. There was a pithy quaintness in the doctor's conversation, and his answers were generally couched in idiomatic proverbialisms. He said he was required by his professional business to travel more than any person in the island, and when I expressed my surprise at a person of his advanced years enduring such fatigue, he replied, 'The crab that lies always in its hole is never fat.'

The promptings of superstition are often cruel: there is a notable instance in the Manx custom of hunting the wren on St. Stephen's day, when the populace go about with a captive bird of that species, distributing its feathers as charms against witchcraft, after which they inter it on the sea-shore. Often, again, there is a strange wild beauty in superstitious ideas, as in the following case:—"On New-Year's eve, in many of the upland cottages, it is yet customary for the house-wife, after raking the fire for the night, and just before stepping into bed, to spread the ashes smooth over the floor with the tongs, in the hope of finding in it next morning the track of a foot; should the toes of this ominous print point towards the door, then it is believed a member of the family will die in the course of that year; but should the heel of the fairy foot point in that direction, then it is as firmly believed that the family will be augmented within the same period." There was once a mighty enchantress in the island. "By her alluring arts, she ensnared the hearts of so many men around where she resided, causing them to neglect their usual occupations, that the country presented a scene of utter desolation. They neither ploughed nor sowed; their gardens were all overgrown with weeds, their once fertile fields were covered with stones, their cattle died for want of pasture, and their turf lay undug in the commons. This universal charmer having brought things to such a deplorable crisis, under pretence of making a journey to a distant part of the island, set out on a milk-white palfrey, accompanied by her admirers on foot, till, having led them into a deep river, she drowned six hundred of the best men the island had ever seen, and then flew away in the shape of a bat. To prevent the recurrence of a like disaster, these wise people ordained that their women should henceforth go on foot and follow the men, which custom is so religiously observed, that if by chance a woman is observed walking before a man, whoever sees her cries out immediately 'Tehi! Tehi!' which, it seems, was the name of the enchantress who occasioned this law."

The supposition that fairies sometimes took away mortal babes, and left their own wretched offspring in their place is perhaps now declined in Man, as in other places; but it was rife a century ago. Waldron, who wrote a book on Man, published in 1732, gives the following account:—"I was prevailed on," says he, "to go and see a child, who, they told me, was one of these changelings; and indeed must own, was not a little surprised as well as shocked at the sight. Nothing under heaven could have a more beautiful face; but though between five and six years old, and seemingly healthy, he was so far from being able to walk or stand, that he could not so much as move any one joint. His limbs were vastly long for his age, but smaller than an infant's of six months; his complexion was perfectly delicate, and he had the finest hair in the world. He never spoke nor cried, ate scarce anything, and was very seldom seen to smile; but if any one called him a fairy elf, he would frown and fix his eyes so earnestly on those who said it, as if he would look them through. His mother, or at least his supposed mother, being very poor, frequently went out a charring, and left him a whole day together. The neighbors, out of curiosity, have often looked in at the window to see how he behaved when alone, which whenever they did, they were sure to find him laughing, and in the utmost delight. This made them judge that he was not without company more pleasing to him than any mortals could be; and what made this conjecture seem the more reasonable was, that if he were left ever so dirty, the woman at her return, saw him with a clean face, and his hair combed with the utmost exactness and nicety."

From the Lutheran Standard.

"Baptismal Regeneration."

The Editor of the "Ebenezer Department," appears to be fixed with a determined purpose to explode the Lutheran church on Baptism, even though it be at the expense of scripture and logical arguments. In the "Lutheran Observer" of No. 19, he reviews, at some length, an article published in the Standard, some months since, on this subject, in which he asserts or attempts to prove, that the doctrine of "Baptismal Regeneration," as defined in the Standard, "involves the most palpable contradictions, and, if faithfully maintained, must destroy some of the cardinal doctrines of the Gospel."

We fear that in his zeal brother Strobel has again been fighting against the Confessions of our Church. He does admit that all infants are conceived and born in sin, and that they come into this world with natures totally depraved, but denies that they need be justified in the same sense as adults. His words are, "They cannot be regarded as sinners in the strict sense of that term, (inasmuch as they have not committed actual sin) and consequently it is not necessary for them to be pardoned, or be justified in the same sense as adults." In order that the Southern Editor's departure from the doctrine of our Church on this subject may be more apparent, we will contrast his language above with the language of the II. Article of the Augsburg Confession. "This inborn sickness and original sin is truly sin, and condemns all under the wrath of God who are not born again through Baptism and the Holy Ghost." The teaching of this Confession agrees with the teaching of our Saviour. John 3: 5, "Except a man (Greek—tis, any one,) be born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

If then, all infants are conceived and born in sin, and come into this world with natures totally depraved, do not their inherited sin and natures totally depraved render them unfit for heaven, and before they can enter therein, must not their sin, be pardoned and their unholy natures sanctified? If this is necessary, should not our opponents show us some means, aside from Baptism, by which this is effected, or cease their opposition to the means by which we maintain this to be effected, with the authority of scripture to support us? For, if these effects be denied to Baptism, many portions of the New Testament must appear utterly unintelligible. Is not every baptized infant thereby brought into a covenant relation with God, in which He promises to "forgive their iniquity and remember their sin no more?" Jer. 31: 31! Are not they by Baptism brought into a covenant relation of mystical union with Christ as the head of the body, the Church, in which they as members in particular are sanctified and cleansed by the washing of water by the word?

But this doctrine, if faithfully maintained, must destroy some of the cardinal doctrines of the Gospel. So says brother S. "If it is contended that in Baptism our sins are pardoned, and we become righteous before God, and that by a faithful use of the means of grace we continue in favor with Him, what ication of such works argues well for the Church, showing that there is a continued demand for what will promote religion of the heart and life.

Steps to the Altar; a Manual of Devotions and Meditations for the Blessed Eucharist. Compiled by a Parish Priest. First American edition. New York, Stanford & Swords: 1848.

This is another manual, republished from an English work under the direction of a Presbyterian of New York, akin to the former, and the devout spirit within is clothed in a most attractive form. We hail it as a happy omen that the demand for such books should, as we are sure it will, justify their publication. If this work we need only say as sufficient commendation, what is said in the prefatory notice. "The works of Bishops ANDREWES, COSIN, KEN, and WILSON, may be mentioned as chief sources from which matter has been drawn." Any thing more we might have desired to say is rendered needless by the following from a correspondent.—

Steps to the Altar. &c.

By a Parish Priest: Stanford & Swords.

The work, with the above title, is deserving of patient, attentive, earnest study. It is one of a class of Books much needed at the present time, and the more we have of them the better for the Church at large. It is not our intention to go much into detail with this work, but we shall point at a few of its excellencies and merits. It contains, for instance, devotions for the Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday of the week before COMMUNION, devotions also at the CELEBRATION itself, and special devotions for the Monday and Tuesday after Communion. Again, there is a prayer for those who are not able to communicate. Then there are Prayers for Holy Seasons, and select passages for Reading and Meditation from various Authors, with which the pages close. A more simple arrangement could not have been selected, nor one agreeing better with the ceremony itself. The select passages are peculiarly beautiful, and when I state that such names as those of good old Bishop Wilson, of the saintly Beveridge, of the pious Brevint, of Taylor the eloquent and the learned, of Andrewes, of S. Bernard, of Dean Comber, of Quesnel, of Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambray, of our own excellent, sound and learned Bishop Pearson, etc. We shall be of but one mind in regard to its utility and worth. To my own mind the beauty of the volume lies in its exceeding simplicity, its genuine excellency, its intrinsic value. As a manual, as a vade mecum, it must take a high stand. This simple expression, from the Author's notice, contains the germ of an excellent truth, and we would that all compilers, for similar purposes, would avail themselves of it. "The works of Bishops ANDREWES, COSIN, KEN, and WILSON, may be mentioned as chief sources from which matter has been drawn. Great use has been made of Lake's Officium Eucharisticum, and a little has been derived from more ancient stores of devotion;" and truly, if these stores were more often consulted, and especially the stores of our own Mother Church, we should have a richer view of devotion, a greater treasury of sound and gospel truth.

We were attracted by the title of the volume. And it is truly what it purports to be. May those steps guide many till they kneel around the sacred board, and may they be often fed! May they grow more spiritual, and like unto their Divine Lord; and may this humble instrument, in the hands of Almighty God, lead many unto righteousness, and into the way of saving duty.

For the above works we are indebted to the Messrs. Appletons, where they may be found for sale. The most interesting work, a part of whose notice from "the English Review" is found as the first "selection," may also be had at the Messrs. Appleton's.

Fruits of Joy and peace in Believing. A Sequel to "Joy and Peace in Believing," by Mrs. R. L. Hopper. From the second London Edition. Philadelphia: Herman Hooker, 16 S. Seventh Street: 1848.

We have not had time to give that examination to this little work, which would enable us to speak (as we are determined only to speak, and that conscientiously in such cases,) from our own knowledge of its merits. In glancing over it our attention was engaged by some happy illustrations of "the fruits of joy and peace in believing" as afforded by the early Christian Martyrs. Some of these instances we will extract at a future time, for the benefit of our readers.

We give the following able article, from the English Churchman, in reference to the erection of Roman sees in England.

The Canons of the Catholic Church relative to the Consecration of Bishops, are of the utmost value to the Church of England at the present time. They will be found to act like a two-edged sword, defending her from Dr. Hampden on the one hand, and from Roman aggression on the other. The fourth Canon of the first Ecumenical Council of Nice (A. D. 325) is to this effect:—

"It is most fitting that a Bishop be appointed by all the Bishops of the province. But if this be difficult, by reason of any urgent necessity or through the length of the way, three must by all means meet together; and, when those who are absent have agreed in their votes, and signified the same by letters, then let the Ordination take place. But in every province, the ratification of what is done must be allowed to the Metropolitan."

The sixth Canon of the same Council is similar:—

"This is manifest as possible; that if any be made Bishop without consent of the Metropolitan, this great Synod has determined that such a one ought not to be a Bishop. If any two or three, out of affectation of dispute, do contradict the suffrage of the generality, when duly passed according to Ecclesiastical Canon, let the vote of the majority prevail."

It is evident from these Canons, that no Bishop can be canonically consecrated without the joint consent of the Metropolitan and the majority of the Bishops of the Province. And the bearing of this decision of the Catholic Church upon the Hampden controversy is very important. It has been said that the Government could easily obtain the consent of three Bishops in the province of Canterbury to consecrate Dr. Hampden. He might, indeed enjoy the temporalities of the See of Hereford, and sit in the House of Lords; but, without the consent of the Metropolitan and the majority of the Bishops of the province, he would have no mission. We trust that the Archbishop of Canterbury and the protesting Bishops of his province will act firmly upon these Canons, should it be necessary. The cause of the Church is in their hands: Dr. Hampden cannot be a canonical Bishop of the Church of England without their consent.

If these Canons be useful in protecting the Church of England from an heretical English Bishop, they are not of less use against the intrusion of the emissaries of the Pope, whether they be Englishmen or foreigners. Without noticing the serious doubts which theologians have of the validity of the Ordination of any Bishop (and of course also of all whom he ordains) who has not been consecrated by three Bishops, or two at the least; which we believe is the case of the Romish intrusive Bishops in England, Ireland, Scotland, and America; the above Canons clearly prove that they are in reality no Bishops at all, for they have all been consecrated in spite of the Metropolitans and their Suffragans. As to those foreign Bishops, who first came over and commenced the schism in England and Ireland, (Bishop and Smith in England, in 1623 and 1625; and Creagh and Gibbon in Ireland, in the reign of Elizabeth) their case is completely met by the twenty-second Canon of the fourth Œcumenical Council of Chalcedon (A. D. 451).—

"Let not a Bishop go into another city or district, not pertaining to him, to ordain any one, or to appoint any Presbyters or Deacons to places subject to another Bishop, unless with the consent of the proper Bishop of the district. If any one dare to do otherwise, let the ordination be invalid, and himself be punished by the Synod."

The twenty-eighth (thirty-sixth) Apostolical Canon is still stronger.

"Let not a Bishop presume to ordain in cities and villages not subject to him; and if he be convicted of doing so, without consent of those to whom such places belong, let him and those whom he has ordained be deposed."

If the Romanists refer to the usurped authority which the Pope exercised over the Church of England for some centuries previous to the Reformation, we beg they will consult the eighth Canon of the third Œcumenical Council, assembled at Ephesus, A. D., 431. The point in dispute was, whether the Patriarch of Antioch had a right to govern the Church of Cyprus, and to consecrate its Bishops; and it was decided as follows:—

"An innovation upon the rule of the Church and the Canons of the holy fathers, such as affects the general liberties of Christendom, has been reported to us by our venerable brother Rhæginus, and his fellow Bishops of Cyprus, Zeno, and Evagrius. Wherefore, since public disorders call for extraordinary remedies, as being more perilous, and whereas it is against ancient usage that the Bishop of Antioch should ordain in Cyprus, as has been proved to us in this Council, both in word and writing, by most orthodox men; we therefore decree that the Prelates of the Cyprian Churches shall be suffered without let or hindrance to consecrate Bishops by themselves, and moreover that the same rule shall be observed also in other Dioceses and provinces everywhere, so that no Bishop shall interfere in another province, which has not from the very first been under him and his predecessors; and further, that if any one has so encroached and tyrannized, he must relinquish his claim, that the canons of the fathers be not infringed, nor the Priesthood be made an occasion and pretence for the pride of worldly power, nor the least portion of that freedom unawares be lost to us, which our Lord Jesus Christ who bought the world's freedom, vouchsafed to us when He shed His own blood. Wherefore it has seemed good to this Holy Œcumenical Council that the rights of every province should be preserved pure and inviolate, which have always belonged to it, according to the usage which has ever obtained, each Metropolitan having full liberty to take a copy of the acts for his own security, and should any rule be adduced repugnant to this decree, it is hereby repealed."

Here we have a remarkable parallel to the dispute between Rome and us; and we see what was the decision of the Catholic Church upon it. It must be observed that the decree is based altogether upon ancient usage, and is passed for all provinces in all future times, as well as for the immediate exigency; and that everything contrary to it is repealed. Our Bishops, therefore, at the Reformation did not separate or dissent from the Church of Rome. They did but vindicate their ancient rights, and act as grateful and zealous champions of the decrees of the Catholic Church; for Great Britain and Ireland were completely independent of the Pope in A. D. 431. Even Roman Catholic writers have admitted that our Bishops were perfectly justified in what they did. Thus the learned Franciscan Barnes says, (Catholicæ-Romanus Pacificus, sec. iii., De insulæ Magnæ Britanniæ privilegiis).—

"According to the 8th canon of the Council of Ephesus, the ancient privileges of Churches ought to be preserved, and those which have been taken away by force ought to be recovered. Now the island of Britain formerly enjoyed the same privilege as the island of Cyprus, that it should be subject to the laws of no patriarch. And, although this privilege was formerly set aside by force and the tumults of wars, yet when it was recovered in the time of Henry the Eighth, by the consent of the whole kingdom, and from that time ordained, it ought, for the sake of peace, to be retained without loss of Catholicity and without the mark of any schism."

Notwithstanding this, the Pope has excommunicated the English Church. But, to use the words of St. Augustine to Classicianus, "Illud plane non temere dixerim, quod si quisquam fidelium fuerit anathematus injuste, ei potius oberit qui faciet, quam ei qui hanc patitur injuriam." However, as our thirtieth Canon of 1604 proves, the English Church does not excommunicate the Romish Church in return. Consequently no foreign Catholic is precluded from attending our Churches; for there is nothing in our ritual that can give him offence, or which he can refuse to acknowledge as wholly and entirely true. It is of no use to assert that our ceremonies are different from those to which he has been accustomed; for as St. Gregory says to Leander, "In una fide nihil officit Sanctæ Ecclesiæ consuetudo diversa." A small variation in discipline will justify no man in becoming a schismatic.

"When I come to Rome, (says St. Ambrose, Archbishop of Milan) I fast on Saturday; when I am at Milan, I do not fast; and so, when thou goest to any Church, observe its customs, if thou wouldest neither give just cause of offence, nor take offence without cause."

St. Ambrose did not look for Milanites at Rome, nor, if he were alive now, would he look for Romanists in England.

And if this be the case with foreigners, and their responsibility when they come among us, what is to be said of those, our natural-born subjects, who venture upon such insufficient grounds to withdraw themselves from a Church, between which and them the obstacles to union are all of their own making? For surely they will not presume to make those things obstacles to communion, the belief of which the Nicene Fathers never urged, as essential to any man's salvation. We do not know why the Romanists separate from our Church, except it be for this one reason, that the Pope has ordered them to do so—a sufficient authority in Rome, but of no more authority in the British dominions than the Bishop of any other Diocese in Christendom. And they who, in obedience to his commands, separate from their canonical Bishops, are accountable for the sin of weakening the authority of the Episcopate of Christ, as well as for the guilt of living avowed and determined in schism.

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—In common with others who have the welfare of our Church institutions at heart, your readers, no doubt, delight to hear of their prosperity. And if at any time rumours have been circulated which tend to injure their usefulness, by establishing the belief, that a tendency to error prevailed within them; it must be equally pleasing to learn that such statements cannot now be maintained. The Institution to which I now particularly allude is the General Theological Seminary, against which, many charges have been made and efforts used to fasten upon those connected with it a desire to adopt the erroneous doctrines and practices of a corrupt communion. With occurrences of former years I have nothing to do; the present is all that comes within my knowledge. And hence it is that I desire to call your attention to the following extracts from a Sermon delivered by Professor Ogilby at the recent matriculation of the Junior Class.

The extract here alluded to regarding an important but incidental topic has already appeared in the Banner.

These remarks are plainly indicative of the general tone of instruction prevailing in the Seminary, and carry with them the more weight, inasmuch as they proceed from one, who, has been accused of favoring the introduction of novelties. That the advice of the Professor was drawn forth by the existence of the evil to which he refers may be an argument which, at first sight, seems solid, but this he utterly disclaims in his prefatory note which I quote as follows: "Had he" (the Professor) "looked only to the present state of things within the Seminary, he might have deemed the advice given in regard to devotional books unnecessary; but as a caution against obvious dangers, he thought it not irrelevant." Hoping, Messrs. Editors, that this brief communication may possess sufficient interest to obtain a place in your Journal, I conclude with the earnest prayer, that it may be effectual in removing, some of the misapprehensions which unfortunately have prevailed.

CHRIST CHURCH, READING.—We are happy to announce that the Episcopal Church of this city, which has been closed since May last, for the purpose of being enlarged and improved, will be re-opened on Sunday next (to-morrow) with appropriate religious services—the Bishop of the Diocese officiating. A friend has prepared for us the following full description of the improvements the edifice has undergone during this somewhat protracted interval, which, as a faithful chronicler of our city's progress in size, prosperity and consequent architectural embellishment, we cheerfully publish:

CHRIST CHURCH, as it stood, was 40 by 50 feet in the clear inside, with four two-light pointed windows on each side; a flat ceiling, and a square tower in the rear. It was decided by the Vestry, to take down the tower and extend the building 32 feet 6 inches in depth, and the vestibule the width of the Church, thereby gaining about forty pews. To accomplish this with economy and in a proper architectural style, an Architect was employed to furnish plans and superintend the alteration. The style adopted is termed the Early English Gothic; the lancet heads of the side-windows agreeing with that style, it was but little expense to reduce them to the proper proportions. These windows are now painted in imitation of diamond lights of ground glass, with stained borders. The ceiling is inclined by being raised in the centre 7 feet above the tie-beams, and represents an open roof, with moulded tie-beams, rafters, perlines, king and queen posts, filled in between the mullions with trefoiled heads. The spandrels formed by the wall pieces and curved braces under the tie-beams, are filled in with quatrefoils, &c.—large semi-octagonal moulded corbels under each brace with quatrefoils in each, and octagonal moulded pendants under each queen post, also a large cornice along the wall-plates.

All the above is stained a dark oak, the sheathing being a little lighter than the timbers.

The chancel is half the width of the Church, and eight feet deep, with a vestry on one side, and library on the other.—The jambs are splayed, and the chancel arch decorated with the tooth moulding, and supported by semi-octagonal piers with foliated cap. The chancel-rail is supported by an arcade on columns, and stands between the piers. The triple window in the back, which is composed of leaden diamond sash, filled with rich stained and painted glass, (presented by Gen. George M. Keim.). This window is set on a corbel-table, which extends across the chancel, beneath which stands the communion table against the wall, with a purple cover, embroidered with a beautiful Gloria of gold. The Bishop's chair is on the right of the table. The pulpit is a neat octagonal design, on a stem, outside the chancel, opposite the north pier. The Lectern is a plain stand, with a double inclined book-board for Bible and Prayer-books, and placed opposite the south pier. The Font is of brown stone, large size—an octagonal bowl, on a clustered shaft and round base, placed in front, and opposite the central division of the pews. Over the doors on each side of the chancel, are triple arched niches, enriched with columns, hood-moulds and corbels, which will contain the Creed and the Commandments.—Over the vestibule is assigned the Organ loft and choir, the front of which is finished with an arcade on columns in oak, with crimson background.—The pew ends are paneled with trefoil heads and shields in the panel, upon which the numbers are placed. The pew ends and rails are painted oak and the inside crimson, to match the cushions.

In publishing this description, we deem it proper to add, that the highest praise is due the Architect—John E. Carver, Esq.—who furnished the plan, and superintended the improvements of the Church. The work fully sustains his reputation as an Architect, and we freely commend him as among the first in his profession. His works are already known to the public, and for correct architectural design, and pure taste, cannot be excelled. The Church—or more properly, its interior—is now undoubtedly one of the most beautiful that can be found out of our large cities; and in commending the Architect, we must award due credit to the builders, Messrs. Miller & Craig, for the faithful manner in which they have carried out his designs. These gentlemen have already erected some of the most beautiful and ornamental buildings in our city, and it is to be hoped they will receive the full share of patronage they merit. We also notice the painting of the Church, by Messrs. Durell & Seiling, which is done in the most workmanlike manner. The ceiling and pews, painted and grained in imitation of oak, the work at the Chancel, and the painted windows, are all as perfect as is possible for art to reach. The Plasterers, Messrs. Dempster & Fowler, of Philadelphia, have executed their work in the best style.

The Baptismal Font, described above, was made by Messrs. Greiner & Marsh, of this city, and is pronounced by connoisseurs in art, a perfect model. As they are young men, just commencing business, we take pleasure in commending their really beautiful work, in the hope that our citizens will not neglect them.

In conclusion, we would say, that the gentlemen upon the Building Committee—particularly our friend J. L. Stichter, Esq.—together with the Rector of the Church, deserve the hearty thanks of the congregation, for the indefatigable manner in which they attended to the burdensome duties of superintending the whole work upon the Church, as it progressed from day to day. They had much to look after, and have faithfully served the congregation, for whose benefit the improvements are designed.—Reading Gazette.

In all, twenty churches, having reported SEVEN HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIX persons, in whose ears the following and similar sentences from God's holy word have been uttered by His appointed ministers, once, twice, perhaps a dozen times, during the year; "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father, who is in heaven. Even so hath the Lord also ordained that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel. He that soweth little shall reap little: he that soweth plenteously shall reap plenteously. Let him that is taught in the word minister unto him that teacheth in all good things. Whoso hath this world's good and seeth his brother have need and shutteth up his compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in im?" This has been, too, at times when men should most feel their own spiritual poverty, and be most deeply affected by the spiritual and temporal wants of others. How, then, could they possibly pass thus a whole year without contributing one towards the support of those co-workers with Jesus in our western wilds, who, they know, have been asking us, "for the love of Christ" to send them the promised aid, which has been *due for nine months! Who shall fully make known the pinching poverty, or the distressing accumulation of debt for the necessities of life, attendant upon such delay?

Some may plead that they have been building or repairing their church, and therefore have had nothing to spare for missions. The excuse has plausibility. It may somewhat attenuate, but it does not wholly justify the neglect of our missionaries abroad. Current necessary expenses must be met at all hazards. Every one allows this. Extraordinary expenses—as church building—must be supplied by extraordinary means. What man starves, or half-starves, or even inconveniences himself or family to any extent, because he is building a house? What man so foolish as to weaken his physical powers or injure his health, in order that he may nger out a sickly existence in the house which he has built at a dear cost? Many Christians, alas, do this. The violent exertion of building a house of worship, in style or size beyond their means, exhausts their strength; and they languish if not in spiritual imbecility, at least in a state of pecuniary exhaustion, which renders them powerless to provide for the daily returning wants of Christ's family. Surely, "these things ought not so to be."

"Remote from towns he ran his godly race, Nor e'er had changed nor wish'd to change his place."
A certain priest, happy in his high vocation,
With faith, and hope, and charity, well served his village altar.
Men count riches, he was poor; but great were his treasures in heaven,

and great his joys on earth, for God's sake doing good:
He had few cares and many consolations, one of the welcome every where:

the labourer accounted him his friend, and magnates did him honour at their table;

With a large heart and little means he still made many grateful, and felt as the centre of a circle, of comfort, calmness and content.

But on a weaker Sabbath—for he preached both well and wisely—

some casual hearer loudly praised his great neglected talents:
Why should he be buried in obscurity, and throw these pearls to swine?

Could he not still be doing good—the whilst he pushed his fortunes;

then came temptation, even on the spark of discontent:

the neighbouring town had a pulpit to be filled, hotly did he canvass, and won it:

Now was he popular and courted, and listened to the spell of admiration, and toiled to please the taste, rather than to pierce the conscience.

greedily he sought, and seeking found, the patronizing notice of the great;

he thirsted for emulations and honours, and counted rich men happy:

So he flattered, so he preached; and gold and fame flowed in;
They flowed in,—he was reaping his reward,—and felt himself a fool.

Alas, what a shadow was he following,—how precious was the substance he had left!

Man for God, gold for good, this was his miserable bargain.

The village church, its humble flock, and humbler parish priest,

Zeal, devotion, and approving heaven,—his books, and simple life,

His little farm and flower-beds,—his recreative rambles with a friend,

And haply at eventide the leaping trouts, to help their humble fare,—

All these wretchedly exchanged for what the world called fortune,

With the harrowing conscience of a state relapsed to vain ambitions.

Then,—for God was gracious to his soul,—his better thoughts returned,

And better aims with better thoughts, his holy walk of old.

Sickened of style, and ostentation, and the dissipative fashions of society,

He deserted from the ranks of mammon, and renewed his allegiance to God:

For he found that the praises of men, and all that gold can give,

Are not worthy to be named against godliness and calm contentment."

Dear Mr. Editor, when I look abroad at the feebleness of the Church in the country, and the actual destitution of many places where once she had a footing, and think of her sworn sons, discontented with their obscurity, looking out for comfortable parishes, or standing all the day idle, in the market place, thoughts arise which I am loth to entertain, yet which are difficult to expel.
Perhaps the publication of the above (a part of Tupper's lines on contentment) as a gentle hint, would do no harm.

MR. EDITOR:—
DEAR SIR—By publishing the following you will confer a

Your correspondent, "S." in the last number of the Banner, on "General Missions in Pennsylvania," seems directly to aim his remarks at a particular parish, the members of which are quite ready to acknowledge their deficiencies: but would it not be well to inquire more particularly into the true state of affairs before founding such pointed remarks on the mere "Journal Reports." Had the writer only been generalizing, he might have said as of others "no report," or by referring to the accounts current at the end of the Journal, and elsewhere, he might have ascertained that at least we did not deserve a double set of noughts.

A MEMBER OF ST. THOMAS.

February 8th, 1848.

Selected for the Banner of the Cross.

All the doctrines of the gospel are practical principles. The word of God was not written, the Son of God was not incarnate, the Spirit of God was not given, only that Christians might obtain right views and possess just notions. Religion is something more than mere correctness of intellect, justness of conception, and exactness of judgment. It is a life-giving principle. It must be infused into the habit as well as govern in the understanding; it must regulate the will, as well as direct the creed. It must not only cast the opinions into a right frame, but the heart into a new mould. It is a transforming, as well as a penetrating principle. It changes the tastes, gives activity to the inclinations, and together with a new heart, produces a new life.

Christianity enjoins the same temper, the same spirit, the same dispositions on all its real professors. The act, the performance must depend on circumstances which do not depend on us. The power of doing good is withheld from many; from whom, however, the reward will not be withheld. If the external act constitute the whole value of Christian virtue, then must the Author of all good be himself the author of injustice, by putting it out of the power of multitudes to fulfil his own commands. In principles, in tempers, in fervent desires, in holy endeavors, consists the very essence of Christian duty.

Sacred Music.

BY MISS MARY JANE GRAHAM.

The expression of sacred music comprehends every emotion that can agitate the human heart, and must be felt rather than described. The subdued tones of awful adoration, the impassioned fervor of desire, the humility of prayer, the wailing of penitential sorrow, the glad notes of thanksgiving, and the loud chorus of praise, all these have their own peculiar utterance, and must be pervaded by a depth and solemnity which shall distinguish them from the meaner affections of humanity.

I am fearful of touching too lightly upon this hallowed subject. Many young persons, when their feelings are excited by sacred music, imagine themselves to be bettered by such feelings, and to be under the influence of genuine religious sentiments. But if the plain majesty of the word of God does not suffice to kindle an equal fervor within us, when we are reading it silently and alone, we may be sure that the emotions excited by the lovely songs and pleasant instruments of men are the mere ebullitions of natural feeling, and have nothing to do with religion. Those who would sing the praises of the Lord, must "sing with the understanding." The undying torch of truth must be lighted up in that faculty, before it can set the heart in a flame. There exists not a more dangerous delusion, than to mistake the feverish excitement of the imagination for the cheerful and steady glow of a rational devotion.

But while I so anxiously guard you against this pernicious error, do not for a moment suppose that I would shut you out from the privilege which all creation enjoys of sounding its Maker's praise. O! there is a harmony in nature inconceivably attuned to one glad purpose! Every thing in the universe has a voice, with which it joins in the tribute of thanksgiving. The whispers of the wind playing with the summer foliage, and its fitful moanings through the autumnal branches, the broken murmur of the stream, the louder gushing of the waterfall, and the wild roar of the cataract, all speak the praises of God to our hearts.—Who can sit by the sea-side when every wave lies hushed in adoration, or falls upon the shore in subdued and awful cadence, without drinking in unutterable thought of the majesty of God! The loud hosannas of ocean in the storm, and the praise of God on the whirlwind, awaken us to the same lesson, and every peal of the thunder is a hallelujah to the Lord of Hosts. O! there is a harmony in nature! The voice of every creature tells us of the goodness of God. He comes to us in the song of the birds; the deep delicious tones in which the wood-dove breathes out his happiness, the gracefully melting descant of the nightingale, the joyous, thrilling melody of the lark, the throble's wild warbling, and the black-bird's tender whistle, the soft piping of the bulfinch, the gay carol of the wren, the sprightly call of the goldfinch, and the gentle twittering of the swallow. Even now, when every other bird is silent, little robin is pouring out his sweetest of all sweet notes upon yonder rose-bush; and so distinctly does he thank God, who made the berries to grow for him upon the hawthorn and mountain-ash, and who has put it into the heart of man to love him, and strew crumbs for him when the berries fall, that my soul, too often insensible to its own mercies, is warmed into gratitude for his. The very insect tribe have entered into a covenant, that God shall, at no season of the year, be without a witness among them to his praise. For when the hum of the bees and the chirping of the grasshopper have ceased to enliven us, and the gnat has laid by his horn, then the little cricket wakens into life and song, and gladdens our hearth with the same story till winter is past. And so all nature praises God, and is never weary. If then you are able "to make melody in your heart to the Lord," let your hand and your voice make melody too; and let the faculty which infinite benevolence has created for your enjoyment, be converted, as all your other faculties should be, into the instrument of praise.

BAD BOYS.—It has been decided in Massachusetts, that a pupil cannot be turned out of school. The Judge ruled that the worse the pupil's character was, the more need of school influence to reform it.

As we cut the above from an exchange paper, we think the learned Judge had forgotten the old adage, homely though it be—"one scabby sheep spoils the whole flock." If his honor had been a schoolmaster for some thirty years, he would perceive that though a bad boy needed the school-teaching which was offered him, he might, in a few weeks, do more to corrupt his companions than years could repair.—Gos. We appeal again to those who are able. We need $800 more than has been received and subscribed. With that amount we shall be able to complete the Church of God in order and of stone. If we may judge from present indications, when the Church is completed, the Missionary salary from the Domestic Committee will very soon cease, and the Church support its own Minister, and possibly, soon help to support other feeble Parishes. I hope this consideration will encourage a prompt answer to this renewed appeal.

Notices.

CHURCH OF THE ASCENSION.

This Church will be open for evening service, at 7 1/2 o'clock, on Sunday next.

THE FLOATING CHURCH.

Ladies interested in the erection of the proposed Floating Church, and desirous also of aiding the suffering poor among the families of seamen, are respectfully informed that two thirds of the profits on any articles sent to the approaching Fair, (to be held in the Chinese Museum on the 29th instant,) that are especially designated for the Floating Church, will be devoted to that object. The remaining third to be given to relieve the temporal necessities of those towards whose spiritual improvement the efforts of Churchmen are now directed. It is hoped that many of our communion, whose aid would have been given to the general objects of the Fair, will prefer sending it in the channel now proposed. While many who would not otherwise have contributed at all, will now doubtless exert themselves to promote an object so interesting to every Episcopalian.

Articles designated as above, can be sent to Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, No. 293 Chestnut street, or to No. 152 S. Third street, before the 29th instant. Feb. 19—2t

FLOATING CHAPEL FOR SEAMEN.

BEZA'S LATIN TESTAMENT,

FOR SCHOOL AND COLLEGE USE.

GEORGE S. APPLETON, 148 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, has now ready Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Jesu Christi. Interprete Theodoro Beza.

This new edition of the world renowned translation of Beza, is beautifully and very accurately printed from stereotype plates cast in England, supervised and corrected by a highly competent scholar.

The now acknowledged propriety of giving students of languages familiar works for translation,—thus adopting in the schools the mode by which the child first learns to talk—has induced the publication of this American edition.

Of the work, itself, it is hardly necessary to speak. Its publication was suggested by the favor with which the authors lectures on the Epistles were received at the Academy of Lausanne. The translation thus heralded, was received with a favor which, with Protestant Christians, it has never lost. Several editions were published during the life time of Beza, to which he made such improvements as his attention was directed to, or as were prompted by his familiarity, as Greek Professor, with the original. Since 1556, when it first appeared, at Geneva, this work has kept its place in the general esteem; while more recent versions have been so strongly tinged with the peculiarities of the translators as to make them acceptable to particular classes only.

To facilitate its introduction into schools and colleges, it is published at a low price, and furnished to teachers and the trade at a liberal discount. Teachers will be supplied with a copy of the work for examination gratis, on application, post paid.

The trade, to whom it will be furnished on the usual account, are requested to forward their orders. Feb. 12—3t

DR. LYONS' CHRISTIAN SONGS.

Published by GEORGE S. APPLETON, 148 Chestnut st., Philadelphia, CHRISTIAN SONGS, by the Rev. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL.D. The volume includes in its contents "THE HEROINE MARTYR OF MONTEREY," and appears as a thin octavo, on paper of the best quality, and neatly bound in cloth. Price 50 cents.

A volume got up in a substantial and elegant style. Our readers have had frequent opportunity of judging of the peculiar excellence of its contents.—Sat. Courier.

The work is imbued with the true spirit of piety. We have read these songs with great pleasure, and regard them as at once chaste, graceful, and breathing genuine Christianity.—Pennsylvania Inquirer.

They are truly poetical, though poetry appears in them constantly as the handmaid of religion.—Churchman.

We have read this elegantly printed volume with great delight. With rare excellencies, the author has no fault of style to mar the pleasure received from the perusal of his pages.—Protestant Churchman.

"The present selection is small and choice; nothing has been admitted merely to swell the size of the book, but every song has decided merit and ability."—Calendar.

"These much admired poems."—Burlington Gazette.

"They indicate a strong mind, sound sentiments, and a bright fancy."—Richmond Enquirer.

"A volume which should grace the collection of every reader of sensibility and taste."—Germantown Telegraph.

"We congratulate the religious world on this addition to its stock of sacred poetry."—Church, (Toronto).

"The volume is a gem of the first water."—Miss.

Just Published by the Episcopal Female Tract Society.

The Blind Slave in the Mines; the Roll Call; Patient Suffering, a Tract upon the Lord's Supper; also, 4 Tracts for boys, viz: The Reward of Disobedience, Truth and Honesty, Tom White, the Post Boy, and a Conversation upon the character of the Prophet Daniel, between Mr. Russell and his Scholars; the last written expressly for American Boys. Those who wish to improve the rising generation, and to curb the riotous and licentious spirit of the youths who infest our streets, especially on the Sabbath Day, might effect some good by purchasing a supply of these tracts, and distributing them, with affectionate exhortations, among these neglected idlers, who are pleased to receive them, and generally listen with respect to the conversations of those who appear to take an interest in their welfare.

They can be procured at the cheap Bookstore of Mr. Simons, at the corner of Fifth and Spruce streets, where purchasers can obtain very valuable books, at a reduced price; and also a variety of useful articles. All the publications of the E. F. Tract Society, which are in print, can be procured there. Tracts are so very cheap, that there are few persons who cannot afford to do good by purchasing a few to distribute. There have been such innumerable demands upon their Depository during the past year, that their gratuitous distribution must necessarily be limited, until they can procure the requisite funds to replenish their stock, by donations, and by their sales. REV. FREDERICK OGILBY, EDITOR.]

[VOL. X.—No. 8.—WHOLE No. 478.]

"Now for to show you I am a good Christian. I hope there is a good man (pointing to the Bishop) that will bear me witness that I have forgiven all the world; and even those in particular that have been the chief causes of my death. Who they God knows; I do not desire to know; I pray God forgive them. But this is not all; my charity must go further. I wish that they may repent; for they have indeed committed a great sin in that particular: I pray God, with St. Stephen, that this be not laid to their charge. Nay not only so, but that they may take the right way to the peace of the kingdom; for my charity commands me not only to forgive particular men, but my charity commands me to endeavour to the last gasp of the kingdom. So, sirs, I do wish with all my soul; and I do hope there are some here who will carry it further (turning to some gentlemen who wrote), that they may endeavour to the peace of the kingdom.

"Now, sirs, I must show you both how you are out of the way, and will put you in a way.

"First, you are out of the way. For certainly all the way you have ever had yet, as I could find by anything, is in the way of conquest. Certainly this is an ill way; for conquest, in my opinion, is never just, except there be a good just use either for matter of wrong or just title; and then, if you go beyond it, the first quarrel that you have to it, that makes it just at the end that was just at the first. But, if it be only matter of conquest, then it is a great robbery, as a pirate said to Alexander that he was the great robber: he was but a petty robber. And so, sirs, I do think the way that you are in is out of the way.

"Now, sirs, for to put you in the way. Believe it you will never do right, nor will God ever prosper you, until you give him his due, the king his due (that is, my successor), and the people their due. I am as much for them as any of you.

"You must give God his due, by regulating rightly his church according to his scripture), which is now out of order: for to put you in a way, particularly now, I cannot, but only this; a national synod, freely called, freely debating among themselves, to settle this, when that every opinion is freely and clearly heard.

"For the king—indeed I will not (then turning to a gentleman that touched the axe, he said, Hurt not the axe, that may hurt me); for the king, the laws of the land will clearly instruct you for that; therefore, because it concerns my own particular, only give you a touch of it.

"For the people—and truly I desire their liberty and freedom as much as anybody whomsoever. But I must tell you that their liberty and freedom consist in having of government those laws by which their life and their goods may be maintained. It is not for bare liberty, but for liberty with law.

The life and character of Luther have been brought rather conspicuously before public attention of late years. The taste for the striking and powerful forms of character, which has been so general among us lately, pervading the most different schools of sentiment and doctrine, has contributed to this. The movement of opinion respecting the Reformation has also contributed. The special mixture of character which Luther exhibits, has kept alive the discussions about him, when once begun. He is peculiarly a man whom persons both like to attack and like to defend. To his advocates belongs the undoubted fact that he was a great man; to his opponents the very awkward question, whether he was a saint. He was very amiable; he was very virulent. He was frank and simple; he was crafty and double. He was not vain; he was self-willed and overbearing. He liked power; he was indifferent to station. He had an ardent faith; he showed germs of rationalism. Few characters have exposed themselves more to the attacks of adversaries, or more engaged the sympathies of friends. His admirers are, indeed, fond of him,—fonder, perhaps, for the very fact that he has left himself so open to attack as he has. They think it an unfairness in fate to Luther, or in Luther to himself, for which they are bound in justice to compensate. Should he suffer for the temper which always made him show himself off to the worst? And should the fault, which his own frankness and carelessness about himself have put into our possession, not rather commend him the more to the generous judge?

Three biographies of Luther have appeared within the last few years; one by a friend, another by an enemy, and a third

I a neutral. D'Aubigne's biography—for the first half of his history of the Reformation may be so called—has the merit of a good deal of information, and a lively and pointed style, but then the thorough-going work of a partizan. The writer is always houring, and will let nothing speak for itself. His comments and not occupy particular positions, and collect themselves into blocs in groups, but are constant and ever recurring. The over-antiquity of detail in the narrative—a fault on its own account for is a worse fault as being so prolific of comment; for the tallest detail seldom wants its appendage. If the historian makes no remark to make, the preacher has; and the reader, harassed with an endless reiteration of small reflections and his ingenious instructions, retaliates, by regarding M. d'Aubigne as his writer a good deal more copious than weighty. His omissions in the line of fact are nearly as large, moreover, as his reiterations in the way of comment. He leaves out whole portions of Luther's character, or but faintly alludes to them. His aim is to assimilate Luther's ethical and religious mould to as much as possible to that of an evangelical preacher of the present day. Luther does not gain by his biographer's tenderness on this head; and the same process which cuts off the irregularities, narrows the expanse, and tames the freedom of character.

M. Audin has, as might be expected, inserted a good many touches which M. d'Aubigne's pencil left out. Nor, though highly relishing his task, has he performed it ill-temperately. His unfairness is not a malicious one; he delights in the amiable tasks of the favourist, and extols all his friends. His innocent audacity, the notorious Tetzels among the rest: thus he is not harsh and vituperative to opponents. He only names, however, the more active and fiery parts of the Reformation's character, and not the whole of it; and describes Luther's maternal career better than Luther himself.

M. Michelet's Life hardly professes to be more than a crude straggling performance: its composition having been the amusement of the writer during an illness. It consists, principally, of passages strung together from the table-talk, and those of Luther's writings where the Reformer speaks of himself. M. Michelet stands idly by, and gives the reader no assistance. An admiration of Luther's greatness, sympathy with his genial flow of spirits, and amusement at his faults and extravagances, compose, as far as we can see, the feeling of the partial biographer toward his hero: and the sceptic seems to be with quiet pleasure upon the medley which the religious reader, saint, and prophet of so many millions of Christians forbids.

The mode in which Luther is introduced to our notice, in the pages of national history, creates an impression of him as primarily a practical, rather than a doctrinal reformer. He comes before us suddenly as the opponent of some great practical abuses in the Church: we connect him, in the first instance, with the resistance to indulgences. We thus picture a doctrinal movement as arising, in process of time, out of a practical one; and Luther appears one of those rough, energetic minds which, only alive at first to the palpable and tangible, gradually advance to the department of opinion and belief. This is undoubtedly true of the multitudes whom Luther moved. They were moved, in the first instance, by the gross practical abuses in the Church; and those supplied that groundwork to the reforming movement, without which it could not have advanced at all. But it is not true of Luther. If there are two classes of influential men in the world, great practical men and men who propagate ideas, Luther belonged, in the first instance, to the latter. His mind was full of an idea, and he wished to propagate it. National history brings us across him for the first time engaged in a particular practical movement; but his biography shows that the doctrinal was then already begun and in progress.

The process by which leading ideas are arrived at is generally that of doubt and perplexity. A particular class of minds feels strongly the difficulties which surround the whole subject of morality and religion. Some have one difficulty, and some another. They dwell upon the obstacles to their internal peace with an intensity natural, or morbid, as may be: and, after they have brooded long enough, they hit on a solution. This solution is then the idea which occupies and fills their minds. They have felt a want, and they have relieved it; they have put their question, and had their answer: they have been in suspense, and now are settled. They prize the new conviction, because it succeeds to so much indefiniteness and void. The search has enhanced the discovery, the toil the reward; and the offspring of mental troubles is loved as an only child. The idea which has destroyed a difficulty is a victorious champion on which the mind reposes ever after, and to which it refers all of system, adjustment, and completeness it has attained to.

Luther had a natural character, which made him strongly alive to difficulties: that is to say, a character which partook largely of melancholy. Dante, Cromwell, Dr. Johnson, Cowper, Rousseau, Lord Byron, Shelley, are instances of men, who in their different ways, high or low, religious or sceptical, uncouth or refined, were melancholy men. Luther was one of this class of men. He had a mind intently self-contemplative, and profoundly unquiet, which, except the strongest active occupations diverted it, preyed upon itself; scrutinized its own faith, feelings, fears and hopes; pried into the mysteries of its own nature; and provoked internal dissatisfactions and struggles. Luther speaks of his great scenes of trial as being throughout life internal. His agonies, his temptations, his colloquies with himself or with Satan, the tenderest controversy and the most formidable disputant, were always with him. He had just that disposition on which particular difficulties, and the ideas which seem to solve them, lay remarkable hold.

The opening circumstances of Luther's life were not calculated to discourage or tame such a disposition. The calm of a restless spirit is activity; and quiet unsettles and agitates it. The retirement and dullness of the Augustin monastery at Wittenburgh, threw him the more upon himself and his own thoughts. The particular circumstances of his entrance into monastic life were also trying. A stroke of lightning which killed his bosom friend by his side, according to some writers, though others make the thunderstorm and the death of Alexis two different events, inspired him with sudden terror. A lively, joyous temperament was also most alive to calls; and possessed a power of forming sudden strong resolutions. He was able, in a moment, to change the prospects of a life; a vow uttered on the spot, dedicated him to monasticism; and the accomplished, philosophical, literary academician, the favourite of fellow-students who enjoyed his humour, and of scientific professors who predicted his greatness, called his friends together, enjoyed an evening of brilliant conversation and music, and the next morning knocked at the gate of the Augustin monastery, which closed after him. But the young devotee was not made a monk by the change. The constant interruptions to formal prayer were irksome to him: he did not stomach the household monastic tasks he was set to; tasks, indeed, needlessly humiliating and offensive, and, if intended to correct the fastidiousness of his previous education, arguing a blundering, however well-meaning discipline, in the monastery. Luther felt himself, in addition to the ordinary confinements and privations of a monastic life, to be among inferior and unsympathizing minds, alone, suspected, and ill-used.

There was another and more direct cause which led to religious melancholy and difficulties. Luther had ardent aspirations after the perfect and saintly character. There is not the smallest reason for doubting not only his sincerity, but his strength of will, and readiness to endure the greatest self-denial and mortification in pursuit of that character. But, impatient of regular discipline and routine, the more simple and external motive of obedience, for leading a holy life, was supplied in his case by a motive of another stamp. He had, what has been a frequent feature, though never a very sound one, in religionists, an active, not to say fidgety, desire for a state of conscious and palpable peace of mind. He was ambitious of inward satisfaction, the sensation of spiritual completeness. His devotion was based upon a direct aim at this result. He pursued it vehemently by ascetic means. He fasted, prayed, watched long and rigorously. 'Often on returning to his cell he knelt at the foot of the bed, and remained there until day-break.' His asceticism, mingling with the internal fever and tumult of his mind, gave him an unnatural strength; and he relates that 'once for a whole fortnight, he neither ate, drank, or slept.' His health gave way before such severities: from being fresh and plump, he became pale and emaciated, and was brought almost to death's door. One little fact shows the remarkable union of great irregularity in religion, with a morbid aim at perfectness. He would omit his daily breviary prayers for long periods: then, when his conscience smote him, he would make good the default with literal exactness, and scrupulously go through, in one continuous act, the precise amount of devotions he had omitted. That is to say, he was not satisfied with the feeling of having done something to atone for his fault: he wanted the feeling of having annihilated the fault itself, and put himself exactly into his original state as he stood before it was committed. In this way Luther went on, seeking with all the eagerness of direct effort an absolutely clear conscience. The pursuit, of course, did not succeed. A clear conscience was always farther off the farther he pursued it; and at the close of each stage of his devotional course, he was as discontented with himself as when he began. 'At the foot of the altar, his hands clasped, his eyes full of tears,' he prayed for peace, and found none. 'One morning the door of his cell not being open as usual, the brethren became alarmed; they knocked, and there was no reply. The door was burst in, and Fra Martin was found stretched on the ground, in a state of ecstasy, scarcely breathing, and well-nigh dead.' At the sight of the Holy Sacrament born in a procession, 'he perspired at every pore, and thought he should die of fear.' Vexed, wearied, harassed, and faint, his mind fell a prey to a formidable difficulty to which its labours and aspirations had introduced it.

There is one apparent grievance attaching to our moral nature, which all who cultivate that nature with any degree of strictness must in a degree experience. It is connected with the operations of conscience.

DEFLECTIONS AND THEIR CAUSE.—We insert with great pleasure the following from an esteemed correspondent. There are several important points suggested by such a case. The disposition manifested by this doubter was not that of an humble inquirer after truth, seeking instruction of a teacher appointed of God; it "was more like that of a disputant than of an inquirer." This is too commonly the cause of those errors which lead men to "wander and stray like lost sheep." The Pastoral office is not duly regarded, and we cannot wonder that with those who lose sight of the true character of this Divine Institution, the result is they wander "as sheep having no shepherd," and leave the "one Fold" to roam at will, amid the pathless deserts of heresy and schism. How common is it for those, who should come to the "Minister of God's word" only to receive "godly counsel and advice," to come rather to argue a case which their own minds, guided only by their own knowledge and wisdom, have already settled. What would be thought of the practical wisdom which treated a Physician or a Lawyer in this way? And even taking the lowest view of the clerical office, as a Profession, the "counsel and advice" of a rightly educated clergyman are entitled to similar regard on matters connected with his peculiar profession, as those of either of the other learned professions. But those who would not trust their lives or properties to the decision of their own ignorance, are over ready to commit their spiritual interests to the determinations of their own judgments, when they must be conscious how limited are the views which their own scanty knowledge permits them to take of the great subjects at issue.

Again, what our correspondent says about the sin and danger of quitting the Church is worthy of serious consideration. This sin and danger are too little felt and realized by the members of "the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church." There has arisen among us the vain notion that it is not a part of "Evangelical" teaching to impress upon the hearts of our people a high regard for "the Church of the Living God." It is objected to this or that minister "he is forever preaching the Church!" And sorry we are to think that this prevailing indisposition to hear, has too often led to a withholding of full and faithful instruction upon this important part of "the whole counsel of God." And what has been the result? Our able correspondent informs us. Those who feel not the importance of being members of that Church wherein alone they are "members of Christ," at the smallest temptation, are led into heresy or schism. On the other hand those who do feel the importance of the Church, are lured by the promises and professions of that corrupt Body who, amid all their corruptions of the Faith whereof the Church is "the witness and keeper," still assert for themselves the highest esteem for the "Catholic Church," vainly pretending that they alone are its true members.

We regard the few defections which have occurred from the Church to the extremes on either side, as the result of ignorance or disregard of the true nature and constitution of that Body which is "One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic."

Again thanking our Reverend Correspondent for his interesting and instructive communication, we ask for it the regard of our Readers.

REVEREND MR. EDITOR:

I send you the enclosed correspondence. Perhaps you may think it proper for insertion in the Banner of the Cross. If so, it is at your service. It may do some good.

Your friend and brother,
Philadelphia, Feb. 22, 1848.

No. I.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 8, 1848.

REV. SIR: In conformity with your request, I will briefly state the object of my requested interview, viz: I BELIEVE I have not been "buried with Christ by baptism." I have not received scriptural baptism; but I have been sprinkled after man's ordinance. This will therefore inform you of my determination, through the grace of God, to follow the command of Christ.

Should it be customary with you to give certificates or letters of dismission to your members under similar circumstances, and when applied for, you will then please to receive this as such, and would confer a great favour by a compliance as soon as possibly convenient. Believe me sincerely yours, &c.

Rev. Dr. Ducachel

No. II.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 9, 1848, Wednesday.

DEAR SIR: I am grieved by the intelligence conveyed to me in your note of yesterday, received last night. When you spoke to me respecting your doubts of the scriptural sufficiency of your baptism, I supposed that it was a loose notion which you had hastily taken up from some sectarian books you had been reading; and I hoped that further inquiry would satisfy you on the subject. At the same time, I must not disguise that I had some fears,—caused partly by the disposition you manifested in your interviews with me. (a disposition that seemed to me more like that of a disputant than that of an inquirer,) and partly by your not acquiescing in the proposal I made to you, to put into your hands some standard works which, I thought, would place the matter before you in a proper light. But now, it seems, you have determined, (upon what, certainly, can be only a very slight and inadequate examination of a much disputed question,) to forsake the communion of the Church, and to join yourself to a sect,—and a sect that holds the most extreme Calvinistic views. So that the change you propose involves not only the question of baptism, but most important questions of doctrine, and the vital point of Orders! How far you were prepared to investigate the point, with no knowledge of biblical criticism, no acquaintance with the Greek or Hebrew language, no information on ecclesiastical history, and no theological attainments, (as you have never studied any branch of Divinity,) I shall express no opinion, but leave yourself to judge. I warn you, my young friend, that you are venturing upon a most perilous and sinful step. To separate from the Church's communion, you know, is schism; and that is a fearful sin. To repeat baptism is sacrilege. To join a sect is to put yourself where you will have no priesthood, no sacraments, no covenant—title to any gospel privilege or promise. And then, you are to take down the monstrous dogmas of the Calvinistic theology—a scheme which, I must think, is about the worst libel upon the gospel that the christian world presents, except the horrid figments of popery itself. If you are resolved, however, upon the dangerous and guilty measure, I have nothing more to say, except to remind you that I have reasoned with you about it;—that I have offered to put you in the way of understanding the subject better, but that you have not accepted the offer;—and to warn you that you are doing wrong.

If you are influenced at all to unite yourself to the "Baptists," because you have not been found competent to be received as a candidate for orders among us, you will recollect that every arrangement was made to give you a suitable education to fit you to be received in due time, but that you did not avail yourself of the enviable advantages which were offered you. And you will bear in mind, that you have turned about several times, first being a Protestant, (I believe a Methodist,)—then a Papist;—then, when the Papists refused to admit you to orders, becoming a Churchman; and, now, (when we have declined your application, and after remaining among us less than three months, and communing with us, I think, but once, or at most twice,) turning Anabaptist. If, as you think, you have been three times mistaken, it would be well to remember that you may be mistaken once more! This ought to make any man exceedingly cautious, and distrustful of himself in his changes. I have not a word to say, by way of reproach: I have no heart to do any thing like that. I would gladly dissuade you, if I could, from doing what, I think, is so much to be deplored on your own account; but I desire to do no more.

As to the certificate for which you ask, I have to say, that it is not "customary" with us to "grant certificates or letters of dismission to members, under similar circumstances." And, surely, it cannot be expected that I should dismiss, as in good and unexceptionable standing, any one who, in the very act of asking for such dismission, declares his intention to commit so grievous a sin as schism. That act, of itself, subjects a member of the Church to discipline; and to facilitate, or connive at, its commission would justly expose me to the same. You must pardon me, therefore, for not complying with your request.

Until I receive intelligence that you have separated from the communion of the Church, and disconnected yourself from my parish, I must still subscribe myself

Your pastor,

To Mr. _____

P. S. You speak of having been "sprinkled." As I understood you to tell me, you received the form of baptism, in early life, among the Methodists—perhaps from your own grandfather, who was a Methodist preacher. I do not know whether they perform the rite by sprinkling or not; but I am very sure that their baptismal office recognises no such mode. Afterwards, in adult age, you were baptized hypothetically by a priest of the Church of Rome. In that communion, sprinkling is never used. So, I presume, you have been regularly and sufficiently baptized by affusion—a much more scriptural, apostolic, and primitive mode than submersion. Immersion is quite another thing from plunging under, as I have tried to show you. St. Paul, I pointed out to you, was baptized standing; for we read, (Acts ix, 18,) ἀνστὰς ἐβάπτισεν. And, in verse 16, of chapter 22, he is told to "arise and be baptized;" in the Greek, ἀνστὰς βάπτισαι, i. e. "standing up, be baptized." He could, therefore, have been neither submerged nor immersed. However, I do not think the mere mode of much consequence. The mode is a mere circumstance. But the AUTHORITY of the administrator is of the ESSENCE of the sacrament. What "Baptist" preacher will you find having divine authority and commission to perform any ministerial function?

If you are still open to argument, I am ready and willing to converse with you on the subject, whenever you may desire that I should do so. But, I should be reluctant to meet you, under the circumstances, as a disputant.

"WHO ARE THE DENOUNCERS?"—This is the question with which "the Pittsburgh Catholic" heads an article of four columns, wherein this journal departs from "its ordinary tone" and assails the Banner of the Cross, in no measured terms, for daring to copy from the Foreign Journals and the debates in the British Parliament intelligence, which it was our painful duty to give, regarding the denunciations of Irish landlords, by the priests, and the consequent assassination of those who were thus denounced.

We are sorry that our mild rebuke of the profane jest of "the Pittsburgh Catholic" upon the cross of Christ, has so turned this editor against all "pleasantry." But we would ask the courteous editor if he has dealt honestly, not to say courteously, in misrepresenting the editor of this paper, as connecting an assertion of a fondness for pleasantry with misery and bloodshed and crime? What are the facts? The Pittsburgh Catholic saw fit in its own language "to perpetrate a bad pun" upon the name of this paper—viz. "the Banner of the Cross, is realizing its name and becoming cross enough." To which we replied (see Banner Feb. 5th.) that "notwithstanding our imputed crossness, those who know the editor of this paper will own that he is as fond of pleasantry as most persons, yet he cannot enjoy wit, especially if it is poor, when exercised at the expense of sacred things, and against the most solemn emblem of our holy faith." Now this editor who himself first associated an attempt at "pleasantry" with that name which only reminds us of a Saviour's agony, and also with human crime and misery, turns round and falsely implies, throughout a long article, that we had asserted a fondness for pleasantry in connection with the miseries referred to!

We refer to this for no mere personal ends, but to show how little dependence can be placed upon the fairness or veracity of one who would thus unfairly and falsely misrepresent an article, which he knows his readers will never see, in order to make out a case of "sectarian" inhumanity! "Ex uno disce," &c.

With the most careful consideration and with a grave and serious practical object we transferred these extracts from Foreign Intelligence to our columns. They have been characterized as "vile slanders," and "the Banner of the Cross," "or Lords Farnham & Co.," "the Times newspaper," "The Anti-Catholic press in Great Britain" are declared to be real "DENOUNCERS" while "the Priests" are the victims! This is the way "the Pittsburgh Catholic" settles the question, "who are the denouncers," and this is certainly turning the tables with a vengeance!

The following appeal is made to us. "Mr. Editor of the Banner of the Cross examine your conscience, and answer before God, are you guilty? Is it no sin to bear false witness against your neighbour? If through ignorance you have published 'a vile slander,' do not the laws of God, not only in charity but in justice, oblige you to retract and repair the evil?" Certainly they do—IF! Prove to us Mr. Editor of "the Pittsburgh Catholic" our "guilt," prove that we have borne "false witness," prove that we have published "a vile slander" and without hesitation we will "retract and repair the evil," yes and take shame to ourselves for the injustice we had done to your "innocent" "Priests!"

But you have miserably failed, Mr. Editor, to prove in what you have said, the serious charges you have made against us, and you have thus made these charges to recoil upon yourself. All that you attempt to prove is, that one case of alleged "denunciation from the altar" is false. This you strive to do on the testimony, first of the Roman Catholic Bishop, who thus speaks in reference to major Mahon's murder.

"I visited Strokestown subsequent to the murder, and could never obtain the slightest information that could implicate the Rev. Father McDermott in the crimes imputed to him. The result of my inquiries and investigations has been, that he has not on Sunday, Monday, festival or holiday, nor at any time, nor in any place, directly or indirectly, denounced Major Mahon, or encouraged any species of harm or injury to him. Why, then, should I hold any investigation upon an innocent and inoffending Priest?"

When we consider how little prone these poor people are to become informers, knowing the danger of such a reputation, and most of all how utterly vain would be the attempt to gain any information against their Priests, when they knew it would do him harm, we are not absolutely convinced by the Bishop's statement that, on his official visit, whose object was known, he "could never obtain the slightest information that could implicate the Rev. Father McDermott in the crimes imputed to him." This is the less remarkable when we consider how active and earnest Roman Catholic Bishops are apt to be in obtaining information which would expose their priests and system to public examination!

But the editor had a suspicion that this testimony might not quite satisfy us of our villainy in publishing "slanders" and bearing false witness, so he adds—

As a person very fond of pleasantry may pass off the above testimony as a joke, we shall even at the expense of being tedious, corroborate it by an extract (the whole being of the same bearing) from a public document signed by a number of the inhabitants of the town and vicinity of Strokestown.

"We further unhesitatingly declare that we never heard the very Rev. Mr. M'Dermott, on Sunday or holiday, or Saint's day, or any other day, on which he ever addressed his flock from the altar, to denounce the late Major Mahon, or to express the words attributed to him in the reported speech of Lord Arundel ('Major Mahon is worse than Cromwell and yet he lives,') or any such words of a similar import or meaning.

Luke Carles, grocer, &c.; Nicholas Feby, dealer; Francis Kenny, rope dealer and manufacturer; Thomas Casserly, lumber and slater; John Smyth, farmer; Patrick M'Greeny, farmer; James Cruise, private gentleman, &c."

We must confess that this testimonial had nearly produced a paroxysm of "pleasantry" were it not for the solemnity of the subject and the gravity of our opponent. "The very Rev. Mr. M'Dermott" could never have denounced "the late major Mahon!" The case is proved! One "grocer," one "dealer," one "rope dealer and manufacturer," one "plumber and slater," two "farmers," and one "private gentleman &c." (last but not least) "never heard" him do so! When we remember that seven persons are usually a small portion of the population in an Irish Roman Catholic Parish, we may well conclude that if it was impossible to get "the slightest information" against "the Rev. Mr. Mc. Dermott," it was no easy matter to get very slight positive information in his favor. The above is the only attempted proof on which "the Pittsburgh Catholic" rests its serious charges against the publications in the Banner. On the other side to show that we may answer with safe "conscience" "before God," NOT GUILTY of these charges, we give the following proofs from ROMAN CATHOLIC authorities.

1st. The (Roman) Archbishop of Tuam. Dr. Mac Hale Dr. Mac Hale has addressed another furious letter on altar-nunciations to Lord John Russell. The following is his apology for them:—

But whilst we deplore and stigmatise murder, as drawing down the vengeance of Heaven on all who counsel or encourage such a dreadful crime, we can have no sympathy with that hypocritical sentimentality which affects such horror at the loss of life of a few individuals, and can view the silent laughter of thousands without a particle of commiseration." and to Lord Arundel this Prelate thus writes:

"True, the Catholic pastor cannot subject the violators of justice or humanity not belonging to the Catholic church to its rigorous penances and satisfactions, but that does not preclude its right of denouncing aggressions on the rights of justice and humanity belonging to his flock from any quarter. Such was the feeling, such, too, the practice of the ancient fathers, who denounced the cruelties and persecutions of pagans and heretics against their flocks without thinking they were guilty of any inroad on the rights of others."

2dly. A Roman Catholic Nobleman of high position who would not be likely wantonly to defame the Priests of his own communion.

The Earl of Shrewsbury has followed the example of Lord Arundel in addressing the fierce John of Tuam. His Lordship, it appears, first applied to the R. C. Bishop of Elphin to reprimand the Priest M'Dermott, for the denunciation of Major Mahon, whose denial he looks upon, as it at present stands, only in the light of a prevarication. Bishop Browne returns no answer, so the Earl addresses himself to his Primate, Dr. MacHale, urging in eloquent terms, the Roman Catholic Bishops to put a stop to these denunciations by such examples as the reprimanding of Archdeacon Laffan and the suspension of Father M'Dermott. Lord Shrewsbury carries the attack home. He says,—

"Like Lord Arundel and Surrey, I feel too keenly the reproaches cast upon the religion which I profess in England, through the excesses of some who profess Catholicity in Ireland, and not to endeavour to show that such are neither the natural nor usual results of the teaching of the ancient and universal Church; and which I fear your Grace's answer to Lord Arundel and Surrey will by no means establish for want of sufficient explanation and detail. It is for this reason, my lord, that it would appear as necessary to address you now as if that letter had not been written."

The noble Earl continues:—
"And thus in sadness do I approach another and still more afflictive portion of your Grace's letter. Would there had been to crimes but those 'deeds of retaliation' which you so deplore and execrate! No murder, no assassination, no robbery, no pillage, no injustice, no cruelty, 'no foul atrocities to disgrace the country,' but those stimulated by the cruel and heart-rending evictions of the poor! My lord, if we trusted only to your description for a faithful record of the crimes of the people, of all these we should gather nothing but the pleasing delusion that they had no existence. But how is the fact? Why, my lord, in the very same journal in which I find your Grace's letter, no less than twelve foul, unnatural murders, or attempts to murder, are narrated with all their hideous details, from the Irish papers, in the daily sanguinary column devoted to 'the state' of your unhappy country, without one of them being able to claim the extenuating excuse of being stimulated by the cruel process of eviction. No! they are all—one and all—so many dramas in that demon-tragedy now performing with such unparalleled atrocity in the disturbed districts of Ireland, under the multifarious and mystic characters of Molly Maguireism, Terry Altism, Whitefeetism, Whiteboyism, Ribbonism, and so forth—all members of one great conspiracy against property—that they who have no land shall have it—that they who occupy the land of others shall henceforth hold it for themselves alone."

"What part in crime, either violent and exciting speeches from the clergy, or denunciations from the altar, may have borne, yet remains to be proved. But you are told, my lord, that men were denounced from the sanctuary in the morning, and as a consequence murdered in the evening—men, too, who were not of their flock, and over whose delinquencies they had no jurisdiction; and, my lord, your answer is, 'St. Gregory recommends the treatment, and the ancient fathers denounced the persecutors of the early Christians.' But unless you can show that the men denounced by the early fathers were thereupon shot like the beasts of the forests, you are arguing wide of the point, for that is the accusation brought against certain clergy in Ireland, and to which it would be worse than futile to reply by sheltering the accused under an irrelevant appeal to the great St. Gregory and the ancient fathers! My lord, we pray for some better answer than this: or do not risk your passing before the world as a mystifier and a sophist? If the denunciations be all a fiction, deny them by some less equivocal phrase than that they are not the practice; if ever they be made, whether followed by the fatal results attributed to them or not, from this moment forbid them for the future, if it were only to acquit a dignitary of the Church of the imputation before the public, which with one voice calls for their suppression, and which will accept neither apology nor explanation for their continuance. Claim not 'the right of denouncing aggressions against justice and humanity from any quarter;' it is investing the priest with a judicial power which he is unfitted to exercise with impartiality; it is a right too easy to abuse, too dangerous to enforce.

My lord, the illustration is at hand. Father M'Dermott charged Major Mahon with acts of injustice and cruelty to his people; the Major rebutted the accusation, and solicited Father M'Dermott to meet him and receive his explanation; Father M'Dermott rejected the proposition with scorn, for he had already condemned him on his own ex parte evidence, and upon that alone had carried the sentence of denunciation into effect against him. My lord, this took place during the latter days of August and early in September last."

3dly. Our third proof that we have not borne false witness in this case is from the testimony of a Roman Catholic newspaper of high authority.

The following is from "the Tablet," as quoted by the "United States Catholic Miscellany."

There can be little doubt that covetous, griping, murderous, and exterminating landlords have received from the priests of God public rebuke and censure. But this public rebuke to criminals of their order is by no means without precedent in the history of the world; and all that is strange in the matter is the fact that the denouncers of guilt are belaboured with the abuse due to criminals, instead of being rewarded with admiration and eulogy as performers of a very dangerous but very necessary service.

Public denunciation of great criminals is not a new practice but an old; and in its antiquity encircled with all sorts of reverence. Protestant reader, did you ever turn over the pages of a little volume lettered on the back "Common Prayer?" Did you ever chance to read in it a couple of leaves that stand between the "Churching of Women" and the Psalter? It is called the "Commination Service;" and it proclaims aloud—or professes to do so—every Lent in the face of the congregation, God's judgments against public crime.

"Cursed is he that removeth his neighbour's landmark."
"And the people shall answer and say—'Amen.'"
"Cursed is he that maketh the blind go out of his way."
"Amen."

"Cursed is he that taketh reward to slay the innocent."
"Amen."
"Cursed are the unmerciful, covetous persons, slanderers, extortioners."
"Amen."

It is indeed most certain that no particular class of society is here expressly designated. Neither Moses nor the Book of Common Prayer expressly say—

"Cursed are the Irish landlords."
"Amen."

We need not here stop to show the difference between the general denunciations of wickedness, in the words of Scripture, taken from "the Communion Service," which leaves the guilty to Him who says, "vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord"—and those denunciations which point out individuals as fit objects of human wrath, as for example—

Cursed is Mr. A.
And the people shall answer,—We'll shoot him!

The above, we think, are sufficient proofs to clear us from the guilt imputed. We are sorry that we have been compelled to occupy so much space with this matter, but though we might have submitted in silence to the imputation of an over fondness for pleasantry, we could not so quietly bear the accusation of publishing "vile slanders," and "bearing false witness against our neighbours."

Foreign Intelligence.

DR. HAMPDEN'S case is still the leading topic. The following is part of the editorial of the English Churchman, Jan 20th.

THREE—and each in its way—remarkable circumstances are to be added to the great Hampden case. They are (1) the rule nisi granted in the Queen's Bench, on the application of Sir Fitzroy Kelly, for a mandamus, addressed to the Vicar-General of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to compel the Court of Arches to admit the appearance of the objectors who were rejected at the Confirmation at Bow Church; (2) Dr. Hampden's letter to Mr. Falkner; (3) Dr. Whately's published sentiments on the case. We will advert to them serialim.

The application to the Queen's Bench is at present only ex parte: cause has to be shewn by the Crown lawyers against it, and the objectors will have to reply before the Court gives judgment, either by making the rule absolute, or discharging it finally. Not only does this very important step give additional interest to the case, but it has now soared from the region of partizanship. What was so painfully displayed in the unjudicial petulance and eager disputatious spirit which the flushed countenance and fervid gestures of Dr. Lushington, and the stolid obstinacy of Sir John Dodson, displayed at Bow Church, will be superseded by the dignity of law in its highest and most solemn sphere of judgment. The case will at least be argued fully, and judged fairly and dispassionately. It is much that we shall know the law. The statute of Henry VIII. will either be proved to be more "foul," and will be shewn more completely as the "Magna Charta of tyranny," than has yet been supposed, or it will be vindicated as a simple enactment, and practical embodiment of a single fact—viz., the transference partly to the Crown and partly to the Metropolitan of certain active rights, i. e., of an actual nomination, and of a true confirmation—involving judicial enquiry—which had come into the sole and usurped jurisdiction of the See of Rome. Under either view, whatever comes of the application for the mandamus, very much will have been gained. If the statute shall be judged to be what the Ecclesiastical lawyers consider it, its days are numbered: shams and mockeries, and legal fictions such as these, must fall before the common sense of the age, even if in their crash they pull down the venerable absurdities of leases for a year, and Que dem. Puggs v. Hipkins, or any other time-honoured or time-despised folly.

Again, on the other hand, if it be shewn that at every Confirmation objections may be urged, and must be heard, in open Court, then after all, the statute is no such bad thing. Anyhow, an enormous step has been taken towards securing freedom in the action of the Church. The Church and State henceforth establish a more intelligible relation. For ourselves we do not think—as everybody says—that from Friday last commenced the separation of Church and State. We do not think so because the phrase—separation of Church and State—is an expression of very little meaning. The connexion of Church and State is not a single fact, and cannot be undone by a single act. Strictly speaking, while either exists, such separation can never be final or complete. It can therefore have no beginning, because it can have no end while Christianity itself remains. But the Regale and Pontificate will be understood, and will understand each other. This is the value of the legal consideration of the question.

Of Sir Fitzroy Kelly's speech we cannot speak too highly. Its calm unimpassioned character was its chief excellence; it was the impersonation of pure reason. It carried on the auditors by the stress and sway of mere power. It was clear and cold as chrysal. It addressed only the judgment; the high legal mind—the measured dignified enunciation,

"The intuitive decision of a bright And thorough-edged intellect,
—an accent very low
In blandishment, but a most silver flow
Of subtle-paced counsel Winning its way with extreme gentleness," made a whole, of which an English Court of Justice might well be proud. The case was well got up, and admirably argued; and when we state that the leader's fee was not, as the newspapers stated, three hundred guineas, but exactly a tithe of that sum, our readers will feel good reason to be satisfied both with the propriety and—thus far—the success which has attended the application to the Queen's Bench. We understand that the rule is returnable on Friday, and that cause will be shown on Saturday, by the Attorney-General.

The following letter has been addressed by Dr. Hampden to the Rev. R. R. Faulkner. Like many other letters, its pith is found in the P. S.

"CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD, Jan. 7, 1848.

"Dear Sir,—Your warm expression of congratulation on my promotion to the See of Hereford demands my sincere thanks; the sympathy of one who has himself stood his ground so firmly against a violent Tractarian assault is most welcome to me. You did essential service by your resistance to that outrageous attempt of the Camden Society to intrude on your rights in your parish, and overbear your Christian conscientiousness. I am much obliged to you for the report you have sent me of the proceedings in that case. I shall have much satisfaction in going through it when I have leisure from the engagements which press on me at this moment.

"I have had abundant matter of vexatious doings the last few weeks. But I feel more than compensated from any personal annoyance by the good which I am sure will come out of the present disturbance. The strength and designs of the Tractarian party (the real movers throughout, whatever may be said to the contrary,) will have been disclosed, and the necessity of rallying the true Protestant spirit of our Church will have been fully demonstrated.

"I am deeply thankful to a good Providence for the course which events have taken.

"I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

"R. D. HEREFORD (Elect). Dr. Hampden

"P. S. The Bishop of Oxford would insinuate in his letter in the Times, that I have made concessions to him. I shall be obliged to you most positively to contradict any such statement should you hear it alleged—it is not true.

"The Rev. R. R. Faulkner."

Last of all. The Archbishop of Dublin has come out with a long letter, vindicating Dr. Hampden, Lord John Russell, Notices.

A number of Ladies intend holding a Sale during the Easter Holy-days, to aid in finishing the Church of the Redemption, at Fairmount.

As this Church is situated in the midst of a very spiritually destitute neighbourhood, all the friends of true religion are earnestly urged to exert themselves in forwarding this enterprise; that through the blessing of God, it may be effectual to the object for which it is undertaken.

Please send your donations to Mrs. Ducachet, 8 Girard street, Mrs. Hawkins, 35 Clinton street. Feb. 26—1f

THE FLOATING CHURCH.

Ladies interested in the erection of the proposed Floating Church, and desirous also of aiding the suffering poor among the families of seamen, are respectfully informed that two thirds of the profits on any articles sent to the approaching Fair, (to be held in the Chinese Museum on the 29th instant,) that are especially designated for the Floating Church, will be devoted to that object. The remaining third to be given to relieve the temporal necessities of those towards whose spiritual improvement the efforts of Churchmen are now directed. It is hoped that many of our communion, whose aid would have been given to the general objects of the Fair, will prefer sending it in the channel now proposed. While many who would not otherwise have contributed at all, will now doubtless exert themselves to promote an object so interesting to every Episcopalian.

Articles designated as above, can be sent to Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, No. 293 Chestnut street, or to No. 152 S. Third street, before the 29th instant. Feb. 19—2c

BEZA'S LATIN TESTAMENT,

FOR SCHOOL AND COLLEGE USE.

GEORGE S. APPLETON, 148 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, has now ready Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Jesu Christi. Interprete Theodoro Beza.

This new edition of the world renowned translation of Beza, is beautifully and very accurately printed from stereotype plates cast in England, supervised and corrected by a highly competent scholar.

Of the work, itself, it is hardly necessary to speak. Its publication was suggested by the favor with which the authors lectures on the Epistles were received at the Academy of Lausanne. The translation thus heralded, was received with a favor which, with Protestant Christians, it has never lost. Several editions were published during the lifetime of Beza, to which he made such improvements as his attention was directed to, or as were prompted by his familiarity, as Greek Professor, with the original. Since 1556, when it first appeared, at Geneva, this work has kept its place in the general esteem; while more recent versions have been so strongly tinged with the peculiarities of the translators as to make them acceptable to particular classes only.

To facilitate its introduction into schools and colleges, it is published at a low price, and furnished to teachers and the trade at a liberal discount. Teachers will be supplied with a copy of the work for examination gratis, on application, post-paid.

The trade, to whom it will be furnished on the usual account, are requested to forward their orders. Feb. 12—3t

The Blind Slave in the Mines; the Roll Call; Patient Suffering; a Tract upon the Lord's Supper; also, 4 Tracts for boys, viz: The Reward of Disobedience, Truth and Honesty, Tom White, the Post Boy, and a Conversation upon the character of the Prophet Daniel, by Rev. Mr. Russell and his Scholars; the last written expressly for American Boys. Those who wish to improve the rising generation, and to curb the riotous and licentious spirit of the youths who infest our streets, especially on the Sabbath Day, might effect some good by purchasing a supply of these tracts, and distributing them, with affectionate exhortations, among these neglected idlers, who are pleased to receive them, and generally listen with respect to the conversations of those who appear to take an interest in their welfare.

They can be procured at the cheap Bookstore of Mr. Simons, at the corner of Fifth and Spruce streets, where purchasers can obtain very valuable books, at a reduced price; and also a variety of useful articles. All the publications of the E. F. Tract Society, which are in print, can be procured there. Tracts are so very cheap, that there are few persons who cannot afford to do good by purchasing a few to distribute. There have been such numerous demands upon their Depository during the past year, that their gratuitous distribution must necessarily be limited, until they can procure the requisite funds to replenish their stock, by donations, and by their sales. "We Give Thanks to Thee for Thy Great Glory."

(COMMUNION SERVICE.)

The Sunbeams write Thy glory in the sky
In red and gold;
And every ray the dew-drops multiply
A thousand-fold.

The stars hang up their shining lamps above
To show Thy Name;
And trace on Heaven's blue tablet words of love
In deathless flame.

The winds have bid it echo every where O'er land and seas,
In the wild tempest's howl, the sultry air,
And evening breeze.

The sea-birds hear its deep and solemn tone
On Ocean's waves,
Where Nature's pious hands have rear'd her own Cathedral caves.

With morning's earliest blush the lark is heard
Her hymn to raise;
And e'en the chilly night hath one lone bird
To chant Thy praise.

But we have higher themes:—the Cross, the Grave,
Shall swell our songs:
The love that stoop'd to death and died to save
To us belongs.

The full-toned voice of Nature speaks Thy great Creative powers;
But mercy that could reach man's ruin'd state
Is only our's.

Oh bliss! that love and peace thus closely can Together meet,
In perfect pledge that nought Redemption's plan Shall e'er defeat.

With Nature then we join, and still rejoice
In hymns of peace,
Which in accord with her true constant voice
Shall never cease.

Martin Luther.

Luther had now found the solution of his difficulty, and was satisfied. He had encountered a tormenting puzzle, and had now the answer. How could man fulfil the law, was the puzzle; By simple imputation, was the answer. The whole difficulties attending the adherence of evil to our nature, were now explained to Luther. The mystery of Conscience was solved. He had got his εἴρηνα. He dwelt upon it, now that he had got it, with deep and untiring relish; he handled it, and embraced it with perpetual mental fondness. He felt like a person possessed of a great secret, for which the whole world had been struggling from its creation, and never yet attained. He felt as Newton might feel when he had discovered the principle of gravitation; or as Harvey might feel when he had discovered the circulation of the blood; or as one of the elder ages might have felt had he discovered the elixir vitae, or the principle of alchemical transmutation. He felt as one of those great philosophers of the ancient world might have felt when discovered some great moral principle which explained the phenomena of human life, and disclosed the secret of human happiness, like Pythagoras, when he discovered Number; or when, when he discovered Fate; or Epicurus, when he discovered Chance. Every one who has found out a riddle, or solved a Chinese puzzle together, or solved a problem in geometry, knows the peculiar satisfaction which attends the climax solution,—a satisfaction which is, of course, deeper in proportion to the depth and interest of the difficulty. Luther looked back with the feeling of a traveller at rest upon his past struggles and searchings. "Can you tell me how to fulfil the law?" was the question he asked now, as if the difficulty itself were pleasing, because he felt in possession of the key to it. That is that impossible thing called righteousness which has tortured the human mind from the foundation of the world? Sure that circle if you can; Find that πρόσθε. He saw the whole world wandering in a maze on this subject.

Errare atque viam palantes querere vitam.

Wandering round and round, and pursuing their own footsteps; going in a circle, and endeavouring to escape from sin by working righteousness, which, when worked, only made them greater sinners than before. He saw a fatal error, affecting the very foundation of the Christian system, in undisturbed hereditary possession of the whole Christian world; and he saw in himself the person destined to subvert it.

There has been no Indulgence fair at Wittenberg, then, as yet, and no Tetzel, and yet Luther has started. As distinguished from being a mere practical Reformer, in the first instance, led on incidentally to doctrine, he was primarily, as we said at the beginning of this article, a doctrinal Reformer, the founder of a new school, the propagator of an idea. He was one of that corps of creative minds who, whether as philosophers or as religionists, Pagan or Christian, have succeeded in permanently impressing their conceptions on large portions of society, and leaving intellectual fraternities behind them. He began with a course of dreaming and speculation. He brooded with keenness and passion upon the great mystery of our moral nature. One particular idea, the boldness of which suited the impatience of his mind, seemed to solve it; and he devoted himself to the promulgation of that idea. A period of four years, commencing with his first entrance into the Augustine Monastery at Erfurt, in 1505, carried on and completed this search and discovery of Luther. In 1509, on the recommendation of Staupitz, the Vicar-General of the Dominican order, upon whom Luther's trials and struggles, and the intellectual and religious energy they exhibited, had made a great impression, Luther received from the Elector of Saxony the appointment of Professor of Philosophy in the University of Wittenberg, accompanied with a most urgent and complimentary letter from that Prince. In a short time, he received from the Senate of Wittenberg the appointment of City Preacher. He regarded the appointment as an important opening for the promulgation of his great dogma, and was besieged with nervous alarm that he should not be able to turn it to the account he ought to do; but his success equalled his fondest hopes. He preached, by turns, in the Monastery, in the Royal Chapel, and in the Collegiate Church. "His voice was fine, sonorous, clear, striking; his gesticulation emphatic and dignified." He departed wholly from the established type of sermon, quoting, instead of the schoolmen, the Bible, especially St. Paul's Epistles. The degree of Bachelor in Theology enabled him to add to these sermons University lectures on the sacred text; and "never, in any Saxon professorial chair, was heard such luminous explanation." He delighted in these lectures, and passed whole nights in preparing for them. "Eminent doctors came to listen, and retired full of admiration. The venerable Pollich, known by the soubriquet of Lux Mundi, heard him, and struck with wonder, exclaimed, "This father hath profound insight, exceeding imagination; he will trouble the doctors before he has done." In addition to his Academical posts, he was, by the appointment of his patron, Staupitz, made visitor of the monasteries in that province. In a letter to a friend, he writes, "I had need of two secretaries to keep up my correspondence; pity my unhappy fortune. I am conventual concionator, table-preacher, director of studies; I am vicar, or, in words, eleven priors in one; conservator of the ponds of Litzkau, pleader and assessor at Torgau, Pauline reader, and collector of psalms; add to all these, the assaults of the world, the flesh, and the devil." His reputation extended, and he preached in the castle at Dresden before Duke George. In 1516, he commenced the publication of a series of theses, which, under the cover of the disputative system of the day, attacked the established doctrines on the point of justification, and put forth those views of the exclusive necessity of faith, the inefficacy of works, and the slavery of the will, which it was the aim of all his future theological labours to establish. Five papers, φωκάρτα συνετοίων, containing respectively, twelve, ninety-five, fifty, forty, and a hundred propositions, alarmed the old, and awakened the new intellect in the Church.

But the time now approached when Luther was to add the department of practical to that of doctrinal Reformer, and, taking his dogma along with him, to prepare the ground for its reception by an attack on a whole existing practical system. It is obvious that the teacher of a new doctrine cannot do his work extensively and zealously without becoming a practical man to do so. He is bound to attack what stands in his way, and occupies the ground, and he thus necessarily finds himself at war with a whole mass of existing interests and machinery; the doctrinal line necessarily leads into the practical. Such a practical line was, moreover, not at all uncongenial to Luther's character, even that internal and speculative part of it which is the only one we have as yet had before us. We have seen him a sort of dreamer, indeed, and a visionary; intent upon the difficulties of the spiritual and metaphysical world, and struggling with the great mystery of evil; but it is this visionary and internal line of thought which often produces the most portentous energy in action. Thus, the general alliance which has been observed between infidelity and radicalism, though the one is theoretic, the other practical. The French Revolution itself, with all its tremendous exhibition of practical power, issued out of a philosophy which seemed concerned only with the abstract universe, and to be discontented with the constitution of things. As we examine deeper, we discern the most intense passion involved in such speculation. The sensitive and keen temper moves in the department of philosophy, as if it were a dramatic sphere—perceives apparent defect and injustice in the system of the world—is angry, as if it had received a visible wrong and affront—and rushes into atheism out of revenge. And the same temper is, for the same reason, furious with respect to the abuses and grievances of the social and practical world. Luther's reveries upon the workings of the moral law, and the obstinacy of the evil principle in nature, how it pursued us, and found us out even in our best acts, fastened on us, and refused to be shaken off; accused, condemned, and humiliated us; that passionate and queremonious temper which felt the temptation to rebel against the system of things, on account of evil in the abstract, indicated just a mind most ready to break out, when the opportunity arrived, against the evils of the practical and concrete world, the abuses and grievances, the frauds and cheats, the pride of the great, and the insolence of the strong, which the established system of the day displayed.

If there ever was an age in which the external and working system of the Church was calculated to provoke and excite such a mind to action, it was the age in which Luther lived. It exhibited that peculiar mixture, so poignantly irritating to a keen temper, of the grossest abuses with the most placid and easy self-complacency in those who maintained, and were responsible for them. The Court of Rome allowed the lowest fraud and imposture in the working system of the Church, and suffered faith and reason to be shocked, itself all the while reposing in a superciliously intellectual, and even rationalizing philosophy. There is something in the honest belief in a system, however erroneous itself, which tends to soften and disarm a complainer; but it was rather too much for the Court of Rome to expect of a class of sensitive intellects, which were then rising up in the Church, that they were calmly to embrace all the lies of her practical system, while she herself did not believe them, and was laughing in her sleeve. There was impatience and self-will, doubtless, in the spirit in which the Continental Reformers raised and carried on their opposition; but Rome itself had certainly no right to complain of it. If they were guilty, she was not innocent, nor has she any right on the field of controversy, to assume that position which she does, of having been sinned against without having sinned. The human mind was entering, then, on a new and mysterious stage of its history; and that great intellectual movement which has been steadily advancing ever since, and trying the world's faith in its progress, had begun. Rome herself partook largely of that revival. Did she bear the test well, and set the example so much wanted at the commencement of such a movement, of intellect not really opposing faith? or, dazzled herself, and carried away by the revival, did she set the whole world the very contrary example, of intellect undermining faith? Did she, when she headed that intellectual movement, teach the world how to bear it? We have the answer to the question in the accounts transmitted to us of a Papal Court which seemed, by some inebriation of the intellect, to have dreamed itself out of Christianity into paganism, ignored, by a sort of common consent, the Gospel Revelation, and instituted again the Groves of Academus. An elegant heathen Pope, who carried on Tusculan Disputations; Cardinals who adorned their walls with scenes from Ovid's Metamorphoses, and devoted themselves to Ciceronian Latin; and a whole scene of luxurious intellectuality in Rome, contrasted bitterly with the palpable superstitions and abuses of the out-of-doors world; and the centre of Christendom, putting itself quietly and unconcernedly ab extra to a whole system for which it was responsible, while it taught men to depise that system, provoked at the same time disgust and rebellion against its own hypocrisy. Nor did the intellectual movement of the age show better fruits in the morals than in the faith of the Roman Court. The morals of the Roman ecclesiastics were scandalous, and it was only a question whether their vices themselves, or the shamelessness with which they indulged them, was the worse feature.

We shall not dwell upon a scene with which our readers are already sufficiently familiar, that of the sale of Indulgences in Germany in the year 1517, conducted by the Dominican monk Tetzel. It is enough to say that it signally exhibited the impostures and abuses of that system. Coarse, bold, and brazen,—there is strong reason for adding, immoral,—Tetzel carried out the system with a swing, and, intent solely on performing his office with practical efficiency, hawked his commodity, in the perfect unconsciousness of vulgar zeal, in churches, public streets, taverns, and alehouses, like a spirited man of business. At a cross set up in the market-place, from which the Pope's arms were suspended, the auctioneer extolled the merits of his article, and announced that as soon as ever "the money chinked" in Tetzel's box, sin to that amount was forgiven; the crowd standing about with a mixture of fun and business, as it does in a fair. In the course of his rounds he came to Jüterbock, four miles from Wittenberg. Luther's indignation rose as he surveyed the scene. He waited till the approach of All Saints' day, brought a crowd of pilgrims to Wittenberg, and on the eve of that day fastened on the church doors ninety-five theses against Indulgences,—copies of which, accompanied with letters of remonstrance, he sent to Albert, Archbishop of Magdeburg, and Jerome, Bishop of Brandenburg, within whose jurisdiction the traffic was going on, and to the former of whom half the proceeds of it were farmed.

Luther now stood before the world as a Reformer; and, as such, the authorities of the Roman Church met him with one aim and policy. Some were for mild suppression; others for fierce suppression; but all were for simple suppression. It was a disturbance, and it must be put down. Tetzel himself erected a scaffold in one of the promenades of Frankfort; walked in procession to it with his insignia as inquisitor of the faith; preached a sermon; ordered the heretic to be brought forward for punishment; placed the theses on the scaffold, and burnt them. The view of Prierias, the Pope's Censor, who answered Luther from Rome, was, 'Dogs must be barking. O dear Luther, wert thou to receive from our lord the Pope a good Bishopric, thou wouldst sing smaller, and even preach up the Indulgence, which it is now thy pleasure to vilify.' 'It is high treason,' exclaimed Hochstraten, the Inquisitor of Cologne, 'against the Church to leave such a heretic alive another hour. Erect instantly the scaffold for him!' The general view of those in power, less passionately expressed, was essentially the same. Scultet, Bishop of Brandenburg, a man of mildness and finesse, in a civil answer to Luther's letter, commended his zeal, and admitted that there was occasion for it, but told him to be quiet. Leo himself, ever easy and good-tempered, after once persuading himself to take a serious view of the subject, and descending from his lofty contempt for both sides in the contest, saw no other line but the established and traditional one of mere suppression. Such was the policy; and the policy suggested its own means. Luther must be possessed in person; the man must be got hold of. The Court addressed itself with a mechanical instinct to that one point. Form, gravity, decorum, kindness, were observed in the means; but Italian sagacity was clear as to the end, and knew that the best way to treat with a foe was to secure him first. Luther once in Rome, away from friends, and removed from sympathy and aid; ecclesiastical justice would have a comparatively easy task; and one of two alternatives must follow, either that he should not leave it at all, or leave it a vanquished and tamed man.

But Italian policy, however sagacious and clear, had in Luther a difficult foe to deal with, and Rome was destined to find its match. The only effect which the observation of this aim on the part of Rome had on Luther, was to excite in him, in addition to his original grievance, a deep and inexpressible indignation that it should be met in that way; that the only answer to a witness against wrong should be a move to incarcerate him. 'Was it not a shame that these people set so high a price upon him?' He saw himself regarded as vermin, to be trodden and stamped upon; as something whose proper fate was simple effacement; and the bitterness of a double wrong now invigorated and sharpened him for the contest. There mixed with this indignation no slight disdain at the idea that such a line of proceeding should be supposed at all probable to succeed with him. Awake to those vast energies which were fast rising into life within him, and full of conscious power, he resented, while he despised, the audacity of men who could presume to imagine that he was to be caught by such stratagems. Did they think him a simpleton, or what were they thinking of, to think that a possible thing? A mortal jealousy of Italian subtlety only put him the more on his mettle, and inflamed him. Luther was peculiarly of that temper which has a horror of being taken in, and is haunted by the 'decipi turpe est.' The Italian was by national character and careful cultivation a diplomatist. He had that character, especially in Germany. The German felt himself no match for him, and retaliated by dislike and suspicion. The dread of an Italian was proverbial; an undefinable notion of his unlimited powers of deception pervaded the mass, and one German warned another as he approached. He was advancing now to the contest with his practised penetration, his easy address, his whole art and science of management; and he promised himself an easy victory over the poor simple German. Luther's gall rose at the idea. Would he find it so easy? and would he find him quite so poor simple a German? Why should not a German assume the Italian for once, and establish some small pretension to tact and policy? It seems to have been in connexion with feelings like these that Luther gave himself that carte-blanc for dissimulation which he used throughout all the stages of his struggle with Rome in which dissimulation was wanted. He certainly did meet the Italians here with their own weapon. He stuck at no disguises, no professions of humility, affection, reverence, and modesty, which simple language could supply, whenever his position called for them. Passion indeed is the prominent feature in Luther's character, and it does not appear at first sight as if passion and dissimulation would well go together; but they often do. Dissimulation is, after all, only a tool for accomplishing an object; and passion, which is clear-sighted enough to see this, will make use of that tool as it makes use of others. It will feel a relish in the employment of it, just as it will in the directly martial and openly hostile exercises of its calling, and even exult and triumph in it, in proportion as it is alive to its peculiar efficacy. Indeed, dissimulation will thus become a positive expression of passion; its success affords the most pungent gratification which there is to scorn, and passion specially delights in scorn; the deceiver feels that in deceiving he humiliates and degrades, Luther was as powerful a dissembler as he was an assailant. Formed just on the most formidable model in the whole workshop of character, with a degree of passion which would have driven any ordinary mortal into madness, he combined a perfect mastery and control of it, which converted it into a tool. An easy skill and a strong hand turned it about at pleasure. He did what he liked with it. He rode it as a skilful equestrian rides his high-mettled horse. He played with it as a conjuror plays with his balls, jerking and recalling them at will, and keeping them tossing in the air about him, but still obedient to the centre of attraction in himself. 'I never write so well,' he said, 'as when I am angry.' But the change from superciliousness to deference, from rage to flattery, from hatred to affection, was ready at a moment's notice, and the instrument always gave the proper note at a touch.

With these general lines of policy prepared on both sides, hostilities commenced. The first act was a citation from the Pope to Luther to appear personally, within sixty days, at Rome. The indictments were framed; an ecclesiastical court was appointed to try his case; and the only thing wanted was the presence of the offender. 'I saw,' says Luther, 'the thunderbolt launched against me: I was the sheep that muddled the wolf's water. Tetzel escaped, and I was to let myself be eaten.' Thrown upon himself, and confronted with imminent danger thus immediately in the contest, Luther met the emergency with the utmost coolness and self-possession. There is not a symptom of its ever having entered into his head to obey the citation; whatever happened, he had made up his mind that he would never let himself be dragged to Rome. But the resoluteness of the determination betrayed itself by no word of violence or pride. A letter from the University of Wittenberg, with many expressions of deep reverence for the Holy See, interceded for its professor, who, 'on account of the state of his health, and the dangers attending the journey, was not able to undertake what he would otherwise be most anxious to do;' adding, 'Most holy father, our brother is indeed worthy of credit: and as for his theses against Indulgences, they are merely disputatory. He has merely exercised his right of debating freely, and has asserted nothing.' An arrangement entered into at the same time with the Elector Frederick, that the latter should decline to give Luther a safe passport to Rome, supplied him with a still more efficient and respectable excuse.

The next attempt on the part of the Papal Court was conducted by a Nuncio in person. Cardinal Cajetan was at this time in Germany, returning from an unsuccessful mission on which he had been sent for exciting a war against the Turks. He was commissioned to undertake Luther's case, and received summary instructions 'to get hold of him, keep him safely, and bring him to Rome.*' An honest, vehement man, without the ordinary tact of an Italian envoy, he was accompanied by an attache who in some measure supplied his deficiency, Urban di Serra Longa, an Italian courtier, whose long residence in a diplomatic character in Germany had familiarized him with the national character, and made him a peculiarly fit man for dealing with a German. The Cardinal cited Luther to Augsburg; and Luther went, receiving warnings at every step to be on his guard against the sly Italians. John Kestner of Wittenberg, provisor of the Cordeliers, was full of apprehension for his brother—'Thou wilt find Italians at Augsburg, brother, who are learned folks, subtle antagonists, and will give thee a great deal of trouble. I fear thou wilt not be able to maintain thy cause against them; they will throw thee in the fire, and consume thee in the flames.' Doctor Auerbach, of Leipsic, repeated the note of warning—'The Italians are not to be trusted.' Prebend Adelman, of Leipsic, repeated it after him. There was small need for impressing it upon Luther. Arrived at Augsburg, he was waited on by Serra Longa, who took the line of advising him, as a sensible man, to submit himself to the Cardinal without reserve. 'Come,' he concluded, 'the Cardinal is waiting for you. I will escort you to him myself. Fear nothing; all will be over soon, and without difficulty.' Luther heard him with respect, and expressed himself as perfectly ready to meet the Cardinal; but he wanted one thing before doing so—a safe conduct. 'A safe conduct? Do not think of asking for one; the legate is well disposed, and quite ready to end the affair amicably. If you ask for a safe conduct, you will spoil your business.' The attache's assurance was confirmed by the rest of the Cardinal's suite: 'The Cardinal assures you of his grace and favour;' 'the Cardinal is a father full of compassion.' Luther expressed no distrust in him, but wanted a safe conduct.

The safe conduct came, and Luther presented himself before the Cardinal, secure and humble. Prostrating himself first, he waited for one command to raise him to his knees, and another to raise him to his legs. After a silence, in which the Cardinal expected him to speak, but Luther humbly waited to be addressed, the conference commenced. Cajetan was stern, brief, and summary, and simply demanded retraction. Luther required argument to prove that he was wrong. For several successive interviews the same game went on, and Luther suggested argument, and the Cardinal repelled it. As Luther, however, remained cool, while the Cardinal became angry and heated, the balance of the discussion at last inclined in the former's favour, and he caught the Cardinal in a trap—one sufficiently frivolous, indeed, but according to the technical laws of logic acknowledged in that day, decisive argumentatively. One of Luther's objectionable theses was, that 'the treasure of Indulgences was not composed of the merits and sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ.' The Cardinal asserted this to be flatly contradictory to the extravagante of Pope Clement. Luther challenged him to prove it, and the challenge was caught eagerly. The extravagante was produced and read, till they came to the words 'the Lord Jesus Christ has acquired the treasure by his sufferings.' 'Pause there,' said Luther. 'Most reverend father, be good enough carefully to consider and reflect on that phrase, "He has acquired." Christ has acquired a treasure by his merits; the merits, therefore, are not the treasure; for, to speak with philosophers, the cause is different from the things which flow from it.' Cajetan had committed a mistake in being enticed into an argument, and did not regain his position.

Luther, having puzzled the Cardinal, and done all he had to do; having noticed, too, symptoms of irascibility in his judge, from whom he began to receive first offers and then threats of a safe conduct to Rome, resolved to take his leave; leaving with his friends, first, a note to the Cardinal, explaining that the smallness of his resources did not allow him to protract his stay in Augsburg; and, secondly, an appeal to the Pope, whereby the Cardinal's hands were tied, and any retaliatory sentence to which his offended dignity might incline him, stopped. Before the morning light he mounted a horse, issued out of a small gate in the city, which a town-councillor had directed to be open for him, and left Augsburg at a gallop. His feelings on his return to Wittenberg were those of bitter merriment, not softened by the sight, which he then for the first time had, of the written directions contained in the Pope's brief to the Cardinal. 'The Cardinal would fain have had me in his hands, and sent me to Rome. He is vexed, I warrant, that I have escaped him. He fancied he was master of me in Augsburg; he thought he had me; but he had got the eel by the tail.'

* 'Braccio cogas atque compellas, ut eo in potestate tua redacto eum sub fidelis custodia retineas, ut coram nobis sistatur.'

Philip the Fisherman.

Philip's father, old John Cole, was captain of a nice little vessel, in which he, and six or seven others, went every year, to the herring fishery. When Philip was about fourteen years old, his father took him and his younger brother William from school, that they might go this voyage with him and learn to become fishermen. The boys were happy enough to leave school and become little men at once, and I daresay thought a good deal of themselves. For a week before they set off, old John Cole had a good deal to do to get things ready, and so had the six men, his crew. But it was very curious, that somehow nearly all these poor fellows had a fancy against going on this voyage. They were all of them but one related cousins or nephews of the captain; and used to go about looking quite dull for the last few days; and then they set off. 'It was most beautiful morning in spring when they began their way to a town ten or twelve miles off; where the little vessel lay, and as they went along, all was so bright and fresh that they forgot, or else made light of, their strange fancy, and were good spirits when they embarked. For a whole week the weather was very fine; but at the end of it, it began to change and a fierce wind rose, the night was black, and the sea storm and wild. The captain was down below with his two boys, but as the night was growing worse, and worse, he went on deck, and took the helm in his own hands. John Cole was good seaman, and he saw that it was a bad night; he was used to storms, and guessed this would be a dangerous one. He shouted his orders to his men, and all was done as he bade. The sails were furled, and each man stood ready for any fresh command. All night the storm increased, and in the morning it was worse than ever. Philip and little William, who had stayed below frightened, now came up as well as they could, but their father sent them down again. William obeyed, and hid himself in the cabin; but Philip only went half-way down the ladder, and then he stood watching the men and his father. By and by old John gave the helm to one of his nephews, and came and stood near the hatchway, so that Philip could stretch out his hand, and hold his father's; and when he did so, he felt quite safe,—poor Philip! there he stood, and his hand was held firmly and fondly by his father. The day was growing more and more light, but not more calm; waves were dashing about, and the poor little vessel was tossed and pitched about like a bit of cork. The men had nothing to do, and each stood grasping some rope or mast, and all quite silent. What an awful time it must have been!

Suddenly the voice of the captain was heard above the storm, crying, "Hold fast boys! here's a dreadful sea coming!" and as he said it, a wave swept over the deck, and flung Philip quite senseless to the bottom of the cabin. When he recovered himself and looked about, he remembered how he came there; and starting up, he managed to get on deck.

Poor Philip! He stood there alone—he looked round in a sort of dream—yes, quite alone—not one left! It must have been a dreadful moment. There, then, was he, and little William, and one more, a countryman, who went as a sort of servant and was quite ignorant of sea-matters, left alone in the little ship in the midst of a fierce storm. The first thought was that they too, would soon be swept off; and he sat down in a sort of a careless way to wait for it. But now, strangely enough, the storm seemed to have done all it had to do, and little by little it went down, till, towards evening, it was getting quite calm again; so Philip got up, and taking the helm in his hand, said, "After all, I think we may live to tell the tale;" and then, with streaming eyes, began to steer for the land.

You may suppose it was a hard matter for Philip. He knew little or nothing about steering, and, besides, did not know the way; and was so shocked at what had happened, that he was as if in a dream: but fortunately a breeze sprang up, which soon brought them within sight of land. It was a merciful breeze, and makes one think of Him "who stayeth His rough wind in the day of the east wind." So, after a few hours, the little vessel got to shore, and the poor little boys landed.

They had now to walk all the way to their own village, and a sad walk it was; on the way they met a good-natured man in a cart, who offered to give them a lift. "No, thank you," said Philip, "we would rather walk."

"And why, my lads would you rather walk?" said the kind man.

"Because, sir," replied Philip, "we want to be a long time on the road;" and then, with a burst of tears, he told the man what had happened, adding, that he would fain not be the first to tell it at his home.

The driver went on; and in passing through the village, spread the news which Philip had told him.—I told you that nearly all the people in the village were related to one another, so you must fancy the anguish and grief of this great family, when they heard what happened. There went a cry from house to house, a long sorrowful cry. I think it must have been a little like the cry in Egypt when the first-born were slain.

At last poor Philip and his little brother, both faint and tired, approached the village; but instead of coming into it by the high road, they got into a field opposite the rectory (the same house we lived in afterwards), and managed to get in at the back-door without any one seeing. It was just the right place for them; there they were received with the most tender pity, and after a while went with better heart, poor children, to the home of their most sorrowful mother.

I am not going to tell you much more about this sad event, except of the effect it had upon Philip. He was no longer a thoughtless boy; he grew up full of seriousness; and seemed to have before him the remembrance of the sudden awful death which he had only just escaped. When he was still quite young, he was made captain of such a vessel as his father's; and went to sea just like him. It was about then that he began to grow careless and negligent. When he came home from his voyages, he did not seem eager for church, as he had done before; but did like the bad men of the village, instead of like the good ones. I do not know why this was; but it was a grief of heart to his good rector, who had no longer a hold over him, as he used to have when he was but a lad. Still he often spoke to him when nobody was by (for Philip was very shy of other fishermen seeing the rector talk to him), and advised him to change his bad ways, and lead a good life, and attend his church, and think of his soul. But all without any good. He only grew more hard and careless.

Still you must not think Philip was a wicked man in every sense; he had many good qualities. He was very affectionate to his old mother, and to his wife, whom he married, when he was about twenty-one or two; he had a good deal of what is called self-respect, and always looked clean and respectable. Besides this, he was as brave as a lion; and being a fine-looking young man, and of a free, open, good-tempered disposition, he was much thought of in the village; which made it all the greater pity that he was so irreligious, and used bad language whenever he chose, and spent Sunday as he pleased, and by his example made others think as little of their souls as he did. Very likely he often felt miserable, and would have given all he had to be as he was just after his father was lost; but now it seemed to him, no doubt, almost impossible to change. And it is. Bad ways are almost impossible to change. The right thing is to keep out of bad ways from the first.

I am now, however, going to tell you what happened to Philip Cole a few months after we had come to live in the village, which shows quite wonderfully the goodness of God.

It was on a Sunday, about a week before the fishermen were set off on their mackerel-fishing in the spring, that Philip, who had spent the morning in his usual way, idling on the cliff, went home and sat down by the fire. Margaret, his wife, had just come down all clean and tidy, and dressed for afternoon church.

"Philip," said she, "I wish you would come with me to church."

"Not I, Margaret," said Philip; "I am going out on the cliff."

"If you had heard Mr. Percy but once," said his wife, "how you would like him! Come, Phil; do come."

"No, I won't—you needn't ask it," said he.

Margaret was very sorry to hear her husband say this; and she went out, as she had often done, alone, and cast down.

So Philip was left by himself. He somehow, did not just then wish to go on the cliff, and so sat on by the fire. He began to think of Margaret, and how rudely he had refused her; and then of himself, and how he spent his Sundays. Then he thought of years long past: of his seat at church, the look of the holy building, the happiness of that time when he was a lad doing as he ought, and as his Rector wished: but now it was all changed, now there was nothing to think of but Sundays spent, foolishness, sin, bad words, and a great deal more. Philip, as he thought of all this began to feel very uneasy; so he started up off his chair, and tried to think of other things. There were some books on the table, piled neatly one above another; one of these he snatched up and began to read. It was about a man that turned out ill, and died suddenly without any change for the better. Philip got so interested that he read on from beginning to end, without stopping; and there was a good deal just at the finishing quite solemn. When he had done, he laid it down, and felt more uneasy than before. The man in the book was just like him. He felt that he had done very wrong indeed. It must have been like the prodigal son in the parable, who remembered his father's house where once he lived, and repented that he had ever left it; so no doubt, Philip was sorry for what was past, and for having chosen evil courses instead of good ones. He never in his life before had been so uncomfortable; and very likely, if he had known the confession of sins in the service of the holy communion, he would have said from his heart, "The remembrance of them is grievous; the burden of them is intolerable." It was, no doubt, the Holy Spirit who brought to his mind all these grave thoughts, and made him so full of new and anxious feelings.

At last Margaret came home, and, to her surprise, there was Philip just where she had left him, sitting by the fire; but when she looked at him, she was nearly frightened, for he looked very unhappy and downcast; not proud, and bright, and careless, as he usually did. So she asked him eagerly, if he was ill; but he only said, "No," and seemed to wish not to speak.

I think I told you at the beginning that there was a lecture on Sunday evenings in the school-room.—Somehow, the fishermen did not go to this lecture, or if by chance any did go, they were looked upon by the rest as having done something particular, and as if they were now going to lead religious lives.

Margaret got ready as usual to go to this lecture; and as she was going out, to her great surprise, Philip took up his hat and said,

"Margaret, I will go with you to-night."

"What? To the lecture, Philip?"

"Yes," said he, and they went out together.

It was many years since he had been in the school room; and when he looked round, he remembered many things that had to do with the time when he was a boy; but everything now that came across him only made him feel sorrowful and anxious about himself. Presently, however, he forgot every thing except what he was now listening to; for my father seemed exactly to speak to him alone. If he had been with Philip all the afternoon, and had known every single thought which had gone through his mind, he could not have spoken more entirely to him. So Philip went home; and all night he lay awake often bursting into tears, both of sorrow and of fear; for he was now afraid that his sins would never be forgiven, they seemed to him so many and so great; and many a thing which in past time he had done and never thought of, now seemed wrong or wicked, and filled him with anxiety. He told Margaret about it, for he could not hide it from her; and no doubt she was both glad and sorry, for poor Philip seemed more miserable than she had ever seen him.

The next day Philip had to begin getting things ready for his fishing voyage. He had nets to mend and many other things to do. The owner of the little vessel of which he was captain lived at the town a mile or two off; and there Philip went early in the morning. He was glad to find that his share of work was in a little room all by himself—not with the rest of the crew as was usual. For now Philip liked better to think, than to talk of all kinds of folly or nonsense. So there he stayed all day; and the more he thought, the more sorry he grew for all his past sins; and while he was alone he did not mind crying for grief. The next day he was in the same little room alone, and the next; and, little by little, he began to feel some hope mixing with fear and sorrow, a hope that he might be forgiven. It was a wonderfully comforting feeling, for Philip was in earnest; and he so knelt down on the floor and prayed. It was a long time since he had done so before, or at least since he had done so with his whole heart in it. But now he prayed, not coldly, or in a dull way, but like the publican, who beat his breast, and said, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" or like the prodigal son, who said, "Father, I have sinned against Heaven and in thy sight;" and poor Philip, when he knelt and prayed, wished very much indeed to be heard; and as I said, was in earnest about it. I wish we all were more in earnest when we say our prayers, especially at church.

When Philip had got up from his knees, he hoped still more that he would be forgiven. He had a warm-hearted affectionate disposition; and now a great many things came into his mind which he had learned when he was a boy, about Jesus Christ, who died for the sins of the whole world; and when he thought of this, it made him cry a great deal, to think that He had suffered for him, and yet that he had thought so little about it all his life nearly, and had been so ungrateful and shown so little love or duty to that most merciful Saviour. When he thought of this, he knelt down again; and so on day after day, till his work was finished, and they set off on their voyage.

Philip was now very unlike what he was before; and very soon his men saw this; for when Sunday came round, he made a difference, and spent a good deal of time reading his Bible and Prayer-book; and on week-days, too, he did so; they also saw that he was very careful what language he used, and never said a wicked word. Besides this he never fell into passions; but even if he was vexed, he kept cheerful. More than this, if ever he heard any bad language he used to stop it directly; and this would make the men very angry; and when they saw him sitting and reading his little Bible, they were so cruel and so wicked as to laugh at him. I daresay this will shock you; and it is very shocking. When Philip saw that his men laughed at him for reading his Bible he was very unhappy, but went on reading it just the same. Sometimes however it almost made him angry; for he had a hasty temper naturally, and knew that if he were to speak in a passion he could not stop them; but somehow, he did not like to take his own part, or to do anything to turn off from him this trouble. So day after day he went on bearing to be sneered at by all the boat's crew; and at last it got very hard to bear. If there had been only one to take his part—but he was quite alone, and all were against him. So one day, poor Philip was down in his little cabin, and he was so sorrowful and lonesome that he sat down on a box and cried; but while he cried a beautiful quick thought came into his mind. It was the thought of Jesus Christ suffering as he did then, only much, much more; and something seemed to say "He suffered more than you;" and he got up quite glad and bold, and as if he were ready to suffer any thing for the sake of Jesus Christ, who had suffered even death for him.

At the end of a few weeks they came home again; and now, to everybody's surprise, there was Philip the most regular church-goer in the parish. And then we got to know him and his wife very well; and he did not mind telling us a great many things which I have told you: he used to talk of my father's lecture that Sunday evening when he went to the schoolroom; and of the little room where he worked alone, and of the deck of his little vessel at nights, where he used to walk up and down for hours, feeling, I daresay solemn, and thankful and glad. It is now many years since this happened; but Philip goes on unchanged, and he is still as brave as a lion. His example was of great use in the village, and many more grew thoughtful as he had. Long since his boat's crew have given up laughing at him, and now they respect him more than they ever did.

I do not think I have any thing more to tell you about him except that we are all very fond of Philip and his wife; and though long since we have left the village where he lives, yet we often hear of them; and I think every one of us would be willing to serve them to the utmost.

Miscellaneous.

DECREASE OF THE CLERICAL ORDERS.—In this powerful body of men signal changes have been wrought. Before the Revolution (of France), it possessed the third part, if not the full half, of the landed interest (of the Kingdom), and shared with the nobility the rights of feudal lordship. In 1757, the Abbe de St. Pierre reckoned in France 40,000 cures (parish priests, with larger power than the class to whom the English give the name curates), 60,000 other priests, 100,000 monks, and 10,000 nuns, being a total of 300,000, or 1 to every 67 inhabitants. But in 1829 the clerical order comprised but 108,000 members, that is to say, but 1 one to every 280 inhabitants.

Causes, both many and various, have been in constant operation since the sixteenth century, to reduce the number of the clergy. By casting up the columns of figures, we find that the number of ecclesiastics, in their proportion to the residue of the population, has diminished thus:

At Rome, in 65 years, three-fifths.

In Portugal, in 31 years, five-sixths.

In Bavaria, in 28 years, two-thirds.

In Sicily, in 51 years, more than one-half.

In France, in 67 years, more than four-fifths.

In Switzerland, in 37 years, one-third.

In Russia, in 33 years, much more than one-third.

In Denmark, in 20 years, one-half and even more.

In Sweden, in 60 years, one-third.

The larger share of these losses has fallen on the Romish clergy. During fifty years, in six of the States of Europe, it has diminished to the amount of 855,000, priests, monks, or nuns.

These cyphers, full of instruction, suggest many reflections.

[We can add that in the great Empire of Brazil the catholic priesthood has all but run out.—Eds. J. of Com.]

And in Cuba nearly the same. A Paris Journal.

NO MOTHER GOES HUNGRY IF I KNOW IT.—A few weeks since, a mother (from Rahway, N. J.) with her child, came to New York, on her way to join her husband in a town about thirty miles from Albany. Here she was misdirected, took the Boston boat, and soon found herself in a town of the same, or a similar name, in the State of Maine. By this time her money was gone, and she, with a child of ten months old, some four hundred miles from home. The selectmen of the town with commendable promptness paid her passage back to Portland, whence through the courtesy of the railroad and steamboat agents, she obtained a free passage to New York. At the Mansfield depot, on the way, a Yankee sailor joined the same train, and was not long in "guessing" out the whole case. Before reaching New York, the sailor mentioned it to several gentlemen on board the boat, and received from them a small amount towards helping her home.—Another sailor standing by inquired into the circumstances, and finding that the passengers had contributed but a few cents each, pulled out a five dollar note, adding, "Here, good woman, is five dollars for you, and if that won't take you home, I'll give you more." Then turning to the other sailor, he said, "I go to sea for my money, but I get it to use, and no mother goes hungry if I know it."

After the boat was made fast, he attended her to the conveyance that was to take her to her friends, and paid her passage. —Sailor's Magazine.

THE COLONIAL BISHOPRICS.—DIOCESE OF CAPE TOWN.—The Right Rev. Dr. Gray, some time since consecrated first Bishop of the new diocese of Cape Town, will depart for the scene of his future labours in the course of the present week. The population which will be placed under the Bishop's spiritual care may be estimated at nearly 200,000, of whom 70,000 may be considered as heathen and 8,000 as Mahomedan. The bulk of the English population resides in the western province, in the neighbourhood of Cape Town, in Stellenbosch and Swellendam, and in the eastern province, in the districts of Albany and Ardenhye. The intermediate districts are chiefly occupied by the Dutch colonists, who have their own congregations, and have ever shown a kindly spirit to the members of the English Church scattered amongst them. There are not more than 14 clergy scattered throughout this extensive colony, but the number will be considerably increased, as several missionaries and candidates for holy orders will accompany the Bishop to his new diocese. His Lordship has intimated his intention of forthwith founding a collegiate institution at Cape Town, in which he may reside himself, and with one or two clergy, train young men for the ministry of the Church in the colony. Two missionaries have already been sent out to St. Helena, in connection with the new Bishop.

EXPULSION OF THE JESUITS FROM SWITZERLAND.—This great national achievement will be productive—no doubt—of immense benefit to the interesting country which has been the scene of it, and to the world at large, by helping to break up the tangled net of Romish deception and intrigue. We are sorry, however, to see that this work of purification has been attended with many acts of cruelty, injustice, and revenge. In England we know that an arbitrary ruler and a covetous aristocracy did much to mar the excellence of our Reformation, and to impair the strength of the Church, by the selfish way in which they appropriated to their own enrichment the property belonging to the religious orders, or we should rather say, to the National Church. In Switzerland the late events shew that the same unrighteous disregard of justice can be equally evinced by a turbulent and powerful democracy. But in that country they lack the counteracting influence which was exerted over King Henry and his counselors by Cranmer, Latimer, and others of the National Clergy. Other Orders—such as "Les Sœurs de la Charité"—which have never been considered so obnoxious as the Jesuits, have yet been made to share in the summary extirpation of that troublesome fraternity. At Fribourg, the party in power—that is, the passionate, unlicensed mob—turned these helpless women adrift in a state of absolute want and beggary. This is both dishonest and inhuman. We observe that the whole transaction—that is, not only the suppression of the Jesuits, but all the circumstances of rage and violence connected with it—is spoken of by a correspondent of one of the New York Journals, as a favourable specimen of federal government. We—for our part—should prefer a reformation conducted more temperately and more fairly, —with Christian compassion and no spoliation.—The Church.

requires. While we cannot therefore express a decided opinion, as to its particular parts, we may say that its repute is high in the esteem of those we regard as good judges.

In a most interesting narrative it sets forth topics of infinite moment. The author is not named, but the "Preface to the American edition" says, "could the author be named, his name would be an abundantly sufficient warrant that the principles of the English church would be as plainly and unequivocally stated, in contradistinction to those opposite aspects of religionism, between which the path of her vocation lies, as they are thoroughly comprehended and honestly held." The book is got up in excellent shape, and is creditable to the publishers. We expect to find in it some interesting extracts. As a specimen we give one or two which are most appropriate to one of our editorials.

A more experienced priest is giving some advice to one less experienced as to his conduct in his new parish, and says—

"No," he said, "do not be afraid of being premature. Call yourself at once what you ought to be. Have your letters directed to you 'The Catholic Rector of Hawkstone.' It will compel that poor old paralytic to call himself the Protestant rector; and then any one will be able to see that the Catholic must be the true, and the Protestant the false one—any one who has learned his creed. Think what this one word has done for us—how by using words of this kind exclusively, and allowing them to no other, we have prospered already."

"You must get some converts soon," said Pearce, "in this place. It tells wonderfully."

"There is old Mrs. Dennett," replied the other, "who keeps the little apple-stall at the corner of King's Street. I have talked to her a good deal. She is an Irishwoman, and a Catholic, but married a heretic soldier, and for years has gone to Church. I think she will come round soon. She is very poor; and I have offered her to sweep out the chapel."

"Yes," said Pearce; "and you must get an account of it into the papers—the Irish papers especially, and those which are at a distance; but even close here it does not much matter what you say, for no one takes the trouble to read or believe the contradiction of a bold statement once put forward well. You must head it—Conversions to the Catholic Church. Something of this kind: 'The Progress of Divine Truth has been singularly and almost miraculously manifested in this district, under the sacred ministrations of the Rev. P. O'Fogarty, Catholic pastor, or, if you like it, rector, of the parish. On Sunday last a venerable lady was received into the bosom of the Church with the usual ceremonies. The Bishop of Ely preached an admirable sermon on this interesting occasion. The solemn choir service was under the direction of the talented Mr. Simpson, assisted by a large and extensive body of performers. The holy building was thronged with a fashionable and influential congregation, among whom were many Protestants of rank, who evinced deep sympathy and admiration.' Then in the London papers you may put something of this kind: 'We understand that a late important conversion to the Catholic Church has caused the greatest sensation in a town not a hundred miles from Hawkstone. The lady in question is whispered to be of high rank and immense wealth, as well as the most unquestionable piety and talent. It is understood that her return to the true faith has been caused by her dissatisfaction with the secularity and false principles of the Protestant communion of England; and that she will soon be followed by a large body of friends and dependants.' In another paper you may put—'We are authorized to state that the lady of rank who has recently been made a convert to the Catholic Church at Hawkstone, is not Lady ——. Her property has also been overrated. It by no means equals 30,000*l.* a year. It is understood that the first scruples were infused into her mind by reading, not the Tracts for the Times, and other works of the Oxford school, but some sermons of a celebrated vicar of a certain large manufacturing town, whose name begins with H and ends with k.'"
—Mr. Haak

O'Fogarty could not help smiling. "And what is the good of this?" he asked.

Pearce regarded him with a sneer. "You who are to manage matters in my place," he said—"you to ask the good of this! In the first place, does it not give to us importance and dignity, and the appearance of success? and success will soon find followers. Secondly, does it not encourage our friends? Thirdly, does it not terrify the Protestants, and especially the wild Protestants of Ireland? Fourthly, does it not drive them into more extravagance, and more violent abuse of all that we hold; and does not this expose them to make false statements, and thus to ridicule and refutation? And has any thing fed and supported us more than the follies of what they call low Church, and ultra-Protestantism? Fifthly, does it not dishearten those who are still lingering half way, and prepare them to come over? Sixthly, does it not throw suspicion upon our worst and most dangerous enemies, if their principles are shown to be the cause of these conversions to us?"

THE CHRISTIAN YEAR, KEBLE'S, &c., from the 31st London edition, Philadelphia, Geo. S. Appleton, 148 Chesnut street, New York, D. Appleton & Co. 1848.

Of the contents of this treasured book we need not speak. It is published in beautiful and convenient form, and does credit to the taste of those who have added to the many editions of a work, which will be in demand as long as there is a heart to appreciate true poetry consecrated to high and holy themes.

NOVUM TESTAMENTUM DOMINI NOSTRI JESU CHRISTI. Interpretatio Theodoro Beza. Published by the Messrs. Appleton, a book exceedingly well printed and substantially bound, as if for use. The preface says "The editor has exerted himself to render the present edition, by its superior accuracy and neatness, worthy of patronage; and the publishers flatter themselves that the pains bestowed will insure for it a preference over any other edition." For the above books we are indebted to the Messrs. Appleton.

Domestic.

Contributions from 15th of December to 15th January, $4,903 59. Total since June 15th, 1847, $17,845 03.

FUNDS.—During the month, important returns have been made to the Treasurer. It is gratifying once again, in the history of Domestic Missions, to record this fact, and also to note that a considerable portion of the amount has been received from Missionary Stations, from parishes which have not before contributed, and from some, although self-supporting, yet still feeble, which once received missionary aid.

The present prospect would be indeed cheering, if it were not for the indebtedness, owing to the great and unexpected failure of returns last year, with which this department entered upon the current fiscal year.

This weight could easily be removed, by those who yet have not, as in former years, contributed to the cause of missions. To them we look with deep earnestness.—A cheerful and a prompt response would make glad many hearts, which have been bowed long enough to the earth.

We are now striving to pay the stipends due on the 1st of October last, whilst month by month brings us nearer to the time, (1st of April,) when another half year's salary will be due. Yet, the intermediate period is ample enough in which to meet the whole amount, and enable the department to enter upon the next half-year free from debt, if the churches will only act. Since the adjournment of the General Convention, the information received from different sections of the Missionary field, is of the most cheering nature.

By the favourable opportunities everywhere presenting to plant Churches and send Missionaries, the language of God to each one plainly is, "Son, go work to day in my vineyard." Let us obey His voice. Daily we ask Him to supply our wants. And as often does He expect willing service from us. Then let us labour and faint not—neither be weary in well-doing. "To do good and distribute, forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased."

RESIGNATIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN THE COMMITTEE.—The Rev. Henry Anthon, D. D., and the Rev. L. P. W. Balch, having resigned as members of the Domestic Committee, the Rev. Thomas H. Taylor, D. D., and the Rev. Henry J. Whitehouse, D. D., have been unanimously elected to fill the vacancies, and have signified their acceptance of the appointment.

APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. W. D. Harlow, late of Bowling Green, Ky., transferred to St. Mary's, Georgia. The Rev. T. I. Smith, Missionary to Cass and Floyd counties, Georgia, from 1st January, 1848. The Rev. W. A. Stickney, to Marion, Alabama. The Rev. B. M. Miller, to Florence and Tusculumbia, Alabama. The Rev. Samuel C. Kerr, to Woodville, Mississippi, for six months from 1st January, 1848—a portion of the stipend being specially provided. The Rev. E. H. Downing, to Kirkwood, Mississippi, from 1st October, 1847.

RESIGNATION.—Rev. J. W. Rogers, of the Station of Randolph, Tennessee, from 10th September, 1847.

DEATH.—The Rev. Thomas Leaver, Missionary at Concord, N. H., deceased on 23d December, 1847.

Foreign.

Contributions from 15th December to 15th June, $3,541 02. Total, since 15th June 1847, $12,958 04.

COLLECTIONS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.—The address of the Committee has been the means of obtaining contributions from many of the smaller parishes, which have not heretofore remembered the wants of the Foreign Treasury in their annual offerings. It is hoped that this may be the beginning of an abiding interest in the Missions of the Church abroad.

Not the least gratifying circumstance connected with this collection has been the kind and encouraging letters which have been received from many quarters. They give evidence of the existence of a Missionary spirit, which can never permit the Church to falter, in her purpose to do her part in the great work of a world's conversion to the faith of Christ.

The offerings of those Churches from whom nothing has yet been received, are looked for with great solicitude.

MISSION CHAPEL AT SHANGHAI.—The contributions for this object of so much importance to the prosperity of the Mission, have been remitted by special bills as fast as received by the Treasurer. There is yet needed a considerable sum to complete the amount.

The remark of Bishop Boone in the last number of the Spirit of Missions, concerning the "New Parish Trinity Church," may lead to misapprehension. This has nothing to do with the Mission Chapel. Trinity Church is a building now in progress from grants of members of the Church of England, and intended for British residents, the services of which are to be conducted in the English language, and of which an English Chaplain is to have the charge. The Mission Chapel is for services to the natives in the Chinese language, and to be under the exclusive care of Bishop Boone.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—Advices to 23d October, 1847, have been received. A letter from Bishop Southgate will be found under the head of Missionary Correspondence.

AFRICAN MISSION.—By the arrival of the brig Hollander, from Western Africa, on the 17th January, interesting intelligence has been received from the African Mission of as late date as 5th November last.

The Rev. Mr. Hening having been seriously ill of the coast fever, was induced by advice of the Mission to seek a temporary respite from labour by a visit to this country. He accordingly came passenger in the Hollander, accompanied by Mrs. Hening.

The voyage has been of the greatest service to his health, and when thoroughly recruited and relieved, (as he trusts by God's blessing he shall be,) of an affection of the eyes, which now deprives him, in great measure, of their use, he proposes to return to his station. He hopes also to take with him some fellow-labourers, to co-operate with our Missionaries now in that important position.

The Missionaries remaining in Africa were all in tolerably good health, in no wise disheartened, and vigorously engaged in their work. Their efforts are now concentrated upon the most important points, and their exertions specially directed to the preparation of the most promising pupils to act hereafter as Missionaries and teachers. In the next number of the Spirit of Missions will be published large extracts from the letters now received.

CHINA.—By the steamer Cambria, and overland mail, a letter has been received from the Rev. P. D. Spalding, affording intelligence from the Mission at Shanghai as late as 10th October.

We add the following extracts from Bishop Southgate's letter.

San Stephano—Constantinople, October 23, 1847.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—Two of your inquiries, as I now observe, have reference to matters not treated of in my recent letter to the seceders. I will, therefore, allude to them more fully here. You inquire about certain testimonials signed by individuals, declaring that the Armenian Patriarch required them to subscribe to a certain "idolrous confession,"—the same that has been published. You ask, what I know about the matter, and whether I know the persons who signed these testimonials. I reply, that I do not. None of them are the names of persons who were the founders of the new sect, you may see by comparing them with the subscriptions papers emanating from the sect; for example, the signatures the letter to our Church to which mine was a reply. They are none of them persons known here as having any thing to do with the formation of the sect; who they are I do not know. Some of them, I judge by the names, are females; some sign Christian name without any surname. Of the thirteen signed from Constantinople, (and I speak of no others,) eleven testify that they were called upon to sign the "new creed," ("idolrous confession,") or another paper, but they do not say which another declares that it was the other paper which the Patriarch required him to sign, and afterwards his own Priest required him to sign the "idolrous confession," which he did. The thirteenth one alone testifies that the Patriarch required him to sign the "idolrous confession." Of all these, one only testifies to the point in hand; and he, I believe, was mistaken either because he is ignorant of his own language, (a very common thing,) or because he took the paper presented to him by the Patriarch as the "idolrous confession," without examining it. It is not at all probable that he would sit down in the Patriarch's presence and peruse it.

On the whole, I attach no importance whatever to these testimonials, against the mass of evidence which I have presented to the contrary; and I dismiss them as hardly worthy of the attention which I have bestowed upon them.

My news from the interior possesses considerable interest. A Bishop with whom I have long been intimate, and with whom, at a former period of my Mission, I resided some months, writes me that he has fully embraced the reformed views which have been the subject of our frequent discussion, and that now his great desire is to train his flock in them. A Presbyterian connected with this mission, and now in the same place, writes that he attends frequently on the Bishop's preaching, and sees him often in private conversation, and that he is struck with the purity and faithfulness of his doctrine. What is still better, is that his people seem to be all of one mind in preferring his present views, and have lately represented to their Patriarch, when a change of Diocesan was in contemplation, that they did not wish for one who did not preach the pure word of God. The Patriarch is, if not of the same mind too far advanced in his knowledge of these things to oppose such a desire on the part of the people, and I believe I may say that his convictions are too nearly the same to allow of his doing so. He is one with whom I am on terms of intimate friendship, and I have urged him to leave the present arrangements of the Diocese undisturbed. A priest from his parts has lately been with me, and is now leaving with this message, which, being of an informal character, I have not thought best to commit to writing.

We ask the attention of our readers to the following notice. We trust that an enterprise which, if rightly conducted, must contribute so much to the advancement of religious knowledge, may obtain that encouragement which it well deserves.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY SOCIETY.

Established for the Publication and Republication of Church Histories, &c.; Chiefly those by British Authors, or concerning the British Church.

The importance of Church History as a study, is too generally acknowledged to need any remark; but the means whereby the study can alone be prosecuted—viz: by access to the works of the best Ecclesiastical Historians—will be found within the reach of comparatively few, even among those who are most interested in the research. The great cost of a series of such works—the difficulty, if not impossibility, of obtaining some portions of the whole—all point out the propriety of embracing in one uniform series, and at the lowest possible price, the whole History of the Christian Church, and more particularly of that part with which we are ourselves connected, faithfully and carefully edited, and without abbreviation.

The names of Antony a' Wood, Barlow, Bede, Burnet, Col-Dugdale, Dupin, Field, Fuller, Gildas, Godwin, Inett, lyn, Sprat, Strype, Stow, Walker, Wharton, Winstanley, many others, will be sufficient to show the field of labor of the Society, and the value of the works they propose to publish.

The Society's New Edition of Strype will contain a Life of Strype, besides a large mass of MSS. matter never before published. Not less than four volumes will be published annually.
Subscription one guinea. The publications of the Society for 1847 and 1848, will consist of two volumes of "Strype's Chronicle;" two volumes of "Field of the Church;" 1st volume of "Wood's Athenae Oxonienses," edited by the Rev. Dr.
Stephens; Walker's "Sufferings of the Clergy;" and a new edition of the "Book of Common Prayer, with Notes Legal and Historical," by A. J. Stephens, Esq., Barrister at Law. An Athenae Cantabrigienses" is in the course of preparation, and will form one of the future publications of the Society.
Subscriptions £1 1s. become due on the 1st of January in each year, and are received till the 31st of March.

Many of the Clergy and Laity, whose names were not received till the subscription list of 1847 was closed, having expressed a desire to possess the Books of the Society for that year, it has been determined to make a second issue of these volumes, the number of which will be limited to one thousand, and the subscription fixed at £2 2s. An early application will be necessary to secure their delivery.

The subscriber has been constituted the Agent of the above Society for the United States, and is now prepared to receive and forward subscriptions to the Secretary. Seven dollars will be the charge for each annual subscription; the books delivered in Philadelphia, free of all other expense. The books of 1847 cannot be furnished under $12 00, as the Society charges the value of two subscriptions therefor; nor can they confidently promise to subscribers, as the re-issue is limited to 1000 copies; immediate application is the only hope of success. To obtain the books to be issued for 1848, subscriptions must be forwarded at once, the time for their receipt being limited;
they will be subject to the hazard of being too late.

All subscriptions are payable in advance, and unless a remittance accompanies the application the books cannot be secured. Subscribers will designate, particularly, the channel through which their books are to be forwarded to them, or the disposition they wish made of them after their receipt in Philadelphia.

Present Condition of the Church.

The readers of the statistics of the Church as found in the Journal of the last General Convention, will err in their estimate of its present condition, and be led to suppose there has been an alarming diminution in her members, as among the various denominations, unless they notice that the number of Communicants, &c., in the largest Diocese in the union is omitted, viz. New York. While they will read in the reports of the respective dioceses, accounts of growth and gratifying prosperity—that everywhere the church has been extending, they will not be that, whereas at the Gen Convention of 1844, there were reported 72,099 Communicants; at that of 1847, there were only 67,550. But upon examination, it will be discovered that returns have been received from the diocese of New York, while it is known that the increase in that afflicted section of the church, has been as great as during any former period—the Standing Committee state—"The clergy having no official duty to whom it was their duty to report the state of their several parishes, the usual statistics do not appear upon the Journals. But we have good reason to believe that the affliction of the Diocese has not been without its beneficial influence in awakening a spirit of inquiry concerning the great and distinguishing doctrines of our church apostolic, and a more than ordinary attention to the duties of spiritual religion. At no former period have the services of the church been more devoutly attended, the rites and ordinances of our holy religion more diligently performed by its faithful members. And notwithstanding the division within her borders, and the opprobrium without, the church in this Diocese has continued to lengthen her cords and strengthen her stakes. Her course has been onward, and will appear from her enlarged number of clergy and congregations.

The clergy consists of the Bishop and 238 Priests and Deacons, making an increase of 41 clergymen.
Thirty-one new congregations have been added. During the previous three years, only nine new congregations had been added, thus showing a very great increase in the number of the congregations over the previous period.

At the Gen. Convention of 1844, 13,436 communicants were reported; at that of 1841, 10,272; showing an increase of more than 3,000 in 164 parishes, we may therefore infer that the addition during the last three years in 196 congregations, were not less than 4,000, making the present number 17,436.

When moreover we consider that the journals of the Diocesan Conventions furnish their general statistics, and that in every Diocese there are many Parishes from which reports are received, we may add at least 1,000 more, so that we have not less than 18,500, to add to 67,550 found in the present journal of the Gen. Convention; making an aggregate of 86,050, Communicants in the American branch of the holy church of our Lord.

While numerical strength is not always evidence of divine blessing, yet this fact of increase in the church, while the different denominations have to lament a sad diminution in their numbers should furnish motives to increased diligence and faithfulness to her members, in the discharge of their duties, and the use of their most precious privileges. And when we consider that this prosperity has been sent in the midst of the sorest calamities and the darkest hour in her history in this country, they have occasion for the exercise of the devoutest gratitude to Him who has remembered the vine of his own planting, and watered it with the dews and showers of his spirit, when exposed to dangers and sorely beaten by the whirlwinds of passion. The history of the past furnishes the strongest inducements to "go forward," for "in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength."

Sailor Missionaries.

It is certainly a remarkable fact, that among the various plans in operation for spreading Christianity over the earth, and bringing the heathen within the fold of salvation, it should never have occurred to the Church to employ seamen, at least as auxiliaries in the work. How far they may be used as direct agents, we will not at present attempt to show, as a preliminary step must first be taken. We do not hesitate to say, from actual personal observation on the very spot where the scene is enacting, that at this moment, and for ages past, this portion of the Christian population is, and has been, engaged in nothing less than building up a strong wall between the Church and the object which, by the command of her Divine founder and head, she is required to effect,—the making disciples of heathen nations. A mere glance at the narratives of voyagers from the days of the Buccaneers, (as those celebrated piratical heroes were called, whose lawless rapacity helped to fill the purses and extend the domain of Christian sovereigns,) down to the journals of modern explorers, will suffice to establish this point.
Any reflecting person must at once perceive from the record, that the savage idolator has yet to learn wherein the civilized worshipper of the true God, is better than himself. What, for example, is such a lesson as this to teach? A ship visits an island, whose inhabitants have never before seen a stranger.
The crew land and are welcomed by the wondering natives who crowd around to gaze on the novel sight. Fruit, vegetables, &c., are freely exchanged, or rather given for mere baubles, and the ignorance of the poor savages, as to the real value of their commodities, furnishes a merry jest to their honest customers. Attracted by its curious appearance, a native takes up a spyglass, and runs about it in great glee with his toy. In the midst of his merriment, he is shot dead by a musket ball. Confusion and consternation ensue, and a volley is fired into the defenceless and unsuspecting crowd. Many are killed and wounded;
a panic follows. The natives flee to their caves and forests, and the strangers regain their ship, and depart. Remorse for such atrocity is banished by the reflection that they were only savages who were thus dealt with. The report of the transaction is brief and without comment. "A spyglass was taken up by a native. Whether he intended to steal it, or not, was uncertain; but the thievish habits of these people make it probable that he did, and fearing a general robbery, we fired on them."
Not long after, another ship touches at this island. The natives, taught by experience that white men were not to be trusted, and meditating vengeance, entrap the luckless crew by treacherous wiles, and suddenly rising on them, succeed in killing all but two or three, who, escaping, publish a terrible account of savage outrage upon a peaceable trader. A man-of-war is despatched to hurl vengeance on the heads of the wanton invaders, and impress upon their memories that Christian nations will surely repay. At Easter Island, in the Pacific, a transaction occurred a very few years ago, of which the above is an imperfect outline. The picture may be easily filled up from the history of Oceania alone. In course of time the Missionary is sent to preach the Gospel of love and peace. In what frame of mind is he likely to find the heathen? If permitted to to come among them at all, it is at the peril of his life, and suspicion, hatred, and revenge must be removed from their hearts, ere the "Spirit of truth" can enter. Can any fail to perceive what should be done in the first place? Send a better class of men abroad, as pioneers of Christianity, who will prepare, not block up the way before the messengers of peace. R. S. Trable

Memoir of Miss Margaret Mercer, by Caspar Morris, M. D. Philadelphia: Lindsay & Blakiston. 1848.

The above work, now rapidly passing through a second edition, contains the well written memoirs of a well spent life.—
Not a life of stirring incident and thrilling adventure, but of steady, high-minded, Christian perseverance in a labour of love which by God's blessing was crowned at last with success.
But while labouring for one excellent end, the subject of the present memoir had both inclination and ability to accomplish many christian works of kindness.—Her life indeed was like the course of some upland stream, which, though led by industrious hands mainly to fertilize a particular region of country, refreshed and gladdened all the districts through which its current passed. Strong intellect, remarkable decision of character, a warm enthusiasm, a deep seated sympathy for human suffering, marked this eminent disciple of Christ, and these qualities of course left their impress upon the works in which she engaged during her active life.

We cordially commend the book which contains her memoirs to the attention of the christian world, and promise confidently much information and gratification from the perusal.

One brief extract is all we offer from the work itself; it gives a fair idea of what that work contains.

Speaking of the decease of this servant of Christ, her biographer says: "It were impossible, even were it attempted, for any pen to delineate the sad effects of the death of Miss Mercer, not only upon her immediate household friends, but upon the neighborhood she had so signally blessed. She found it a moral wilderness, and by her labours it had been made truly to blossom as the rose. Where, only two short years before, she had met with nothing but hostility to her plans, she now experienced no other feeling than love. Those who had resorted to every means in their power to thwart her efforts, impair her usefulness, and destroy her reputation, now mourned over her loss as that of a benefactress; and not only her sorrowing friends and bereaved pupils and companions in labour, but the whole population by which she was surrounded, assembled in the little church which she had reared in their midst, by her own exertions, and to which she fondly looked as the means of perpetuating the influence she had laboured to establish among them, to pay a sorrowing tribute to her worth; and there beneath its hallowed chancel rests her loved remains." ***

Diocesan Intelligence.

Tennessee.—On the sixth Sunday after the Epiphany, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Otey admitted to the holy order of the Priesthood in St. John's Church, Ashwood, the Rev. John A. Harrison, Deacon, and minister of the parish. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. John Noble, who also presented the candidate, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. E. H.
Cressey, of the Diocese of Missouri.

New York.—The Standing Committee have renewed their invitation to Bishop Potter to perform Episcopal services in this Diocese. The invitation extends to the 16th April. This will prevent disappointment to such of the clergy who had made arrangements for confirmation in their parishes, not knowing that Bishop Potter's term of duties expired on the 1st of February.
—Churchman.

On the 10th of February the Rt. Rev. Dr. Potter consecrated the Church of the Holy Trinity, West Troy, of which the Rev.
Joshua Weaver is Rector.

Western New York.—(From the Gospel Messenger abridged.)
SUMMARY.—The following is a summary of Bishop De Lancey's
Visitation in February, from the 1st to the 20th inst.

Ordained one Priest and one Deacon.

Consecrated two Church edifices.

Instituted three Rectors.

Confirmed about 140 in seven Churches.

Married one couple.

Administered the Holy Communion three times, and preached 17 times.

BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Feb. 9th in the morning, Bishop DeLancey preached in Grace Church, Lockport, and after the public catechising of the children by the Rector, made a brief address to the children and parents.

In the evening the Bishop preached; after which he confirmed fifteen persons, including one from St. Paul's Church, Lewiston.

On Feb. 10th the Bishop held an ordination in Christ Church, Lockport, and admitted Mr. Henry Budd Walbridge to the holy order of Deacons. On this occasion the Bishop also held a confirmation and confirmed eight persons.

On Sunday the 13th, in St. James' Church, Batavia, the Bishop preached both morning and afternoon.—In the afternoon the Bishop confirmed thirty persons, including one in private.

On Tuesday, February 15th, Trinity Church, Rochester, was consecrated to the worship of Almighty God. The request to consecrate was presented by Seth C. Jones Esq., the senior warden, and read by Rev. Mr. Lee. The sentence of Consecration was read by the Rev. Mr. Cooper, the Rector of the Church.

In the evening Divine service was held at St. Luke's Church, on which occasion the Bishop preached.

On Wednesday the 16th, the Rev. Henry W. Lee was instituted Rector of St. Luke's Church, by the Bishop. Rev.
Mr. Cooper read prayers, and the Rev. Mr. Stryker the lessons.
The officiating warden was William Pitkin, Esq. The sermon was preached by the Bishop, and the Holy Communion administered by the newly instituted Rector, assisted by the Rev. Dr.
Van Ingen.

In the evening the Bishop preached at St. Paul's Church, and confirmed twenty-three persons, including one in private.

On Thursday the 17th, the Rev. Charles D. Cooper was instituted Rector of Trinity Church, Rochester, by the Bishop.
The officiating Warden was Seth C. Jones, Esq. The sermon was preached by the Bishop, and the instituted Rector administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Gallagher of Danville.

Maine.—ORDINATION.—On Friday, the 11th instant, at Christ Church, Gardiner, the Right Rev. Bishop Burgess admitted the Rev. Samuel Durborow, minister of St. James' Church, Milford, and Missionary at Oldtown, to the holy order of the Priesthood. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Alexander Burgess, Rector of St. Mark's Church, Augusta. The sermon was preached by the Bishop, from St. John, x. 11,—"The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." The candidate was presented by the Rev. Thomas H. Fales, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Brunswick; and the Rev. Messrs. Burgess and Fales assisted in the imposition of hands.

New Hampshire.—ORDINATION.—The Rt. Rev. Dr. Chase held an ordination in Trinity Church, Claremont, on Sunday, Feb. 6th, when the Rev. Marcellus A. Herrick was admitted to the order of Priesthood.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, PORTSMOUTH, N. H.—We learn that this Church having been recently repaired at a considerable expense, and fitted up very tastefully, was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. Bp. Chase, on Wednesday, the 16th inst. This Church has been built more than an hundred years, and has never before been formally consecrated to the worship of God.

We learn that the occasion was of great interest, and we regret that we have not yet received an account of the consecration from some of our friends in that Diocese.—Ch. Witness.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Alexander Shiras has resigned, in consequence of enfeebled health, the rectorship of St. John's, Georgetown, D. C., and the Rev. R. B. Claxton of West Chester, Pa., has been invited to succeed him.—Epi. Recorder.

The Storms and Stars of March.

BY THE REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL. D.

Harsh is the voice, and loud the war
Of storms in that ungenial time.
When, leaving southern lands afar,
The Sun wakes up our northern clime:
The long white surges of the deep
Then break on every wailing shore,
And, foaming down each rocky steep,
The mountain torrents rage and roar.

Like rapiers driven with vengeful thrust,
On breast and brow the cold winds beat,
And the fierce hail, or troubled dust,
Sweeps the rough road and echoing street:
The groaning woods are bleak and bare,
The violet slumbers yet unseen,
And the wide fields and pastures wear
No welcome tint of early green.

But God, with all a Father's love,
When Earth thus reft of beauty lies,
Reveals in blazing pomp above
The wonders of His radiant skies:—
Look thou on Night's refulgent arch,
When that rude hour thy gladness mars,
And thou shalt find, in raging March,
The month at once of storms and stars.

For lo! the great Orion burns,
Descending in the cloudless west,
And red Arcturus now returns,
Beaming at eve, a sacred guest:
Far up, in circles broad and bright,
The Bear and Lion move and shine,
While Sirius lifts his orb of light,
And fills our hearts with thoughts divine.

Thus, ever thus, when storms arise,
And all is dark and joyless here,
He sets before our longing eyes
The glories of that lofty sphere:—
When sorely tried we grieve alone,
Or sink beneath Oppression's rod,
He whispers, from His starry throne,
"LOOK UP, O MAN! AND TRUST IN GOD."

Selections.

Martin Luther.

The issue of the conference at Augsburg was a disappointment at Rome; the fault was thrown upon Cajetan's stiffness and asperity, and care was taken that the next Nuncio should be a different man. Charles Von Miltitz, Chamberlain to the Pope, was a German, in itself a recommendation; he was also a man of an open, frank exterior, and abundance of bonhomie. He and Luther met at Altenburg, on the 5th of January, 1519, spent several convivial days together, and were mutually charmed with each other's company, good humour, and jocularity. The tone of Miltitz was most grateful to a man in Luther's position: "You are drawing all the world away from the Pope: as for taking you to Rome, an army of twenty thousand would not be able to do it; you now are three to one against us." He laughed over the incidents of his journey, and told good stories. "What think you of the Roman seat [see]?" asked one of the hostesses on my road. "Seats," said she, "how should I know; are they wood or stone?" The time passed pleasantly away, and the two excellent friends parted with embraces, and on Miltitz's side with tears. "I did not," said Luther, in writing to a friend, "let it be seen that I thought the kiss Judas's kiss, and the tears crocodile's tears. The impostor, the liar! He has in his pocket seventy apostolical briefs, for leading me bound and captive to that murderous Rome." Miltitz retired from this and a subsequent meeting with the notion that he had completely brought Luther round, and made him consent to silencing conditions. But the conditions were nugatory ones. Luther consented to declare himself an obedient child of the Roman See; and consented to promise that he would invite the people to be as obedient as himself; he consented to be silent if his opponents were silent, and finally consented to the appointment of some Archbishop as his judge. The three former conditions are on their very surface trifles: with respect to the last one, he did not care who judged him, so long as the judge came to Luther in Germany, and Luther had not to go to him at Rome. The Nuncio was as completely cheated as he wished to cheat; and Luther from his first reflection on the commencement of the conference, 'I know the fox,' to the concluding one, 'The farce is over,' showed an expertness of dissimulation, for which, in an untutored and inexperienced man, even the shrewdest diplomatist could be pardonably unprepared.

Meantime, as regards the reforming movement itself, the greatest caution was exercised in the mode of conducting it. To such a degree, indeed, did Luther carry his caution with respect to his theses, the subject of all these conferences, that he would not formally admit that they were expressions of his own opinion at all. They were theses, subjects suggested for disputation, and upon which theologians were invited to exercise their argumentative power and skill. Some might take one side, some another; he had never asserted which side he himself took upon each of these ninety-five. That he had a general objection to the present mode in which Indulgences were given was indeed obvious, but he had asserted no doctrine. Thus adroitly availing himself of existing machinery, he nurtured the first tender seed of the Reformation underneath the shelter of the old disputative system. Again, as he was not responsible for the theses themselves, so neither was he for their publication. He had stuck them on the doors of the church of All Saints at Wittenberg, the usual process in announcing subjects for disputation; but who copied them thence, or how it was they were now circulating through all the towns of Germany, he had no idea. He had not done it; if others had, he could not help that. 'Is all this noise made,' he writes in his first letter to the Pope, after the publication of his theses, 'because I have simply exerted my right as a master of theology, and disputed in the public schools? Why, this is done in all universities, and these disputes take place on much more sacred subjects than indulgences. What fate brings my poor disputations into so much greater prominence than those of other masters in theology, and makes them circulate all the world over, is a miracle to me. I only published them for the sake of our people here; and how the mass understand a set of questions, put enigmatically and obscurely, as disputative ones always are, is incomprehensible to me. . . . What can I do? I am not able to recall them from circulation now, however their circulation may annoy me. I find myself brought reluctantly before the world, and exposed to every sort of criticism; an unlearned, dull, ignorant man is scrutinized by an age of cultivation and science, which could drive Cicero himself into a corner. It is my fate to be the goose hissing among the swans. . . . All I can do is to prostrate myself at your feet—vivifica, occide; vicia, revoca; approba, reproba, ut placuerit.' Again,—"I have nothing I can do: I cannot bear your anger, and how to rescue myself from it I know not. I am asked to recall my theses. If that would do any good I would do it immediately. But the truth is, that, owing to the opposition they have met with, they are circulating more widely than I ever dreamed of, and have taken such powerful hold of many minds, that they cannot be recalled. Nay, in this age of intellect and learning, it would be an injury to the Church of Rome herself to recall them, and that is the very last thing which, as a reverential son of the Roman Church, I could do." The attitude which Luther assumed towards the Pope was that of a person who found a great stir of opinion going on, over which he had no control, and which he rather regretted than not. His expressions as to himself, the most debasing which language could produce, confirmed this attitude. 'Refuse of mankind, and dust of the earth, necessity alone is my excuse for presuming to address your Blessedness. Deign to lower the ear of your Blessedness to the bleatings of your lamb. The lowest and vilest of mankind, wretched and poor, I prostrate my unworthy self at your feet.'

We approach, in this latter specimen indeed, one whole class of expressions, which specially arrests the eye of the reader of Luther's life, and upon which some notice seems required. Luther always described himself as having begun his reforming career under an all but intolerable weight of dejection, the consequence of his own low idea of himself, and exalted reverence for the system and the men whom he found himself opposing. 'I began in great fear and trembling,' he tells Erasmus. 'Who was I then, poor, miserable, contemptible brother that I was, more like a corpse than a man; who was I to set myself up against the majesty of the Pope, before whom I trembled not only the kings of the earth, and the whole world, but also, if I may so say, heaven and hell? No one can know what my heart suffered in those first two years, and into what depression, I might say into what despair, I was plunged. . . . I was not so joyous, so tranquil, so confident of success. There were, it is true, many pious Christians whom my propositions pleased much, but I could not consider them as mouth-pieces of the Holy Ghost: I looked only to the cardinals, the bishops, the theologians, the jurisconsults, the monks, the priests. . . . It was thence I expected the Spirit to breathe upon me. . . . I did honour the Pope's Church from the bottom of my heart as the true Church. . . . Had I despised the Pope, I should have trembled to see the earth open and swallow me up alive, like Corah.' With such signs of deep humility and respect for authorities did Luther conduct the Reformation through its early stages, and the question which naturally occurs is, how much of it was real, and how much of it not. The answer to such a question is provided for us by that science of character, which an increasing general experience of the various forms of character, subtle as well as simple, has now made comparatively easy and plain. It is quite safe to say, in the first place, that Luther's mental abasement before the Pope and Cardinals was partly real and partly unreal; and it is equally safe to say, in the second place, that where reality and unreality divide the ground, the unreality almost necessarily predominates over the reality. Luther had, to use a word of common parlance, a strong element of 'Jesuitism' in his nature. Without saying what at the time he did not think or feel, he could throw himself artificially into states of mind, out of which such thoughts and feelings proceeded. To a mind midway between two systems, an old one to which it had belonged, and a new one to which it was just going to belong, the present ground did not wholly extinguish the past one. Minds cannot absolutely annihilate their former state; and if there was a corner in which the old feeling existed in Luther's mind, it is the characteristic of such a mind to be able to summon it forth, and use and expand it upon occasion. The insincerity of such a mind rather lies in voluntarily, and with politic aim, exaggerating and inflating some real particle of feeling, than in feigning one which simply does not exist. Luther, in moulding his attitude to Rome, threw himself into a state of mind in which he 'thought the Cardinals, theologians, jurisconsults of Rome, the mouth-pieces of the Holy Ghost; i. e. he allowed the imposing and magnificent characteristics of the Roman system to have their effect upon him, and impress him for the time that such an impression was wanted. An act of the will produced an attitude of feeling; and a species of humility arose, so subtle, mixed, and evasive, that an observer can hardly catch it with sufficient distinctness to pronounce accurately what it was. We notice the same fine and intangible character in his apology for that part of his conduct which showed apparent want of humility: the appearance being admitted and thus explained:—'Truth will gain no more by my modesty than it will lose by my presumption. . . . Who does not know that nobody puts forward a new idea without appearing to manifest some pride? . . . The Bishops begin to perceive that they ought to have done what I am doing, and they are ashamed. They call me proud and audacious, and I do not deny that I am so. But they are not men to know what God is and what we are.'

Such was Luther's policy at the commencement of his career. Let no one refer to the success of that career as an instance of success attending simple boldness and impetuosity. Luther was always the politician, and a resolutely cautious one. With a boldness equal to facing the blindest hazard, he never moved without a definite pledge of security. He obstinately insisted on safe conducts. 'Vivat Christus, moriatur Martinus,' he exclaimed on his journey to Augsburg; but he took care to meet Cajetan with a safe conduct in his hands. 'I will go there, though I find as many devils as there are tiles on the housetop,' he said before his journey to Worms: but he took care that an imperial herald conducted him there. He proved the saying, that fear mixes largely with true courage, and that the better part of valour is discretion. Follow him step by step, and you see him the shrewd diplomatist, parrying invitations, rejecting offers, penetrating disguises. By this course of policy he kept himself out of Rome and in Germany. He kept himself among sympathizing and admiring friends, preaching, writing, and talking, and disseminating his ideas in every way. He gained time for the formation of a party. His popular winning character only required the congenial national sphere to act in, to make itself felt; and to be in Germany was to grow and prosper. 'Martin,' says a contemporary, who is describing him at this period of his life, 'is of the middle height; cares and studies have made him so thin, that one may count all the bones in his body; yet he is in all the force and verdure of his age. His voice is clear and piercing: he is never at a loss, and has at his disposal a world of thoughts and words. In his conversation he is agreeable and easy, and there is nothing hard or austere in his air. He permits himself to enjoy the pleasures of life. In society he is gay, jocund, and unembarrassed: and possesses a perfect serenity of countenance despite of the atrocious menaces of his enemies.' The sweetness and fascination which mingled with the power of his character sent away the crowds, who came to Wittenberg from curiosity, disciples and propagandists: their reports brought other crowds, and Wittenberg became the sacred city of the new school. As the young student of a distant province caught the first sight of the spires of Wittenberg, he raised his hands to heaven and praised God that He had made the light to shine on that city, as He had before upon Sion. The disputative exhibitions of the day aided him. They kept up excitement, and supplied public and striking scenes in which Luther appeared to remarkable advantage. All the talent and literature of the day crowded to those disputations; they were the amusement of the intellectual world; people came from the greatest distances; there was a general contact of minds, and the formation of a public opinion was the result. It was at one of these scenes that Melancthon was gained. The great disputation at Leipsic brought together all the young theologians of Germany, and Luther did immense execution. Pitted greatly to his advantage against the sharpest, noisiest, most vain, impudent, and unscrupulous disputant of the age, he won at one morning many of the subsequent lights of the Reformation. Thus serviceable with respect to the mass, the same interval was equally serviceable in gaining over nobles and princes too. Luther moved in an age in which not the many but the few governed; under the surveillance of German Electors, Dukes and Landgraves, who had no interest in his doctrines except a selfish one, and who were bound to watch with some jealousy, however welcome he might be as an opponent of the Pope, the career of a popular leader and mover of masses. The moderation and caution of Luther's opening policy was just the feature to recommend him to them. Had he shown himself a mere agitator and addresser of masses, he would have stood in an unfavourable attitude towards the Courts. They would have distrusted and disliked him. Summary suppression is the frequent fate of agitators: it was the fate of John Huss and Jerome of Prague; and the German princes would probably have stood by with considerable indifference and seen Luther carried off by some Papal Envoy, had he shown himself only an agitator as those early Reformers had. But they saw in Luther the politician and the diplomatist, and they respected him. He had sympathies with Courts and Governments as well as with masses; he had obvious weight and solidity; he had the stamp of practical power upon him; he had all the appearance of one who could found, and fix, and not only preach a theology. The consequence was that they took to him. The Elector Frederick, his own sovereign, a timid and wavering man, who would have been offended at any spectacle of simple vehemence and passion, was his firm friend, and a considerable body of princes were resolved to see fair play.

The time now came when the fruits of this policy appeared, and when Luther, throwing off all disguise, and breaking fairly with the Pope, was enabled to take his stand confidently on the ground which he had made. In the April of 1521, Luther, having already committed the overt act of rebellion, and burnt the Pope's Bull publicly at Wittenberg, appeared to take his trial before the Diet of Worms. No contrast can be imagined greater than that between Luther's whole figure and position, as it actually was now, and what it would have been had any precipitancy or carelessness handed him over prematurely to the Roman power. Tried prematurely in his career, and tried at Rome, he would have stood before his Roman judges a criminal at the bar; a disturber and breaker of the peace, little more respectable than a common highwayman. As it was, he appeared more as a conqueror than a criminal; the very scene which was intended to suppress him was his greatest elevation, and his condemnation established him in the position of a successful and recognised Reformer. With a safe conduct,—in the circumstances in which he was inviolable—he presented himself secure, erect, and self-possessed: he could not be touched; he was a dignified spectator of the august ceremonial; the great man whom it really honoured; he was received in state, and treated almost like an independent potentate, within the Imperial assembly. Between his position and that of his ill-fated predecessor John Huss, there was all the difference that there is between a prisoner and a visitor: Huss went to the Diet at Prague to be tried; Luther went to Worms to pay his respects. His journey to Worms was a triumphal march. Every step brought him across some flattering marks of sympathy and respect, public and private. As he passed from town to town, burgomasters and councillors vied in their hospitality, and crowds gazed at him with wonder. On arriving at Worms, princes, nobles, and students flocked around him. He entered the hall of trial and saw his friends on all sides. The greatness of the occasion oppressed him indeed at times, and in private he had moments of that dejection and nervousness which nature itself feels when going to figure in extraordinary scenes. Simple conspicuousness is oppressive; and to sustain the full gaze of such an assembly, and go through the ordeal of question and answer, in a way which became Luther's position and pretensions, required all Luther's courage and confidence. But his real position was already made, and now he had only to act up to it: for a whole week he was pressed by the assembled Diet to recant; for a whole week he repeated his refusal. An imperial edict then placed him under the ban of the empire, and the ceremonial was over. Nobody thought of obeying the edict, and the terrible sentence which consigned him to imprisonment, and forbade anybody harbouring and feeding him, passed off as a farce. Luther, after a temporary residence in the Elector's castle at Wartburg, returned to Wittenberg, preached, wrote, published, and superintended the formation of his own Church. The next year's Diet at Nuremberg exhibited the Papal power in a state of such deplorable feebleness, that it seemed to have enough to do to fight for its own safety without aspiring to conquest. Cheregat, the Papal legate, met the assembly with language such as Rome had never before been known to use, of the most humble and sad confession. He acknowledged that the Church wanted reform, and the see of St. Peter first and principally: Rome had been guilty of profaneness, oppression, and all scandals, and reform should therefore descend from the head to the members, and purify the Church at large by purifying its centre. Elevated by this language, the Diet drew up its centum gravamina against the Roman See, and with much bitterness of tone demanded redress. A feeble call for an execution of the edict of Worms was quashed at once by several of the princes, and a prostrate Papacy gave Luther not only safety but triumph.

The war with Rome was the more easy department to him of the two. The necessity of self-restraint over, and the policy which had hitherto demanded more or less of disguise, now positively directing the most full and broad exposure of the Papacy; such an exposure as would soil and defile the prestige of ages, and accustom men to despise and trample on what they had hitherto revered; he had only to give full swing to his feeling, and let himself be carried away by the force of an at once deliberate and wild impetuosity. The controversial turn of Luther is known. It must be allowed even by his admirers that he flooded the earth with his abuse. As a controversialist, he was literally and wholly without decorum, conscience, taste, or fear. He did not know what it was to hesitate, to waver, upon an epithet or a gibe. There is no appearance in his style of his ever having once in the whole of his controversial career said to himself—Shall I say this or not? He said whatever he liked. He consulted strength alone. If that was to be bought, he refused no price. * * *

* * * * * A royal and majestic dignitary (Henry VIII. of England) engages in theological controversy with Luther, and is thus answered:—'The Lord Henry, not by the grace of God, King of England, has written in Latin against my treatise. There are some who believe that this pamphlet of the king's did not emanate from the king's own pen; but whether Henry wrote, or Hal, or the devil in hell, is nothing to the point. He who lies is a liar. My own notion about the matter is, that Henry gave out an ell or two of coarse cloth, and that then this pituitous Thomist, Lee, the follower of the Thomist herd, who in his presumption wrote against Erasmus, took scissors and made a cope of it. If a king of England spits his impudent lies in my face, I have a right in my turn to throw them back down his own throat. If he blasphemes my sacred doctrines, if he casts his filth at the throne of my Monarch, my Christ, he need not be astonished at my defiling in like manner his royal diadem, and proclaiming him, King of England though he be, a liar and a rascal. . . . He thought to himself, Luther is so hunted about, he will have no opportunity of replying to me; I need not fear to throw anything that comes first to hand in the poor monk's path. Ah! ah! my worthy Henry! you've reckoned without your host in this matter: you've had your say, and I'll have mine. You shall have truths that won't amuse you at all. I'll make you smart for your tricks. This excellent Henry accuses me of having written against the Pope out of personal hatred and ill-will; of being snarlish and quarrelsome, backbiting, proud, and so conceited, that I think myself the only man of sense in the world! I ask you, worthy Hal, what has my being conceited, snappish, and cross-grained, supposing I am so, to do with the question? Is the Papacy free from blame, because I am open to it? Is the King of England a wise man because I suppose him to be a fool? Answer me that. . . . What most surprises me is not the ignorance of this Hal of England, not that he understands less about faith and works than a log of wood, but that the devil should trouble himself to make use of this man against me. King Henry justifies the proverb, "Kings and princes are fools." I shall say very little more about him at present, for I have the Bible to translate, and other important matters to attend to: on some future occasion, God willing, when I shall be more at leisure, I will reply at greater length to this royal driveller of lies and poison. . . . I imagine that he set about his book by way of penance, for his conscience is ever smiting him for having stolen the crown of England, having made way for himself by murdering the last scion of the royal line. . . . Hal and the Pope have exactly the same legitimacy: the Pope stole his tiara, as the king his crown, and therefore it is that they are as thick together as two mules in harness.' The rage of the great monarch on being addressed with such unbounded freedom is evidently before the writer's mind here, and acts as his amusement and his stimulus. It is not difficult to see that the writer of such a passage as this was capable of higher flights in the same department,—of stronger, deeper, more passionate, virulent abuse, when it was his humour. 'Come on, pigs that you are, burn me if you dare! I am here to be seized upon,' he addresses the Thomists. 'My ashes shall pursue you after my death, though you throw them to all the winds, into all the seas. Pigs of Thomists! do what you can. Luther will be the bear in your path, the lion in your way. He will pursue you wherever you go, he will present himself incessantly before you, will leave you not a moment's peace or truce, till he has broken your iron head and your brazen front.' Luther always exerted the powers of a Comus towards his adversaries.

'Their human countenance,
The express resemblance of the gods, is changed
Into some brutish form of wolf or bear,
Or ounce, or tiger, hog, or bearded goat.'

A series of caricatures exhibited the Pope and his adherents under complex forms of brutishness, in which ass, calf, hog, ox, elephant, griffin, and fish all mingled. The 'Pope-ass and the Monk-calf,' and 'the Papal Sow,' were accompanied with explanations, that no part of the uncomplimentary symbolism might be lost. Nor, while Luther searched earth, air, sea, and sky for epithets, did he despise the commonest; he had even a prevailing bias to them as being the strongest—to one especially above all others—one invested, by universal consent, with a kind of technical and legal precedence. Luther is unsparing in decking his opponents with long ears; 'They've got their ears too long by half, with their hihau! hihau!'—(some critics had reflected on his Bible translation.) 'Tell them that Dr. Martin Luther abides by his translation, regarding a Papist and a jackass, as one and the same thing.'

But his mere sallies, after all, do not give the true idea of Luther as a vituperator; it is the constant mingling of the vituperative with the subject, whatever it be, in hand—its incorporation with his style—its unwearied and incessant flow, which astonishes; the rush is sometimes stronger, sometimes weaker; but the floodgates are always open, and invectives ever issuing from Luther's mouth. He is perfectly conscious of his own warmth, and, like a true clever man, has a rationale for it. 'I was born,' he says, 'to meet parties and demons hand to hand on the field of battle; therefore my writings are full of war and tempest. I am the rough pioneer who has to prepare the ways and level the road. But the master of arts, Philip (Melancthon) advances calmly and gently; he cultivates and he plants; he sows and he waters joyfully according to the gifts which God has made him.' As he proceeds through the Epistle to the Galatians, he sees a strong resemblance in himself to S. Paul. The Apostle occasionally uses language of strong rebuke; 'Est et nostra castigatio dura et stylus vehemens.' adds Luther. The Apostle says, 'I would they were cut off that trouble you.' 'Atrociora verba, horribilia fulmina,' remarks Luther: 'Paulus acerbissime perstringit, acerbè invehitur.' 'I, too, Martin Luther, contra Papam volo et debeo sancta superbia superbire.' He forgot that, in the first place, S. Paul uses very different language from that of Martin Luther; and in the second, that he uses that language much less frequently than Martin Luther does his. The comparison overlooks entirely what is an important feature in the case, the question of quantity. S. Paul does not anathematize false prophets in every verse of his Epistles; and an epithet of rebuke once in an Epistle, is not a precedent for an epithet of abuse many times over in a page.

The truth is—though such an explanation is no excuse—faults of temper are the natural faults accompanying strong powers of action. Luther could not have done what he did, he had not been constitutionally endowed with powers of action in the most wonderful degree: and to possess these powers was to possess a never-failing stimulus to temper. Action of all kinds is connected with, and depends more or less on, the element of passion in the human mind. That necessary state of desire in the mind which all action supposes, in order to account for itself and explain its own origin, is of the nature of passion: and therefore in literal truth no human being can act at all without some passion in him to make him: he cannot walk or talk, move hand or arm, bend joint or sinew without it; he cannot open the door or shut it, or step from one corner of the room to the other but by means of this element in his nature: and passion is the electric or magnetic power which sets every thing within him in motion, and makes him the acting creature he is.

Humility.

HUMILITY is the great ornament and jewel of the Christian religion; that, whereby it is distinguished from all the wisdom of the world: it not having been taught by the wise men of the Gentiles, but first put into a disciple, and made part of a religion, by our Lord Jesus Christ, Who propounded Himself imitable by His disciples so signally in nothing, as in the twin-sisters of meekness and humility. Learn of Me, for I am meek and humble; and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

For all the world, all that we are and all that we have, our bodies and our souls, our actions and our sufferings, our conditions at home, our accidents abroad, our many sins and our seldom virtues, are so many arguments to make our souls dwell low in the deep valleys of humility.

ACTS OR OFFICES OF HUMILITY.

5. Never be ashamed of thy birth, or thy parents, or thy trade, or thy present employment, for the meanness or poverty of any of them; and when there is an occasion to speak of them, such an occasion as would invite you to speak of anything that pleases you, omit it not, but speak as readily and indifferently of thy meanness as of thy greatness. Primislaus, the first king of Bohemia, kept his country shoes always by him, to remember from whence he was raised: and Agathocles, by the furniture of his table, confessed, that from a potter, he was raised to be the king of Sicily.

16. Be not always ready to excuse every oversight, or indiscretion, or ill action: but if thou beest guilty of it, confess it plainly: for virtue scorns a lie for its cover: but to hide a sin with it, is like a crust of leprosy drawn upon an ulcer. If thou beest not guilty, (unless it be scandalous,) be not over earnest to remove it, but rather use it as an argument to chastise all greatness of fancy and opinion in thyself; and accustom thyself to bear reproof patiently and contentedly, and the harsh words of thy enemies, as knowing that the anger of an enemy is a better monitor, and represents our faults, or admonishes us of our duty with more heartiness, than the kindness does, or precious balms of a friend.

MEANS AND EXERCISES FOR OBTAINING AND INCREASING THE GRACE OF HUMILITY.

1. Make confession of your sins often to God; and consider what all that evil amounts to, which you then charge upon yourself. Look not upon them as scattered in the course of long life; now, an intemperate anger, then, too full a meal; now idle talking, and another time, impatience: but unite them into one continued representation, and remember, that he whose life seems fair, by reason that his faults are scattered at large distances in the several parts of his life, yet, if all his errors and follies were article against him, the man would seem vicious and miserable: and possibly this exercise, really applied upon thy spirit, may be useful.

2. Remember that we usually disparage others upon slight grounds and little instances; and towards them one fly is enough to spoil a whole box of ointment: and if a man be highly commended, we think him sufficiently lessened, if we class our sin of folly or infirmity into his account. Let us, therefore, be just to ourselves, since we are so severe to others, and consider, that whatsoever good any one can think or say of us, we can tell him of hundreds of base and unworthy, and foolish actions, any one of which were enough (we hope) to destroy another's reputation; therefore, let so many be sufficient to destroy our over-high thoughts of ourselves.

9. Often meditate upon the effects of pride, on one side, and humility on the other. First, That pride is like a canker, and destroys the beauty of the fairest flowers, the most excellent gifts and graces; but humility crowns them all. Secondly, That pride is a great hindrance to the perceiving the things of God; and humility is an excellent preparation and instrument of spiritual wisdom. Thirdly, That pride hinders the acceptance of our prayers; but 'humility pierceth the clouds, and will not depart till the Most High shall regard.' Fourthly, That humility is but a speaking truth, and all pride is a lie.

Lent.

It belongs to the Pastoral, rather than the Editorial, office to enforce the solemn observance of the Church's Holy Seasons. A few passing words, however, upon these practical topics may be of use.

Aside from the undoubted authority which this solemn Fast may claim, as an observance so ancient that it was among the usages of the Primitive Church, when her Faith was uncorrupted and her practice pure; it also appeals to the sober judgment of men, as a wise and merciful provision for the wants and infirmities of "our mortal nature." All experience proves the necessity of appointed seasons, when by greater diligence and devotion to our religious duties, and by more careful retirement from worldly pleasures and indulgences, we may invite those renewing influences of the Holy Spirit, whereby our spiritual life is nourished and strengthened, and "we grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." In the appointment of an annual Season, for these solemn ends, the Church attests her sense of human necessity resulting from mortal weakness. And none who know themselves can say, that this is too frequent a recurrence of a season appointed for such a use. In placing this season immediately before the Memorial Day, which records a Saviour's "agony and bloody sweat," His "cross and passion," the Church would bring the mightiest motives to bear upon the hearts of Her members by which they can be moved to repentance, faith, and obedience. By more rigorous self-examination, by more constant meditation upon the mysteries and glories of Redemption as revealed in the word of God, by more instant prayer in public and private, by more careful abstinence from all indulgences and pleasures which "war against the soul," would She, the faithful Witness and Keeper of God's truth, win our sinful hearts to "set their affections on things above," and to "turn from dead works to serve the LIVING GOD."

A solemn voice of mourning should now be lifted up from a sorrowing world—sorrowing over that sin which reared a cross, and wove a crown of thorns, for the ONLY BEGOTTEN SON of GOD. An earnest cry of supplication should now be raised from a world looking to a crucified Redeemer, and asking for pardon and mercy in and through Him. Deeper abhorrence of sin, more anxious strivings after holiness, firmer resolutions, higher, nobler, holier purposes of life, with greater readiness to sacrifice self, to deny all but Christ, to surrender all to Him, should now be fixed in the hearts of those who are looking, with the sorrow of penitence and the joy of Faith, to the Cross of Calvary! If such feelings and impressions be excited and strengthened in our hearts, by the observance of this "Lenten Fast," then will we not be tempted, as some are even now tempted, to ask those questions of ancient faithlessness, "What profit is it that we have kept His ordinance, and that we have walked mournfully before the LORD of Hosts?"

To these more general observations we would add a few more particular statements concerning "the object and proper observance of the Holy Season of Lent," taken from the Rev. Dr. Kip's excellent work entitled "the Lenten Fast." If such commendation were needed we would earnestly recommend this admirable treatise as a book for the season.

The fast of Lent, (a Saxon word, signifying the Spring,) is of forty days continuance, during the six weeks which precede Easter. As however the Sundays are Festivals, and must therefore be excepted, only thirty-six days are left. To make up this deficiency, four days are added at the beginning, commencing with Ash-Wednesday, which derives its name from the ashes which in the ancient Church were at this time thrown upon the penitents, whose sins had debarred them from a participation in her services. "On the first day of Lent," says Gratian, in describing this ceremony, "the penitents were to present themselves before the Bishop, clothed with sack-cloth, with naked feet, and eyes turned to the ground; and this was to be done in the presence of the principal of the Clergy of the Diocese, who were to judge of the sincerity of their repentance. These introduced them into the Church, where the Bishop, all in tears, and the rest of the Clergy, repeated the seven penitential psalms. Then rising from prayers, they threw ashes upon them, and covered their heads with sack-cloth; and then, with mournful sighs declared to them, that as Adam was thrown out of Paradise, so they must be thrown out of the Church. Then the Bishop commanded the officers to turn them from the Church doors." Severe indeed this discipline may seem; yet in an age when the minds of men were reached only by striking appeals to the outward senses, we cannot tell how much these ceremonies may have availed to keep alive the purity of the Church, and to impress upon the careless multitude, the value of admission to her services.

All record of the precise time in which this season first originated, is lost in the dim obscurity of the early ages of the Church.

The Lenten Fast is however frequently referred to by writers of primitive days as an established and well known custom, which had been sanctioned by Apostolical authority. The probability is, that even from the first—from the time in which "the Bridegroom was taken away"—His followers thus in sorrow kept the anniversary of His Passion, although the duration of this season, and the rules by which its observance was regulated, may not have been definitely settled until the age immediately succeeding that of the Apostles. Philo, who was cotemporary with the early disciples, and is even said "to have had familiar conversation with Peter at Rome, whilst he was proclaiming the Gospel to the inhabitants of that city," refers to this season in his description of the Christians of Alexandria, who were converted by St. Mark. "This author,"—says Eusebius, in his history composed about A. D. 324—"has accurately described and stated in his writings, the exercises performed by them," (i. e. the Christians of Alexandria in the days of St. Mark,) "which are still in vogue among us at the present day, and especially at the festival of our Saviour's passion, which we are accustomed to pass in fasting and watching, and in the study of the divine word. These are the same customs that are observed by us alone at the present day, particularly the vigils of the Great Festival," meaning by this the Passion week, called by the Greek Fathers the "Great Week."

It is also mentioned incidentally by Irenæus, who lived but ninety years after the death of St. John, and was trained up under the martyr Polycarp, who had himself been a disciple of that last surviving Apostle. When alluding to a difference of opinion with regard to the time in which it should be kept, he shows that the custom itself was ancient, even in his day. His words are: "This diversity existing among those that observe it, is not a matter that has just sprung up in our time, but long ago, among those before us."

Tertullian too, who lived within one hundred years of the Apostle St. John's departure, has unwittingly as it were, recorded his testimony to the general belief of the Church in the Apostolical Authority of this season.

The first Christian Emperor Constantine, immediately after the meeting of the earliest general council of the Church—that held at Nice, A. D. 325—and which was composed, to use his own words, "of all the Bishops, or the greater part of them at least, assembled together," wrote a letter to all the Churches, on the necessity of observing Easter upon the same day. His argument is, that unless this uniformity exists, some will be rejoicing in that Festival, while others are still mourning in the fasts which precede it. "It is fit therefore,"—he says—"that we should perpetuate to all future ages the celebration of this rite, which we have kept from the first day of our Lord's passion even to the present times. . . . For the Saviour has bequeathed to us one festal day of our liberation, that is, the day of His most holy passion; and it was His pleasure that His Church should be one; the members of which, although dispersed in many and various places, are yet nourished by the same Spirit, that is, by the will of God. Let the sagacity of your holiness only consider how painful and indecorous it must be, for some to be experiencing the rigors of abstinence, and others to be unbending their minds in convivial enjoyment on the same day; and after Easter, for some to be indulging in feasting and relaxation while others are occupied in the observance of the prescribed fasts."

To give a single reference more—and they might be multiplied to a great extent—this season is mentioned in the Apostolic Canons, a code of laws which certainly dates its authority from a very early age. "If,"—says the 61st Canon—"any Bishop, Priest, Deacon, Reader, or Singer, do not keep the Holy Fast of Lent, forty days before Easter, or the Wednesdays and Fridays, let him be deposed, if he be not hindered by some bodily infirmity; but if he be a layman, let him be suspended from communion."

Thus, we perceive, that this custom took not its rise amidst the corruptions of the Dark Ages, but began in times of light and holiness. We received it not from the Romish Church, when it had fallen from ancient purity, but it comes down to us from Primitive days. It was sanctioned by Apostolical authority, or certainly at least by those who lived before the example and instruction of Apostles had been in any respect forgotten. The early Christians, as we have already seen stated by Tertullian, considered our Divine Master as referring to the observance of some such season, when he said, "Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? But the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." At first, the time of its observance varied in different Churches and among different individuals, although all agreed in the necessity of thus commemorating in some way, their Lord's sufferings and death. At length, however, its duration was fixed at forty days, which has since, through all the intervening centuries, continued to be the uniform custom of the Church.

The number forty seems very anciently to have been appropriated to seasons of repentance and fasting. "This quadragesimal number"—says St. Ambrose, in his 36th sermon—"is not constituted of men, but consecrated from God." For this term of years were the children of Israel disciplined in the wilderness, to prepare them for the promised land. For forty days did Moses fast on the mount—Elijah in the wilderness—and the Ninevites, when they would avert the judgments prophesied by Jonah. It was this length of time that our Lord himself was pleased to fast, during His temptation in the desert, and from His example was this period probably fixed, "that,"—as St. Augustine says—"we might, as far as we are able, conform to Christ's practice, and suffer with Him here, that we may reign with Him hereafter."

And we may learn too from a single passage in St. Basil's Second Homily on Fasting, how universal throughout the world was the attention of the early Christians to this solemn portion of the Ecclesiastical year. "In this time of Lent, there is no island nor continent of the earth, no city, nor nation, no extreme corner of the world, where the Edict of this Fast of Lent was not heard. Yea, whatsoever armies, merchants, travellers, or mariners are abroad, this fast comes unto them all, and with joy they all receive it. This composes every house, every city, and every people, in sobriety and quiet and concord. This stills the late clamors, contentions, and noises of the town. Let no one therefore exempt himself from the number of fasters, in which every degree, nation and age almost of men, and all of all dignities whatsoever are engaged."

We reserve for our next paper some remarks, with further extracts from the book now quoted, on the proper observance of "the Holy Season of Lent." In this connection we commend to our readers the extracts, from Bishop Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying," found in another column. This in our esteem, is one of the best Manuals not only for this holy season, but for all the seasons of the Christian Life.

Foreign Intelligence.

The last Steamer brought the saddest news which could come from the Church of England at this time, an account of the death of the venerable Archbishop of Canterbury. Full of years, and laden with honors, he has gone to his blessed rest, from a world of disturbance, at a time when the Branch of Christ's Church militant, over which he presided, was threatened with danger, and agitated by unusual excitement. How far his serene and gentle spirit was affected by the recent events in England, and whether it was thus made to take "wings like a dove," and "flee away and be at rest," to "escape because of the stormy wind and tempest," we know not. For this saint and dignified Prelate's death, his dearest friends can feel only the sadness which disturbs the heart, when the loved and valued are removed from our earthly sight, and we miss their blessed companionship in a world more desolate by their loss.

The heaviest sorrow falls upon an afflicted Church, which has lost, in her hour of need, the wisdom and influence of one in whom she trusted with well-founded confidence. The pilot who has guided her through many a storm, has been struck down at the helm, in the very midst of a tempest! She now must look to that Mightier One in Whose guidance she will have a better trust, and Who alone can say to the troubled elements "Peace, be still!" The sorrow of this present loss is also increased by fears for the future, and dread lest those who have shown such hostility and disregard to the interests and wishes of the Church, may, in their day of power, use this new opportunity of appointment still more to her disadvantage. But it is to be hoped the lessons of the past may make them wiser for the future.

It will be hard, with the best intentions, to find one to fill the place of Dr. Howley. Holy and blameless in life, sound in doctrine, wise, temperate and firm in counsel, he was admirably fitted for his high and trying post. He was the very impersonation of grace and dignity. For ten days alarming bulletins were issued by the medical attendants, and on Friday, February 11th, the Venerable Archbishop expired, at a quarter past 2 o'clock—"His last moments," says the Times, "were most tranquil, and he was in possession, to within a very short time of his dissolution, of all his faculties." He was born the 12th of February, 1765, so that in another day he would have attained his 83d year. We shall give a more particular account of his life in another number.

DR. HAMPDEN.—In this case, which through the new calamity, has lost its prominence, a decision or rather a "no decision," was made in the Court of Queen's Bench on Tuesday, February 1st. No mandamus was granted, as the Judges were equally divided in opinion. JUSTICE COLERIDGE and JUSTICE PATTESON being in favor of granting it, and CHIEF JUSTICE DENMAN and JUSTICE ERLE against it.

The "English Churchman" says, "that a cause of such magnitude should end in a drawn battle, is really after all, not only as much as—but much more than—we had a right to expect."

"The Morning Chronicle" says—"The decision of yesterday is formally as well as virtually, no decision. There is no mandamus—and that is all. The result is strictly and abso-tely a negative one. There is no mandamus merely because the judges cannot make up their minds how the law of the case stands. The court is equally divided—two against two, the rule nisi falls to the ground. All that this court can do to say, that the argument for doing something and for doing nothing, balance one another, and therefore nothing can be done. The “ayes” and “noes” being equal, the status quo has it.” Nevertheless the English Churchman says, “Dr. Hampden will probably be consecrated on Sunday, certainly not by the Archbishop, whose state of health gives rise to the gravest anticipations.”

We have shown how those grave anticipations have been fulfilled.

ORDINATION AND CONFIRMATION.—On Quinquagesima Sunday the Rt. Rev. Dr. Potter held an ordination and confirmation in the Church of the Ascension, Philadelphia. Mr. Richard S. Trapier was admitted to the holy order of Deacons. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. Williams, and the Lessons read by the Rev. J. M. Douglass, Presbyters of the diocese. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. The candidate was presented by the Rev. F. Ogilby, Rector of the Church of the Ascension. The Bishop was assisted in the Communion Service by the Rev. Dr. Lyons. The Rev. Wm. Hinds, of Philadelphia, was also present.

The Rev. Mr. Trapier, who has served for 17 years in our navy, it is understood, will have the charge of the Floating Church for Seamen, about to be erected in this port. We congratulate “the Churchmen’s Missionary Association for Seamen” in having secured the services of one so well qualified to carry out their admirable designs.

Twelve persons were confirmed, including one in private. Several candidates being prevented from attending by illness, the Bishop will hold a second confirmation during the year.

North Carolina.

On Septuagesima Sunday the Bishop of North Carolina, in St. Bartholomew’s Church, Pittsboro’, admitted to the holy order of Priests, the Rev. John Roberts. The Rev. Messrs. Hubbard and Olmstead being present and conducting Morning Prayer.

Gothic Architecture.

Two lectures (with numerous illustrations) will be delivered on the ancient ecclesiastical architecture of England, at the Academy of Fine Arts, Chesnut street, on Thursday the 9th, and Saturday the 11th, at half-past 7 o’clock, P. M., by Frank Wills, Architect of Fredericton Cathedral, the proposed College Buildings, Burlington, N. J., &c.

Tickets one dollar each for two lectures, 50 cents for single lecture, are to be procured at the Lecture Room.

SKETCH OF MR. WILLS’ LECTURES ON ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHITECTURE.—1st Lecture.—The importance of the study of architecture generally, (expressing as it does the mind and religion of a people) having been pointed out, the lecturer proceeded once to his subject: There are no remains extant of ancient British Churches built before the Saxon era; from the rude sketches of those preserved in manuscript, it is evident they were simple in form and inexpensive in construction. The Saxons, under Alfred and Athelstan, erected stone Churches, remains of which are still to be found in Northamptonshire and other parts of England; they evidently imitated, in a clumsy way, the Roman buildings, which must have been by no means few in number in those days. William the Conqueror introduced the Norman style into the country—its peculiarities; the regular headed arch, the deep and nicely carved doorways, the simplicity of the windows, and the characteristic arcading, were shown by various illustrations. About the end of the reign of John, the pointed arch is seen combined with the semicircular; a transition from the latter to the former consummated in the reign of Henry III. The three styles of Pointed Architecture, namely, the Early English, the Decorated and the Perpendicular, were then treated in detail, and illustrated by numerous drawings. The decay of Gothic Architecture was evident before the Reformation; this we see in the lack of true science in the construction—in the flat roof, and in the depressed arches. Henry VIII., by his wholesale and wanton destruction of the monasteries, accelerated the downfall of the ancient art more than did the principles of Cranmer and the other Reformers. After the historical sketch, Mr. Wills proceeded to show that the great secret of the superiority of the ancient buildings over modern ones was, that in early days “men learnt to build well before finely,” and that the simplicity, yet reality, of the village churches, was far preferable to the ingenious devices of modern sham decoration.

The first lecture having embraced the details of Christian architecture, the second was directed to the combination and arrangement of these details. And first, the important distinctions between a Cathedral and a Parish Church, were pointed out: the two were built with a different intent, the services to be celebrated therein not being similar. In one the prayers of a few simple peasants, and not more than one or two priests, were offered up to God; in the other thousands knelt before the Lord, their Maker; Anthems and Alleluias were constantly ascending to Heaven. Priests were ordained there, Bishops consecrated, and Monarchs crowned. The one was the Church of a Parish, the other the Church of every parish in the diocese.

Lincoln Cathedral was considered as the best example of English Cathedrals, and by the help of a large ground plan, the lecturer was enabled to point out the position and use of the various portions which make the mighty whole. The Parish Church of England, from the simple Nave and Chancel, to the Cruciform with its Transepts and Aisles, was also described. The important subject of painted windows, and the decoration of walls with diapering and texts, instead of a miserable imitation of stone, was also slightly touched upon, as was also the true way of adapting ancient principle to modern practice.

HONOR TO THE ILLUSTRIOUS DEAD.—The remains of the venerable ex-president Adams were conveyed through this city on Tuesday. A large body of Clergy, of all denominations, joined the funeral procession, which escorted the body of this good and great man to its brief repose, in an appropriate resting place, the Hall where his Father united with other patriots in signing the Declaration of Independence.

There was a simplicity, in all the arrangements on this occasion, befitting the character of the departed. And there was a tribute of feeling which told that a grateful people came forth in crowds, not to see a funeral show, but to do homage to one who deserved well of his country. In noticing the just honor paid to this veteran statesman, we feel that we are not violating our invariable rule of not bringing into the columns of this paper any political or party feelings. All such had lost their bitterness towards this venerable man, even before death had completely subdued them. For fifty years he has served his country faithfully in public life. His death was such as he must have desired. He fell at his post, saying “this is the end of earth.” He died in the Capitol—and his ashes are borne, in continuous funeral procession for hundreds of miles, to their last resting-place.

We record with deep regret the death of the Venerable Dr. Lyell, Rector of Christ Church, New York, in which city he was the oldest settled Rector. He died on Sunday last. We are not informed of the particulars regarding the death of this esteemed and faithful minister of Christ.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—We take the following from the “Londonderry Sentinel.”

The Rev. George Scott acknowledges to have received for the poor in the parish of Balteagh, £5 4s. from Indiana Missionaries, by the hands of Bishop Kemper, and the Rev. S. R. Johnson, sent by the Rev. Frederick Ogilby.

NEW AGENTS.—The Rev. E. M. VAN DEUSEN has very kindly consented to act as Agent for the “Banner” in Wilmington, Delaware; and BENJAMIN E. ROPER, Esq., at Galveston, Texas.

New Publications.

THE SPIRIT OF MISSIONS, March 1848.—A number filled with interesting information. We are less anxious to extract from this Periodical, because we think it ought to be taken by every member of the church. Besides the usual full accounts of our own Domestic and Foreign Missionary operations, there is in this number an excellent article, giving most interesting information concerning “Missions of the Church of England.”

Contributions for Domestic Missions, from Jan. 15th to Feb. 15th, $1,850 38.

For Foreign Missions during same time, $7134 29.

THE TRUE CATHOLIC.—Reformed Protestant and Free, edited by a layman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, with the approbation of the Bishop of Maryland. March, 1848. Baltimore, Joseph Robinson, 117 Baltimore Street.

The judgment which has been often expressed in the Banner, of this most valuable of our Church periodicals, is unchanged. We consider it of great importance that the Church should have the benefit of the widest possible circulation of this sound and ably conducted monthly paper. In a notice from the publishers, those readers who regard the continuance and extension of the work as desirable, are earnestly asked to make “AN EFFORT AT THE PRESENT TIME TO INCREASE THE SUBSCRIPTION LIST.” We sincerely hope such an appeal will not be in vain, not only for the sake of those engaged in this useful work, but for the Church’s sake.

“THE THREE DEGREES OF LIFE:” their nature, order, culture. An Address delivered before the Societies of Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa., on the evening preceding the annual commencement, by the Rev. William M. Carmichael, D. D., Rector of Christ Church, Meadville. Published by Request.

We hail with pleasure every new evidence that the Clergy of the church are manifesting an interest in the great practical work of education, viewed in its enlarged and true aspect, as embracing the culture of all that composes MAN.

The scope of the able and excellent “address” above named, may be gathered from Dr. Carmichael’s definition of his subject “the three degrees of Life.” “The first of these is called the natural, the second, the spiritual, the third, the celestial property or element of human life.” * * * “The first is used to designate the body and its functions, the second, the mind and its operations; the third, the heart and its affections, including the will and conscience, sometimes termed by way of eminence the moral sense.”

The phase which each of these assumes in its progress from infancy to youth, from youth to manhood, from manhood to age, and thence onward through all the mazes of its endless course beyond the confines of the tomb, may, very properly, receive the superior name of LIFE. For life it is; life natural or physical; life mental or spiritual; life celestial or eternal; and yet all these centre in one and the same being, in different degrees at different periods of time, from the first hour of its advent here, until the dissolution of its earthly ties, when it will assume another form, and be so “clothed upon, that mortality shall be forever swallowed up of life.” 2 Cor. v. 4.

A noble theme for a Christian teacher addressing young men at this interesting period of life! And Dr. Carmichael has in this address, faithfully and ably sustained his high position as a witness of “the whole truth.” We have marked one or two passages for our paper, which will show the character of this address, and serve the great cause which it so faithfully advocates.

THE FADING AND THE UNFADING.—Discourses on the occasion of the decease of Adeline Haskins, wife of the Rector of St. Mark’s Church, Williamsburgh, L. I. Published at the request of the Wardens and Vestrymen.

Three discourses, by the Rev. C. Clapp, Rev. W. H. Lewis, and the Rev. S. R. Johnson, recording the memory of departed worth, soothing the affliction of the bereaved, impressing upon the hearts of the living, the holy and solemn lessons to be learned by a Christian’s death.

LITTELL’S LIVING AGE, Boston, E. Littell & Co., 165 Tremont Street—Philadelphia, Zieber & Co. This admirable republication of selections from all the best and choicest periodicals, is always a welcome visitor. A most excellent taste and judgment are always displayed, in the selection of articles for instruction and entertainment. At the cheap cost of $6 per annum, it furnishes the choicest articles from the most valuable Foreign and Home Publications.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.—A most interesting letter on the Religious state of Ireland “from a distinguished Clergyman of the Church of Ireland has been received, and shall appear in our next number.”

Self Discipline.

The following extract from Dr. Forbes’ sermon before “the Associate Alumni of the General Theological Seminary,” affords practical teaching appropriate to the solemn season upon which we have just entered.

Admitting, then that this is the system of the Church; a system based upon antiquity, and illustrated by the Apostles in their own practice, it may here be naturally asked, how it may be carried out amongst ourselves—what are its leading details, and what might we hope would be its results?

All-important as are those questions, I can here but imperfectly answer them, and attempt only rudely to sketch out the more prominent parts of such a system. And in doing this, let me add, that I regard myself much in the light of one walking with you through some ancient library, and here and there taking down from its shelves some neglected volume, from which to gather at least a portion of its forgotten wisdom.

The first thing, then, that would seem to be essential in a practical system like this, is a deep sense of accountability to God—to realize, as far as we may, and to employ all means for this, that we have an account to settle with God; that our whole life at the last day, is to be brought under review; that every thought, and word, and act is to be scrutinized; and that upon the results of this scrutiny will depend our everlasting welfare or woe.

Secondly, To determine to deal honestly with ourselves, not to blind conscience but to enlighten it; to desire to see ourselves as God sees us; to know the worst of ourselves now; to dare to examine our lives, to question the sincerity of our professions, to scrutinize our motives, and to be ready to endure any pain or to make any sacrifice, so only we may avert the wrath, and secure the favor of God.

Thirdly, To begin to live by rule, not to leave to accident the course of our lives, but to endeavour to regulate and direct them; and this, by some such definite acts as the following:

Stated private prayer, in the morning, in the evening, and at noon-day.

Daily meditation upon some short portion of God’s word; and this, in union with mental prayer; such meditation always being, not to improve ourselves in learning nor to gratify curiosity, but to hold communion with God, through his Word, and to quicken the Divine Life in our souls.

To use watchfulness in all our actions during the day, that no word may be spoken, or deed done, nor if possible, thought entertained, that may cause sorrow to our souls at night, and need to be blotted out with tears.

To make God’s glory the one end and aim of all we do; and for this purpose to avoid all self-seeking and self-pleasing—the curse and crying-sin of our day—remembering always that we have a Master in Heaven, whose we are, and whom we are bound to obey.

The Angel.

BY THE REV. RALPH HOYT.

Was heard, 'tis said, one tranquil eve,
A low, sad voice along the sky !
(Alas, can heavenly natures grieve,
Can holy angels weep on high,
And sinless seraphs learn to sigh ?)

There spread a cloud of golden hue
And curtained day's declining light :
Down floating from the distant blue
It came with strange mysterious flight,
A summer cloud serene and bright.

A form upon celestial wings !
Wherever pressed her glittering feet
Came gushing forth from hidden strings
Soft music earth can ne'er repeat,
Melodious concords passing sweet !

She paused, and on a sunbeam stood,
Above a gently sloping hill ;
Mute wonder fell on field, and wood,
The gurgling brook and gleesome rill ;
And e'en the warbling birds were still.

But that sad voice along the sky
Yet burdened all the passing gale ;
Ah ! do the loved in heaven die,
Doth hope in those fair regions fail ?
Sweet Angel, why that plaintive wail ?

She gazed o'er all the haunts of men,
And saw how sorrow's fountains flow :
Gay city, or secluded glen,
No refuge from the certain blow,
The cruel wound, the hopeless wo.

Amid the proud voluptuous throng
Mourned many a breaking heart alone,
Crushed in the grasp of want and wrong,
The sordid world all heedless grown ;
Ah, heartless earth ! Ah, world of stone !

The captive pining in his chain,
The famished vainly asking bread ;
Sad partings ne'er to meet again,
Love's rose that once sweet odors shed,
In youth's bright path, perfumeless, dead !

O'er field and hill, by wave and coast,
A shout of furious onset rose,
The shock of many a mighty host,
The struggle of defiant foes
Met in terrific battle throes !

How red the rivulets shall be ;
How weltering all the rural plain ;
To mingle there that sanguine sea,
How many a heart its ruddy rain
In that wild strife will pour—in vain !

She saw where by the pallet side,
While orphan babes unconscious slept,
A scanty pittance to provide
The widow toilsome vigil kept,
And in her watching ceaseless wept.

The weary stranger sought for rest,
(Ah, who the goal hath ever won ?)
No door was opened for a guest,
None wished the pilgrim's journey done :
Nor made life's race less sad to run !

From rugged labor's earnest hand
Uprose the palace, teemed the soil ;
And navies launched at his command,
For lordly Indolence a spoil ;
Ah, hapless, unrequited Toil !

How many a generous bosom burned,
With all sublime aspirings fraught,
Yet ever found its fervor spurned :
Rich with the jewelry of thought,
Yet all its worth accounted Nought.

Where mournful sighed a maniac maid,
No lover's voice in music spoke,
Confiding innocence—betrayed !
Poor heart, what anguish in the stroke
When it could bear no more—and broke !

Where lay a babe in death's cold sleep
A mother knelt in mad despair ;
Alas ! the slumber was too deep,
The spirit heeded not her prayer ;
The cherub was no longer there !

With feeble hand deserted Age
Was tracing in his sightless gloom
This one sad line for that last page,
That page of stone above his tomb ;
Forsaken ! O ye Dead, make room !

Thus gazing o'er the haunts of men,
She saw how sorrow's fountains flow ;
Gay city, or secluded glen,
Still all resistless falls the blow,
The cruel wound, the hopeless wo.

For this upon that tranquil eve,
Came that sad voice along the sky ;
For these that heavenly one could grieve,
That Angel from the realms on high,
With hastening wing came down to sigh.

She wept, and on the sunbeam shed
Celestial tears, divinely blest ;
Swift o'er the sky bright rainbows spread :
Earth saw, and every mournful breast
With holy solace sank to rest.

But that sad voice along the sky
Yet lingers on the passing gale,
For sorrow's fount is never dry,
And still where'er its streams prevail
Sweet Pity pours her plaintive wail.

Selections.

From the Quarterly Review.

Memoir of the Life of Elizabeth Fry. Edited by two of her daughters. Vol. I. 8vo. London, 1847.

We do not disguise the increasing hesitation with which we receive biographies founded on private notes and diaries that record, or seem to do so, the thoughts and struggles of the inmost heart. Any one of eminence, in the present day, who commits these things to paper, must do so under the full conviction that, like Castor and Pollux, as he himself sets, his journals will rise ; and that whatever he has written in his closet will be proclaimed on the house-tops. Such a prospect of envied or unenvied fame cannot but give a tinge to the sentiments and language ; cause the insertion of some incidents and reflections, and the suppression of others ; bring forward art at the expense of nature ; and, in short, prompt every one to wear his best for the eyes of posterity. The autobiography included in the present work must, however, be considered as in great measure exempt from this criticism. The larger proportion of it was written in early days, before journalizing had been reduced to a system, and secret cogitations forced into notoriety, like reluctant speakers of old into the chair of the commons. Yet, while the stamp of originality remains, we discern the traces of a revising hand—a hand guided by the experience and feelings of maturer years, which apparently has spared in candor much that it might otherwise have been wished to erase, and retouched the remainder, far less in vanity than in graceful timidity, so soon as Mrs. Fry had perceived beyond a doubt that, alive or dead, in true or false colors, she was destined to afford a repast to the public appetite. In truth, however, we should be loath to subject this publication to any ordinary criticism ; it deals with common life, and yet soars above it ; associates with man, and yet walks with God ; never so elevated as when grovelling in the mire, it exhibits a career that cannot be surpassed—but which, we venture to add, ought not in all its parts to be generally followed.

That this admirable woman had a special vocation for the office she undertook is manifest in every step of her progress ; her intellectual constitution was singularly adapted to the peculiar task : add to this the zeal which governed the whole, an enthusiasm regulated but never chilled by judgment ;—and we have a character armed at all points, ready to take up the gauntlet of every conceivable obstacle that could impede her in the accomplishment of her great design. Among subordinate, yet very real advantages, we cannot fail to count the success she derived from her connection with the Society of Friends. A little eccentricity of action was considered permissible, and even natural, in the member of a body already recognized as eccentric in opinions, eccentric in dress, eccentric in language. Philanthropy, too, had been the distinguishing characteristic of this respectable brotherhood ; a devoted effort for the interest of mankind passed in one of them without censure—almost without observation. The quaker-habit and quaker-renown disarmed hostility, nay, propitiated favor ; it secured the first introduction to magistrates, to nobles, to ministers, to emperors. When so much was effected, the rest was sure : her simple dignity of demeanor, her singularly musical voice, her easy, unaffected language, the fit vehicle of her unflinching good sense, her earnest piety and unmistakable disinterestedness, enchaind the most reluctant ; and to every cabinet and court of Europe where religion and humanity could be maintained or advanced, she obtained ready admission as a herald of peace and charity.

But, we must repeat, we take her as the exception, not as the rule. The high and holy duties assigned to women by the decrees of Providence are essentially of a secret and retiring nature ; it is in the privacy of the closet that the soft, yet sterling, wisdom of the Christian mother stamps those impressions on the youthful heart, which, though often defaced, are seldom wholly obliterated. Whatever tends to withdraw her from these sacred offices, or even abate their full force and efficacy, is high treason against the hopes of a nation. We do not deny that valuable services may be safely, and indeed are safely, rendered by many intelligent and pious ladies who devote their hours of leisure or recreation to the Rarotogas and Tahitis of British Christendom—it is not to such that we would make allusion ; our thoughts are directed to that total absorption which, plunging women into the vortex of eccentric and self-imposed obligations, merges the private in the public duty, confounds what is principal with that which is secondary, and withdraws them from labors which they alone can accomplish, to those in which at least they may be equalled by others. We may question whether, even here in the instance before us, the indulgence of a special and manifest superiority was not sometimes purchased by the postponement, or delegation to substitutes, of those minute and unostentatious offices which constitute the order, the preciousness, nay, the life itself of domestic discipline. Much, no doubt, was easy, and also permitted, to a lady whose notions and habits were founded on the practice of female ministration in matters ecclesiastical. It is beside our purpose to examine the scriptural legality or social expediency of such a system : we glance at it now, merely to show the very peculiar circumstances which fitted her, from her earliest years, for her public task.

Elizabeth Gurney was born of an ancient and honorable race in the county of Norfolk. Her own immediate family, having maintained the highest respectability for many generations, has latterly become conspicuous by all the gifts of talent, munificence, and piety. To the care and understanding of their admirable mother (and is it not always so ?) must be ascribed the development of their moral and intellectual capacities ; the future character of Elizabeth owed not a little to that parent's thoughtfulness and providential discipline—the unwearied patience, the chastened sensibility, the habit of prayer, and expansive love to all God's works, that shone so eminently throughout her career. She piously acknowledges the filial debt in a short memoir, (p. 7,) which is well worthy of perusal, not only as illustrative of the disposition of the writer, but for the singularly sensible and appropriate remarks on the minute and considerate care required in the education of children. Much in it recalls the early history of William Cowper, and exhibits the almost inconceivable sufferings endured by youthful susceptibility and imagination, the sources of genius, but oftentimes the elements of sorrow. Here is the special province for the action of the discriminating mother ; and, doubtless, had the infancy of that exquisite poet been longer blessed by the tender guidance of his own admirable parent, his spirit might have assumed in some measure the practical character of Elizabeth Fry, and preyed less fiercely and systematically on itself.

Every page of her early journal exhibits the traces of this first direction to her juvenile thoughts. The desire of personal usefulness, though for some time feeble and indistinct, runs like a vein through all her reflections and aspirations. She exhausts herself in conflicts, in hopes, and in fears ; proves her heart like Solomon's with mirth, and finds it vanity ; braves sacrifices, conjures up doubts, and finally embraces the realities of gospel truth as the only assurance for herself, and the exclusive instrument for the lasting welfare of mankind. Every reader will be struck by the precocity she exhibits of mental power, and ascribe the originality of her remarks less to her experience of others than to her study of herself. It was the clear perception of her own weakness that brought her to the "one thing needful," and which gives a catholic value to the whole, as a guide and prop to those who may hereafter tread the thorny path of moral and social benevolence. We are amused, we confess, by her struggles with Quakerism, and her ultimate surrender to a pedantic system, by which her inner being could never be ruled. Though a member of a sect, she in truth was no sectarian.

The second period of Mrs. Fry's history may fairly be dated from her first adventure to survey those scenes of degradation and neglect, which she was afterwards so efficiently to rebuke. Hitherto her journal has presented much sameness both of event and observation ; it was perhaps inevitable in so limited UNIFORMITY IN WORSHIP.—It has always been found that the plainest and most explicit Laws, whether of Divine or human enactment, when judged by man's imperfect apprehension, are liable to various interpretations. No Rules could possibly be framed more plain and explicit than those which control our Public Worship,—the Rubrics. Yet, from the indifference of some, from the ignorance of others, and from the diversity in judgment of the more thoughtful, result various and opposite usages on the part of those who employ the same Liturgy. Although many of these diversities of practice are, in themselves, of trifling moment, yet they have a real importance since they must necessarily disturb the minds of earnest and devout worshippers. They have also an evil influence as tending to mar the unity which the Church should carefully preserve, in her practice, as well as in her Faith. These are things which strike the minds of the most careless observers, who are apt to note those trifling inconsistencies which, as they lie nearer the surface, are more easily discovered. It is therefore the duty of sound minded churchmen to sacrifice, in these indifferent things, their individual partialities, and to surrender the dictates of their private judgments to the custom which is most prevalent in the Church. In all Liturgical questions, the decision should always be controlled, not by arguments or reasons, but by prevalent use. Where practice is not absolutely settled by law, it should be established by prevailing custom.

These remarks have been suggested by an able Editorial in "the New York Churchman," in answer to the following inquiry.

Mr. Editor.—There is a point of liturgical order on which there is some difference of opinion among the clergy; many of whom would be glad to be favored with your view of it. It relates to the following rubric: "The Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, appointed for the Sunday, shall serve all the week after, where it is not, in this book, otherwise ordered." Some of us think that this can hardly be considered as properly applying to the days between Epiphany, Ash-Wednesday, and Ascension-Day, and the following Sundays, respectively. Please let us have your opinion, if convenient, before Ash-Wednesday.

Yours, with a high sense of the value of your editorial labors.

To which the learned Editor thus replies—

The Church clearly provides for the daily public celebration of the Lord's Supper. She therefore evidently intends to have a Collect, Epistle, and Gospel for every day. If, in any case, there is an apparent failure in providing for this, it must be taken for granted, that such failure is unintentional; and we must try to find a remedy for it in the obvious spirit and analogy of her services.

The days between the Epiphany and the first Sunday after, present the strongest case of all the above. After the Gospel for the Circumcision, occurs the following rubric:

"The same Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, shall serve for every day after, unto the Epiphany."

This makes then proper for the Second Sunday after Christmas, if there is such a one. The provision, however, ceases at the Epiphany. It does not extend to any days between that Feast and the Sunday next following. Here, then, there is not only no provision for, but an implied forbidding of, the use of that Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, on those days. And yet, no one will pretend that the Church's provision for the celebration of the Eucharist is suspended during that time. We think the difficulty may be very satisfactorily met, by looking, as above intimated, into the obvious spirit and analogy of our liturgical services.

Christmas Day, the Epiphany, Ash-Wednesday, and Ascension Day, are each a point at which a change occurs in the seasons of the Christian year. Christmas does not belong to Advent; nor the Epiphany to Christmas; nor Ash-Wednesday to the Pre-Lenten Season; nor Ascension Day to the Easter Season. This, undoubtedly, was the reason for terminating the use of the Circumcision Collect, &c., at the Epiphany. And we think it will be admitted to be sufficient ground, drawn from the obvious spirit and analogy of the Church's services, for replying to our correspondent, that, in our humble opinion, the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, respectively for Christmas Day, the Epiphany, Ash-Wednesday, and Ascension Day, should serve for every day after (except there should occur in that time some special Holy Day, having similar appointments for itself,) unto the following Sunday.

With great diffidence we venture to dissent from this decision, on the following grounds.

1st. Because we think this is not the practice which the more prevalent custom has established.

2nd. There is not in our esteem "an apparent failure in providing" for the case. There is this explicit provision made—"The Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, appointed for the Sunday, (these Italics are in the Prayer Book,) shall serve all the week after, where it is not in this Book otherwise ordered."

3d. The Rubric quoted in reference to the Circumcision and Epiphany, proves that where the Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, of a week-day Festival, were to be used on any day but the Festival itself, especial provision is made. And we therefore argue, that on all other occasions, the law is, that "the Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, appointed for the Sunday shall serve all the week after," because, "it is not in this Book otherwise ordered." Therefore we feel bound to use the Collect for Quinquagesima Sunday, followed by the Collect for Ash-Wednesday, on every day of the week after Wednesday.

We entirely agree with what follows, only we would add that the minister should take care to complete his private devotions, as he may easily do, before the "Gloria Patri" is sung. It is manifestly improper and unbecoming for any one in the House of God not to join "body, soul and spirit," in this solemn ascription of Praise to FATHER, SON, AND HOLY GHOST.

Another correspondent, "N. Casarea," (not our former correspondent, "Neo Casarea,") puts to us the following question, with a request for our opinion on the subject: "Why do some clergymen visibly perform an act of private prayer, during the celebration of praise in a congregation; and this, as is most frequent, during the singing of the Gloria Patri?"

The writer probably has reference to the time of singing the metre psalms and hymns. This part of the service appears to have had its origin in the Intros, or portions of Psalms appointed to be sung, in the ancient Church, and continued for a time, in the Reformed Church of England, while the Priest, (introitus) was entering the Chancel. Bishop White considers the introduction of the Psalms, in metre, into the worship of the English Church, as growing out of a provision in an act of uniformity, passed in the reign of Edward VI., "that psalms or prayers, taken out of the Bible, might be used in divine service, provided it were not done to the omitting of any part thereof." With us, the Psalms and Hymns in metre are "allowed to be sung before and after Morning and Evening Prayer, and also before and after Sermons, at the discretion of the Minister." Hence it appears that they are not required, but only allowed. Morning and Evening Prayer may be performed, with entire regularity, without them. Neither are they parts of Morning and Evening Prayer; but are allowed to be sung before and after each. Like the ancient Intros, they are usually sung while the minister is passing from one part of the service to another—as from Morning Prayer to the Communion Service, and from that to the Sermon. They occupy the interval during which the minister—where this is done—changes his vestments. Nor do we suppose it at all wrong to consider the space of time thus occupied as one of very allowable rest to the officiating Minister.

From these considerations, "N. Casarea" will probably not be surprised that we draw the inference, that our usual metre-singing, although appointed by the minister, is intended as a devout exercise of the people, without his being necessarily considered as a participant in it; and that, consequently, there is no irregularity in what we suppose to be the very prevalent custom of the minister's engaging, during this singing, in his private devotions, before proceeding to the Communion Service, or to the Sermon.

TRINITY CHURCH, POTTSVILLE.—It is usual to think that objects are magnified by distance, especially when described by those nearly interested in them. Most of our readers have heard of the new church at Pottsville, and the unusual claims it possesses to the general interest of all, whose hearts are affected by the welfare and progress of the Church. Not a few, perhaps, have been inclined to think that the importance of these general claims were somewhat magnified, by those most nearly concerned in establishing them.

A late visit to this most important Parish has impressed us with the real truth of the case, more than any second-hand representations could possibly do. Without any interest in the matter beyond that which the welfare of the Church Catholic inspires, with no personal or private partialities involved, we may surely ask, in behalf of our feeble testimony in this case, the regard which belongs to a disinterested witness.

In looking at the congregation, by which this noble effort has been undertaken, we were struck with the spirit and devotion which must have encouraged them to begin, continue, and nearly complete so great a work. The old church, not half so large as the present one, easily accommodated all who ever attended its holy services.

It was hard, under these circumstances, to prove that a larger church edifice was needed. Yet the result has proved that this was really the case. Although the new church is hardly completed, at a most unfavourable season of the year, and under circumstances when the worshippers could not have come from any distance, we beheld this church respectfully filled with from one to two hundred worshippers more than the number which would have over-crowded the old church. The town itself must grow, and grow rapidly, and it was the part of wisdom to provide for this growth. Besides, the surrounding country is filled with miners, many of whom have come from the Church of England. To provide for these is the plain duty of the Church planned in America by that of England. Without this provision they must wander into religious error, or into practical infidelity. On these accounts this large and substantial church has been erected. It is one of the largest in the whole Diocese, affording comfortable sittings for nearly a thousand worshippers. It will seat exactly nine hundred and eight persons. It is moreover a church-like and imposing edifice, in its outward form and internal arrangements suited to its high and holy use, on which nothing has been expended in needless ornament.

The erection of a church like this, under such circumstances, to meet such pressing wants, is a matter of interest to all within our Diocese. These claims have been partially acknowledged in Philadelphia. To relieve them of all difficulty, the Vestry want about $1000, either in donations, or as a loan for which the best security can be given. Surely a hundred persons could be found to give $10 each for such an object. Or one or two individuals will not be wanting to lend this needful sum. The zealous and devoted Rector, who has already done so much, and his faithful co-workers in this labour of love, deserve such help. And we feel sure that money cannot be given or lent in a way which will do more to extend the Church in this Diocese, and thus to bless most highly our fellow men, than the money which may be given or loaned for the benefit of TRINITY CHURCH, POTTSVILLE.

CHRISTMAS SERVICES IN BURLINGTON COLLEGE.—It seems rather unseasonable to refer to these in LENT. But we have received a strong communication, too late for this week, from "a Layman" of this city, in reference to an article, which appeared first in the "Catholic Herald," and from that paper has just found its way into two of our Church journals! The article in the last week's "Christian Witness," noticing, at this late day, this matter and uniting with a hostile paper in attacking one of our Bishops, is headed "singing in an unknown tongue." It refers to the fact that at early prayers on Christmas day, in the school-room of Burlington College, "the Gloria in Excelsis, the Venite, and the Adeste Fideles, were chanted in Latin." The objection raised is that this is contrary to "the 24th article," which reads thus: "It is a thing plainly repugnant to the word of God, and the custom of the primitive Church, to have PUBLIC PRAYER IN THE CHURCH, or to minister the sacraments, in a tongue not UNDERSTAND OF THE PEOPLE."

To which objections from Romanist and Protestants, we reply,

1. These Latin chants were not used at "public prayer." The regular service is not, we believe, used in the College on the days when the pupils attend "church." "The early prayers" are of the order of family prayer. This might have been gathered from the use of "the Adeste Fideles," had not its title been "in a language not understood of the people" who made the criticism.

2. This service was not in THE CHURCH.

3. Although Latin may be "a language not understood" by these learned editors, the smallest boys of Burlington College, we speak from our observation of their exercises, would be ashamed to own that they did not understand "the Gloria in Excelsis, the Venite, and the Adeste Fideles in Latin."

In this view of the case, we think the Romanist editor has shown his usual sharpness of vision in making this a violation of the 24th article—while to his Protestant followers has happened what will always occur when men are led by "the blind." If they want to keep out of "the ditch," they had better follow other guiding than that of the "Catholic Herald."

This is not a new custom, either in this country or England, in classical institutions, whose object is to bring "the dead languages" to life, and to teach them by use. These points will be brought out more fully by our correspondent.

NEW AGENTS.—Mr. Cleaveland Sawyer has kindly consented to act as an Agent for the "Banner," at Edenton North Carolina.

ORIGINAL POEM, BY THE REV. RALPH HOYT, will be in the proper place. We have already expressed our estimation of his merits, and we learn with satisfaction, good authority, that Mr. Hoyt is steadily and surely winning his way to a high place among our poets. His present contribution to the Banner will not, we think, diminish well-earned reputation. This department of our paper will be sustained as long as we can have original contributions from such writers as the Rev. Dr. Lyons and the Rev. Ralph Hoyt.

COMMENDATION OF THE BISHOP OF NORTH CAROLINA.—In the Diocesan Record will be found a kind commendation of this paper to his Diocese by Bishop Ives, whose good words are most highly prized, and most gratefully acknowledged. Encouraging words like these act powerfully as incentives to exertion, and it shall be our earnest effort to make the Bishop's expressions in our behalf to the members of the Diocese.

A SPORTING CLERGYMAN.—Under this imposing caption, the Evening Journal of yesterday informs its readers that "there were few sinecures to be compared to those enjoyed by clergy of the Irish Episcopal church—that they have fine mansions and beautiful grounds, but are generally without parishioners, and course with leisure to enjoy life." In proof of this, the journal says, that "the Rev. THOMAS MAGUIRE, of the Established church, recently died of gout in the stomach"—that "he lived in a parish where disease and starvation prevailed in their appalling forms"—and that how he lived, might be best understood by the following advertisement, cut from the Perthshire Repository—"Quoting the sale by auction, addressed to the sporting world," of household furniture, library, carriage, &c., &c. "thorough-bred filly, five grayhounds, &c., &c." Whether this allusion be designed to disparage the "Irish Episcopal church," or by contrast to minister to a rather excessive desire to manifest zeal for the "Irish Catholic church," it is either respect, unfortunate, to apply no stronger remark. The late Rev. THOMAS MAGUIRE, so far from being a clergyman of the "Established church," was a Catholic priest, up to the end of his death, and for many years the respected and able pastor of Ballinamore, in the county of Leitrim, and the successful opponent in controversy of the Rev. Mr. [?], in 1827, and the Rev. T. D. Gregg, in 1845. Mr. Maguire was certainly a "sporting clergyman" in the line of horses and dogs; but whatever his faith or church, he may as well have been allowed to go to the tomb without this particular mode of obituary notice.—Albany Argus.

We extract the above with much pleasure. In the hot haste of editors to reflect upon all British Institutions, and particularly upon the Established church of England and Ireland, they trip, as the editor of the Evening Journal did, in this instance. The labors of the Clergy, of the Irish (Protestant) Episcopal Church are great, and little gratitude is evinced for their anxious and self-denying efforts. After a day spent in exposure to infection, in visiting the cabins of the wretched peasantry, and in relieving the miseries of the wife and children—husband perhaps fires from behind a hedge at their friend benefactor, whose return home he has been waiting for. It is not pretended that all the Clergy of any church do their duty. Not but that some in every one are wholly deficient. Has not every member of the community his duty to perform? Are all save the Clergy without fault or remission? Why trumpet forth, upon all occasions, the sin of one of a profession, with the sly insinuation that "thus it is with them"? Surely, editors do not desire to bring all Religion into disrepute; and has it never occurred to them that paragraphs like those noticed by the Argus are surely calculated to have such an effect?—Churchman.

In copying the above from "The Churchman," we are most happy to endorse what is said of the Established Church of Ireland. We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen, when we say that, as a body, the clergy of this afflicted country are most devoted, self-denying, and laborious men. Without any motive to compel them, but a high sense of duty, they give themselves heart and soul to their noble work. Men of the loftiest talents and highest attainments spend their lives among the most ignorant and unlettered people. In our present number will be found a letter from a clergyman of this stamp. A scholar in the highest sense, a Christian gentleman by birth and breeding, at a time of life when there is some excuse for indulgence, we have known him spend days among the poorest cottagers in the dreary mountain districts of his extensive Parish. He spares no pains, no cares, no labors in providing for the bodily necessities, the mental improvement, the spiritual wants of "the poor and needy." And for these very things, he has been denounced in the Chapel, as we can prove. We have often heard mention made of "the sporting," "fox-hunting clergy" of England and Ireland. In two visits to the former, we formed a pretty extensive acquaintance with many persons of Great Britain, we never had an opportunity of examining a specimen of this class. In not very limited travels through these Islands, we never saw one whom Rumor even designated. Still, though this is not a very clerical avocation, we must candidly own that we would prefer to be ranked with the fox-hunting clergy, rather than with the MAN-HUNTING Clergy and Laity, not unfrequently found on this side of the Atlantic. We may be wrong, but we think it much worse, to run down a man, than a Fox.

New Publications.

THE YOUNG CHURCHMAN'S MISCELLANY. Edited by the Rev. J. A. Spencer, A. M. vol. iii. March. No. 3. New York—No. 139 Broadway.

Although we have no room for an extended notice of this excellent Church Periodical, we cannot pass this number by without a word of commendation. We consider it a most excellent publication for the younger members of the Church. There is, in all the numbers we have seen, great judgment displayed in the variety of the articles, and in their adaptation to the instruction and entertainment of Young Readers.

HAWKSTONE, A TALE OF AND FOR ENGLAND IN 184—New York, &c. In a future number we shall be prepared to give this important and popular work a more extended Editorial notice, accompanied by interesting extracts we have marked for this purpose. In the mean time we subjoin the following able critique from one whose judgment, as his article will show, is worthy of attentive consideration.

For the Banner of the Cross.

"Hawkstone" R. W. Sewell

MR. EDITOR:

We have just finished reading the popular Church novel, entitled 'Hawkstone,' for the first presentation of which before the American public, we are indebted to the enterprising publishers, Messrs. Stanford & Swords, New York. We belong to a class that have no liking for controversy, in the uncontroversial form of imaginative literature. Good and wise men however, say that it is necessary, seeing that a large class will read controversy in this form and no other; we yield our opinions so far as Hawkstone is concerned, and hope that it will have an extensive circulation amongst the class to be benefited. It is also supposed to be necessary to resist Roman and Protestant novels, by the same sort of weapons, accordingly we have Church novels written, amongst the chief of which for style and efficiency, we presume Hawkstone will be ranked.

And yet, we shall not believe, until we hear it from himself, that its author is (as has been affirmed,) the writer of "Christian Morals." And farther, we believe that the criticisms on Hawkstone which attended its publication in England, are just, the eloquent preface of the distinguished American editor, and the commendations of some of our best friends, to the contrary notwithstanding. Its exaggerations of principles and systems condemned, are manifest, and unpleasant to us. And the very ability wherewith this novel is executed, only fastens more firmly in our minds the judgment, that the presentation of ecclesiastical controversies in connexion with imaginative sketches is no great gain to church principles or church literature. It may be temperament, or it may be conscience, but either way, we dislike this mixing up things, in themselves different—this Religio-Romantic syncretism.

The awful scenes of treachery and bloodshed, described with intense power, as the result of Jesuit machinations, shocked us, but, indeed, did not disprove the principles of the order.

Perhaps, if our feelings had been analyzed, we should have found ourselves more disposed "to denounce and shoot" the Jesuit, without being any better qualified for a sober and truthful refutation of Jesuitism. And so, too, we shall never look upon a temperance procession, or the secretary of a colonization society, without thinking of the scene in the Priory, or the remarkable aphorisms of Mr. Augustus Philadelphus Wilberforce O'Keefe. But we are not so certain that this temper is the most desirable for a Christian and a controversialist. And this, we confess, is one of our objections to these controversial novels. They not only do not profess to formal treatises, and so, in many cases, get rid of fact along with the form; but it is necessary for the 'story' to have a plot, and so grave questions at issue between Christian men, and serious doctrines which are debated between branches of the Catholic Church, are mingled with love and murder; with treachery and drunkenness; with ivied abbeys and Jesuit priests; with comfortable studies and Protestant parsons—and all the 'clap-trap' of fashionable romance. We do not design to apply these remarks exclusively to Hawkstone. But we must be allowed to frankly declare, that if Jesuitism, Puseyism, Protestantism, and Temperance Societies involve serious questions, they should be taken hold of in a serious manner. Our objections to the Roman novels in circulation, (such for example as Geraldine,) are based on principles which will not permit us to admire, unqualifiedly, Church novels.

It seems to us that those people who want controversy to be arrayed in an imaginative garb, are not fit for this sort of work—it is not their mission to spread the faith by controversy, but by holy living. And they who are to be won to Catholic truth by attractive portraits of immaculate professors, will find that a trial still awaits them, when they mingle with the realities of life and living men. But if they will read, we know of nothing comparable in this species of literature to Hawkstone.

We had rather, however, leave those points which now serve to rend the body of Christ, and which cause so much bitterness amongst brethren, to be carefully examined, and candidly discussed by the unenvied few. Those, we mean, to whom God has granted great learning, and disciplined minds; who, against their own wishes, have, by the clear manifestation of Providence, been placed in the position of teachers and defenders of the faith.

So far, then, from being gratified with the attractive garb into which the points of modern controversy have been thrown by gifted intellects, we sigh for the unattractive volumes of older days. We prefer history to romance—gravity to wit, earnest remonstrance to ridicule.

It may be true, indeed, that hardly any body would read such dull books as Barrow, Taylor and Bull wrote on the Roman controversy; and it may be possible that the wives, sisters and daughters of Churchmen in the seventeenth century, were not so familiar with controversial topics as Churchwomen are now, when their centre tables are filled with religious novels—but whether the Church has gained by having so few to defend her by gentle and uncontroversial lives, and so many to defend her by information derived from religious novels, we shall leave to others to decide.

SACERDOS.

Foreign Correspondence.

The following admirable letter from a distinguished and most devoted clergyman of the Church of Ireland, will, we are sure, be read with deep interest. Such eloquent assurances of regard from a far-off land are most gratifying, and we hope soon again to hear from this valued correspondent.

To the Editor of the Banner of the Cross.

THE RELIGIOUS STATE OF IRELAND.

REV. AND DEAR SIR AND BROTHER:—

What a strange mysterious feeling, for which the common principles of human nature cannot account, is that which fills the heart of one who truly loves the Church, with the tenderest affection and the most endearing associations, when he thinks of those, who, however unseen and unknown, however severed by oceans and continents, are yet bound to him by the one Faith and the one Baptism, part of that one mystical Body, which is indwelt and sustained by the one gracious spirit, and joined, as members together with him, to the one glorious Head. This is surely true Churchism. It is that very "Communion of Saints," in which we profess to believe in our great Church symbol, for which every true child of God and of the Church looks out, and longs for its enlargement. It was a spirit universal in the Church in her primitive and purest times, until the great enemy sowed his tares of evil, first superstition and spiritual despotism, then democratic license and proud self opinion, in that fair and fruitful field which the Lord had blessed.

This is my apology (and I trust sir, you will kindly admit the excuse) for sending forth a very feeble, but I hope a true Church voice, from this poor Irish shore, to try and make itself heard among the Brethren in the happier and vaster and more hopeful field for the Church's love and labours, on your great continent. And yet when I thus speak of Ireland as poor and narrow, as but a speck in comparison of the wide regions of the American world, I do not mean to undervalue its importance, at this moment, in a Church and Christian aspect, or to imply that I think lightly of the things which are transacting there. In considering the ways of God, I am to remember, that it was not on the broad surface of the mighty Saturn, nor on the yet more enormous orbs of Sirius or Alderborn, but on this, nearly the least among these lesser worlds, the earth, that it has pleased divine wisdom to carry out that strange predestinate counsel of "Mercy and Truth met together," by which to Principalities and Powers, to the vast of all intelligent Being, is "to be made known, by the Church, the manifold wisdom of God." Ireland, poor and narrow as it is, is I believe at this moment a place of grand spiritual conflict, a battle-field for the powers of light and darkness, a spectacle to angels and to men. It has pleased God, by strange mysterious incidents of Providence, to fix the eyes of the world at this time upon it. I do not think it has been thus set upon a theatre to act out so many mournful scenes of a dark and fearful tragedy, without some deep purpose for itself, or some lessons of solemn purport for the spectators of this unhappy drama.

To the eye of Christian retrospection, there is, sir, one fact, gathering within it a cheering, and yet a melancholy consideration, written upon the backward history of the Church and of the world. The one to which I refer, is that well known fact, that from the first opening of the Christian dispensation, from the first shining forth of "the Sun of Righteousness," there has been a steady, one might almost say, a uniform progress of that glorious light westward, so that every successive region, as it was enlightened by the beams of divine truth, at their first reception of that light could say, with the adoring magi, "we have seen his star in the east." This is cheering especially when we think of your western land with its far stretching western limit, soon to be divided from the mighty millions of China and Japan, by no land of human habitation, by the great Pacific alone. But there is a mournful, as well as a cheering vision in this retrospective view. It is this, that as uniformly as the brightness of divine truth advanced upon, and cast back the shadows which lay upon its western boundary, so surely has the darkness behind followed upon the footsteps of light, so that Christianity may be said to have lost on its eastern limit, either in the actual profession of it, or in the purity of its doctrines where it was still professed, an equivalent for the inroads it was making to the westward on the kingdom of darkness. This will be obvious to any one, who contemplates the desolating ruin, with which Islamism has overthrown the once glorious churches of Asia and Africa, the churches of Polycarp and Ignatius, of Cyprian and Augustine, the idolatrous saint worship, which has drawn the shadow of death over the Apostolic light that rested at the first so purely on the churches of Greece; and above all the cumbrous mass of pagan inventions and Jewish fancies and traditions and the usurped spiritual despotism under which the once faithful churches of Italy and Spain and Gaul, those honoured seats, where Clement watched over the truth, and Ambrose shook the nations with his evangelist voice, and Irenæus and Hilary battled triumphantly for the Faith, lie prostrate and chained at the feet of the Papacy. It is most certain that the divine light of the gospel, which first went forth from Judea, though it radiated in many directions around, yet its real progress was uniformly in one unchanging course, until it reached the western limit of Europe, and found no further land to which its missionaries of eternal truth could bear it onward. But it is also most certain, as it is most melancholy, that the shadows of spiritual error and man's corruptions followed at no long interval behind, until in the ninth, tenth and eleventh centuries, whatever remnants of pure and undefiled religion found a shelter and a hiding place in Alpine fastnesses, or were treasured up, as we rejoice to believe, in the secrecies of the heart, by multitudes of holy individuals, yet the Church, as a whole thing, as a visible system, had sunk under one dreary and ominous eclipse. Now it is remarkable that in those very ages of grossest darkness, the lingering rays of divine truth and pure religion and pure unfettered Churchism, were still resting in the remotest limits of Europe's western shore, upon Ireland, the Ultima Thule of the ancient world.

Then it was that Columban and Aidan and Finan and Coloman, those holy men of old, and their high-minded successors, from the 7th to the 12th century, contended so bravely for the truth and for the liberty and independency of the churches, (without which, truth and primitive order cannot be preserved,) against usurping Rome, and thence went forth, into other lands, many noble champions of scriptural principles, and of the Church's rights, as Columban and Virgilius and others such, to leave their testimony against papal assumptions, in those very regions, be it observed, where, in the 16th century, the light and reviving influence of God's written word so gloriously broke forth.

Since the days of Augustine, Rome papal has taken the place of Rome pagan. It is still the city of darkness antagonist to "the city of God." The spirit of papal domination is an unwearied spirit in warring for empire, it is continually aggressive, unscrupulous in its instruments of contest, ever accounting that nothing has been achieved, so long as anything remains to be overcome. We are not therefore to be surprised, that the Church of Ireland, however remote and unconnected with the churches and nations of the continent, became an object of desire with the Popes to bring it under their sway. It is certain that this was not easily achieved, that up to the 12th century, although many attempts were made by the Bishops of Rome to interfere with and to exercise supremacy over the doctrines and discipline of the Irish church, yet the appointment of Bishops, the erection and distribution of dioceses, the making rules for monasteries and convents, and laws and canons for the administration of the Church itself, were independently arranged and authoritatively accomplished by the Princes and Clergy of Ireland alone. All this is made unquestionable and clear by the very interesting and learned discourse of Archbishop Usher, "on the religion anciently professed by the Irish and British." The first effective assaults on the independency of the Irish church were made through the Danes and Easterlings, who had conquered and held several chief cities on the sea coast, as is manifest from the proceedings of the Synod, as has been supposed, at Fernes in 1151—when the Pope's Legate Paparo attended, bringing four palls from Rome for the four Archbishops, the first ever received from thence. Yet even this would, in all likelihood, have been ineffectual, as to any permanent claim to authority over the Irish church, had not the Pope had another arrow behind, in his quiver, of mightier power and of more certain aim. It was within a very few years after this Synod, and while the struggle between the papal pretensions and the independent spirit of a large portion of the Irish clergy was still going on, that the ambitious hopes of Henry the 2nd of England were directed towards Ireland, and that in order to excuse his unjust invasion of that unoffending country, he applied to Pope Adrian the 4th to sanction the wrong by his divinely commissioned authority. This application gave to Adrian the very opportunity for gaining the spiritual ascendancy in Ireland so long desired by his predecessors.

In his Bull addressed to Henry, Adrian claims, without explaining how, the right of the successors of St. Peter to the temporal sovereignty of all islands whatever, implying at the same time some abstract title to universal sovereignty as the delegate of the King of Kings. In virtue of such right, he conveys to Henry and to his successors, the Lordship of Ireland, on the simple conditions that he should hold it as derived from and subject to papal authority, that he should compel the inhabitants of the land to pay the impost of Peter's pence to the Papal See, and that he should bring the church of Ireland into subjection to St. Peter's throne. It is well known to the readers of history, that, from various causes, it was not till about fifteen years after the obtaining of this Bull, that is till the year 1171, that Henry proceeded to gain possession of the kingdom thus authoritatively conveyed to him, and that the immediate occasion of his carrying into effect his long formed purpose was the supplication for assistance from Dermot, king of Leinster, who, for his cruelty, treachery and licentiousness, had been expelled from his dominions. It is also matter of certain record, that the first act of Henry's power in Ireland was to fulfil his engagement with the Pope, by assembling in the following year the famous Synod of Cashel, and then inducing or compelling the Bishops and Clergy to submit themselves without reserve, to the so-called Apostolic See. This was the first, great, deepest wrong done by Britain to the religious state and Church of Ireland. And thus in that mysterious economy of a righteous Providence, by which the holy God doth make in after ages, nations responsible to national judgments for the acts of their forefathers, did she, by bowing the necks of the people and clergy of this country under the papal yoke, establish, nearly seven hundred years ago, that unhappy religious condition, that stern and fatal bondage to despotic Rome, which has made Ireland for centuries a thorn in the side of England, her weakness and not her strength, and a dark stain upon her glory, as the land of religious light, of pure churchism, and of pre-eminent civilization.

I will here close this introductory communication on the religious state of Ireland, purposing, if you approve the design, to pursue the subject in some future numbers of your much esteemed paper. And remain,

Rev. and Dear Sir, with much respect,
Your faithful servant,

CLERICUS ULTONIENSIS.

The Public School Department of Trinity College, Perthshire, Scotland, was recently re-opened with the celebration of Divine Service, and an Address from the Warden, without the withdrawal of a single scholar, and with a large addition to the former number of students.

OBITUARY.—We feel that we cannot better record the memory of the venerable Dr. Lyell, than by transferring to our columns the following full and just tribute to this departed minister of Christ from the New York Churchman. We have known this much lamented Clergyman, as one of our earliest remembrances, and none so knew him but to love, honor, and respect him.

REV. THOMAS LYTELL, D. D.—Our readers are aware that it becomes our melancholy duty to record the death, on Sunday morning last, in the 74th year of his age, of the Rev. Thomas Lyell, D. D., Rector of Christ Church, in this city; which office he had filled for more than forty-three years. Our father's friend, and our own friend, we were taught in youth to respect and love him for those qualities which in mature years, we found to entitle him to the respect, love, and confidence, of all who knew him. He has left few if any behind him who have been more generally known by the clergy and leading laymen of our whole Church—none probably who was more extensively the acquaintance and friend of the respectable and virtuous portion of every sect and communion in this city; where he had been, for many years, the oldest pastor of any denomination; as he had also been, for a long time, the oldest Presbyter of this Diocese. It is therefore hardly necessary to advert to the cause which so many hearts find to mourn for the loss of the cheerful, amiable, and interesting companion; the generous and unostentatious host; the kind neighbor; the faithful friend; the good citizen; the devout Christian; the sound Churchman, the true pastor; the preacher of strong powers of persuading, convincing, edifying, and interesting; the workman in the vineyard of the Lord, ever ready, devoted, and diligent, in whatever department of that Lord's work—and much of it devolved upon him during his long ministry—fell, in the due order of the Church, to his lot. To those who knew him, we need not, but we think they will agree with us, if, to those who knew him not, we do—as indicating his character here, and the portion in a better world, to which we may well hope he has now been called, through Christ in whom he trusted, with the mingled humility and assurance of evangelical faith—refer to the thirteenth chapter of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians.

Dr. Lyell was a native of Virginia. His parents were members of the Church, and he accordingly received Catholic baptism in infancy. His family, however, were among those who, probably, on account of the then prostrate condition of the Church in that State, connected themselves with the Methodist denomination; in which he became a preacher when quite a young man, not, we believe, more than 18 years of age. A part of this ministry was exercised in Providence, Rhode Island—a period during which, as he has related with great satisfaction, he enjoyed the kind and friendly regards of the late Bishop Bowen, of South Carolina, then Rector of St. John's Church, Providence. While in the Methodist ministry, and yet a young man, during the latter part of Mr. John Adam's, and the beginning of Mr. Jefferson's administration, he was appointed one of the Chaplains to Congress, Bishop Claggett, of Maryland, being the other. This station made him acquainted with men and things which furnished rich materials for the fund of anecdote that imparted a portion of their characteristic interest to his powers of conversation. As a Methodist preacher, Dr. Lyell is understood to have been decidedly opposed to the unseemly noise and confusion which often occur in the worship of that denomination; with leading ministers and members of which, however, he continued to the last on terms of cordial friendship.

In 1804, he was ordained a Deacon, by Bishop Claggett, and at the close of that year, on the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Pilmore, who removed to Philadelphia, he became Rector of Christ Church; and was soon ordained Priest by Bishop Benjamin Moore, then our Diocesan; and instituted, (or, as it was then called, inducted,) into his Rectorship. The Church was then in Ann street, between Nassau and William. The present church, in Anthony street, having been built by his parish, they removed thither, at its consecration on Easter Even, March 29th, 1823. That building—all but its bare walls—was destroyed by fire a few months ago. Its reconstruction has proceeded so far that the congregation has been, for a short time, accommodated in the basement story; but even this return to walls so dear to him, our departed brother was forbidden in the wise Providence of God—he having been too unwell to meet his people there.

The time would fail, were we to attempt to do full justice to the indefatigable, earnest, and enlightened devotion, which secured to his flock the inestimable blessings, and to the large number of brethren who have lived and labored around him, the invaluable example, of "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed." Having seen more than one generation of parishioners depart in death, and been so long an industrious laborer in a population so rapid in its increase, and so incessant in its changes, as that of this city, he probably has not left behind him any pastor of a single congregation, whose ministrations have embraced so large a number of persons. High and low, rich and poor, one with another, the young, the middle aged, and the old, the afflicted, the sick, and the dying, the family, the congregation, and those who draw near to the altar, the prisoner in his cell, the pauper in his hospital-ward, the sun's heat, the storm's violence, the winter's cold, the night's darkness—all, all could be witnesses of his fidelity. Let that word suffice.

On his removal to this city, Mr. Lyell had the sagacity to appreciate the uncommon excellencies of character which distinguished the Rev. Mr. Hobart, who had been settled in this city a few years before, and was about his own age, and who has since been so extensively known and honored as Bishop

* Dr. Lyell has often spoken of the shock which his feelings experienced, when, at the first official dinner given by Mr. Jefferson, he departed from the uniform usage of his predecessors, by not having a blessing asked at table, although both of the Congressional Chaplains were present.

Hobart. Mr. Hobart, also, with his well-known ready and just discernment of character, soon loved, respected, and confided in his new associate. Such feelings were mutual and constant, till death parted them; and were certainly a fair, and as certainly a highly creditable, indication of the worthiness of both. Dr. Lyell, too, was immediately received into the esteem and confidence of the venerable and excellent Bishop Moore, his new diocesan.

During the memorable period of Dr. Hobart's election and consecration to the Episcopate, and of the first two or three years of his Episcopal career, Dr. Lyell's firmness in principle, constancy in friendship, and Christian conscientiousness and disinterestedness in duty, had trials of which few probably are now aware. They were severe. To many men they would have been appalling. They required great risks and great personal sacrifices, and exposed him to no small amount of reproach, rebuke, and taunting. All, however, was vain. He knew in whom he trusted. He threw himself on principle, came out with untarnished character, and lived to enjoy that respect, confidence, and affection, which only can be welcome to the truly good man, which stern and sterling integrity deserves, and which compromise and time-serving would have greatly lessened, if not destroyed. His love, attachment, and fidelity, founded on principle, and warmed by virtuous feeling, were strong towards each of his Bishops in this Diocese—towards the first two, while they lived; and while himself lived, towards our present diocesan; this having been, as we are assured, manifested, as long as words and actions could give, on earth, proof of the heart's constancy and kindness. The generous steadfastness, indeed, with which, to the very last, he retained his confidence in the latter, without suffering either his judgment to be warped or his affections to be chilled towards his early friend and spiritual father, deserves, even in this brief sketch, to be particularly mentioned, as an evidence no less of the firmness of his mind than the goodness of his heart.

On the elevation of Dr. Hobart to the Episcopate, in 1811, Dr. Lyell was elected his successor as Secretary of the Convention of this Diocese; which office he held, by annual elections, until he declined it in 1816. In 1813, he was elected a member of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, a post which he continued to hold till his death, with the exception of a short period, when he voluntarily retired, from motives of delicacy, in consequence of there being certain matters before the Committee, in which he was a party concerned, as Rector of Christ Church. In 1818, he was chosen a deputy to the General Convention, and continued to be ever after, until he declined a re-election in 1844. On the floors of both the General and Diocesan Conventions, he often rivetted the attention of his fellow members by earnest, unartificial, and powerful displays of extempore eloquence. Ever since its removal to this city, in 1822, he was a Trustee of the General Theological Seminary, and uniformly constant and faithful in the duties of the station. He was connected, too, with almost all the Church institutions of this diocese, located in this city; ever setting, when health allowed, the wholesome example of punctuality and fidelity in the trusts thus reposed in him. In 1821, the degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Columbia College in this city.—then aged 47

The funeral solemnities of our venerable friend were celebrated on Ash-Wednesday afternoon. His body was borne from his late residence in Anthony street, next door to Christ Church, which is now being rebuilt, to St. Paul's Chapel, attended by about eighty of the clergy of the Church, many of the ministers of the several denominations, and a large number of the parishioners of Christ Church, and of the members of our communion generally.

MR. WILLS' LECTURES ON ANCIENT ECCLESIASTICAL ARCHITECTURE.

Notwithstanding the unusual inclemency of the weather, the first of these Lectures, on Thursday evening (9th), attracted a highly respectable audience. We were deprived of the profit and pleasure of hearing the second Lecture, but, from good authority, learn that it was even more interesting than the first, and exceedingly well attended. There was a plainness and practical character in the first Lecture, which commended it to the understanding of those least informed on this important subject. By the help of excellent drawings, the different steps in the progress of "English Ecclesiastical Architecture," from the rude Saxon through the massive Norman, up to "the threefold Division" of the noble Gothic, were most clearly pointed out. The first Lecture dwelt upon the details of these orders, while their combination in Cathedrals and Parish Churches, formed the subject of the second Lecture. The Lecturer evidently felt all he said, and interspersed his masterly descriptions with practical hints and reflections, expressed in eloquent language. The interest manifested on the subject is an encouraging sign, for those who long to see in this city Temples of the Living God, suited to their high and holy use. We trust these admirable Lectures, and more of the same kind, may be repeated here.

The following inquiry from a Clergyman in a distant parish, is beyond our knowledge. Will some better informed reader answer in our behalf?

MR. EDITOR:—

Dear Sir, I have heard of a steel bar as a good and very cheap substitute for church bells. Will you be so kind as to inform your correspondent through the Banner, of their utility and probable cost, and if possible, where they may be obtained?

OMISSION.—The name adopted by the writer of the article on the "Papists and Puritans" in our last, was unintentionally omitted. It should have had the signature of "Western."

Anti-Calvinistic Psalmody.

EDITOR:—

Comparing our American Prayer Book, with the Church England's, I noticed the following alteration in the 71st psalm in metre; our 55th Selection, 2d verse. The reader observe that the change in the line italicised, indicates the usually Anti-Calvinistic tendencies of the American Revisers of the Liturgy.

ENGLISH PRAYER BOOK.

"Be thou my strong abiding place,
To which I may resort;
'Tis thy decree that keeps me safe;
Thou art my rock and fort."

AMERICAN PRAYER BOOK.

"Be thou my strong abiding place,
To which I may resort;
Thy promise, Lord, is my defence:
Thou art my rock and fort."

The same change is made in Psalm 119, verse 43; our 97th Selection, part 6th, verse 3.

ENGLISH PRAYER BOOK.

"Since still my ground of steadfast hope Thy just decrees have proved."

AMERICAN PRAYER BOOK.

"Since still my ground of steadfast hope,
Thy judgments, Lord, have proved."

Obituary.

Died, on the 1st day of January, 1848, at Albania, the residence of John Cox, Esq., near Edenton, N. C., Capt. RICHARD COX, in the 63d year of his age.

For many years he was a worthy member and communicant of the Church; and by the patience with which he endured the pains of a protracted disease, he set a bright example of Christian resignation, and of that faith which accounts the sorrows of the present life as not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us.

While his departure from among us has brought sorrow to a loved wife, and to the many friends who loved him, that sorrow is alleviated by the holy hope that they who sleep in Christ shall be made alive by Him at His coming. As Death swallowed up in victory, so should our grief be swallowed up in joy.

Do Good, Hoping for Nothing again.

Learning so many complaints of the ingratitude of mankind towards their benefactors, and having, during a long life, experienced so little, I determined to investigate the truth of the statement, and ascertain the cause. I have generally observed that those who are constitutionally active, benevolent, and disinterested, take so much pleasure in doing good, that they consider themselves as amply remunerated by the satisfaction they derive in benefiting others; and seldom complain of the ingratitude of those whom they have assisted. They confer their favours with a peculiar grace which greatly enhances the obligation, and excites more grateful feelings, than the most costly gifts and sacrifices, which are frequently rendered inexpressibly grateful to the recipients by the oppressive manners of their benefactors. The self-sufficient, who consider themselves models of perfection, and think their own judgments are infallible in all things, seldom consult the feelings, wishes, or peculiarities of those whom they mean to oblige, but insist upon doing good their own way; which way is often diametrically opposite to the wishes of the recipients of their favours; and when they are hurt if they do not receive the grateful acknowledgments of those for whom they have made such self-sacrificing exertions. Their want of tact and consideration nullifies their obligation and crushes those grateful emotions which would spontaneously arise in the hearts of those whom they intend to benefit; who, being disappointed in their expectations, can only credit them for their good intentions. I have occasionally met with a person who was so unreasonable as to take offence, those upon whom he or she had conferred an obligation, and, in argument, to express an opinion contrary to their expressed will. Some persons are offended if their dependents do not adopt their peculiar views, their uncharitable feelings and liberal prejudices. Generally it is the proud and selfish who are stimulated to do good merely from a sense of duty, who complain the most of not meeting with a sufficient return. If they would study St. Paul's inimitable definition of charity, and instantly use the Collect appointed for Quinquagesima Sunday, they would lament their own deficiencies, instead of censuring others. Their indolence prevents them from experiencing any pleasure in relieving others, and their excessive pride makes them regard the slightest exertion as a great concession on their part: and if those who have been obliged to accept a few trifling favours from them, make every little return to their power, they do not consider the aggregate of those grateful and affectionate little acts as an equivalent for the enormous obligation which their pride has so greatly magnified. They declare they will no longer exert themselves to benefit such thankless creatures. They forget that it is not optional with us, and that we are responsible for the omission of every act of kindness we have the opportunity of performing. "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." Those of omission are particularly mentioned as the cause of the condemnation of the slothful on the day of judgment, (see St. Matthew, xxv, 41, and the following verses). We are exhorted not to be weary in well doing, and assured we shall reap, in due time, if we faint not. Instead of boasting how much we have done for the thankless and unworthy, and imagining that we have performed works of supererogation, let us lament the innumerable opportunities of doing good which we have neglected. How many more kind little acts and offices of love and sympathy in bearing one another's burthens, and in cultivating peace and good will, and thus fulfilling the laws of Christ, we might have performed. We have forgotten these sins of omission, but they are all noted in the book of God's remembrance. Time is so short, and we can do so little for others in comparison of the innumerable and unacknowledged blessings we daily receive from our Heavenly Benefactor, that we should be glad to embrace every occasion of pleasing God, by doing good; and feel obliged to those who furnish us with the opportunity. We are commanded to do good hoping for nothing again. Did the lepers show either gratitude or good-manners for their restoration? Why should we expect to receive more than our Divine Master? The approbation of the Omnipotent, and the high and exalted honour of being entitled to the appellation of his children, by obeying his commands, and imitating the example of our Heavenly Father in doing good to the thankful and unthankful, should be a sufficient stimulus to persevering exertion. If we require any other let us impartially analyze our motives, and we will detect the operation of a latent self-love and self-seeking, which we little suspected. Children should early be taught to consider the old adage "one good turn deserves another" in the light of a precept, enjoining them to avail themselves of the first opportunity of making a grateful return for any favour they receive, and not as a stimulus to benevolent deeds from the expectation of receiving an equivalent. Let the ingratitude of others remind us of our forgetfulness not only of our especial mercies, but of the lavished bounties which are unceasingly bestowed upon us by our munificent Creator and Preserver, which we receive as our due without even reflecting "from whom those blessings flow." What thought can conceive, what tongue can declare the immensity of that love which induced the Father to bestow the inestimable gift of his dearly beloved Son upon us his rebellious and thankless creatures! If God so loved us, ought we not to love one another? If we find the recipients of our bounty ungrateful for temporal benefits, that need not prevent us from exerting all our energies to benefit the souls of vast multitudes whom we shall never meet until the Day of Judgment. Many may then thank us as the favoured instruments of enlightening their minds, and showing them the way of salvation. Let our gratitude to God be in proportion to the abilities and opportunities he affords us to promote his glory: and if, by his preventing and co-operating grace, we have been enabled to perform more than some others, instead of being inflated and puffed up, let us compare our small services with the indefatigable exertions of those who have presented themselves as "living sacrifices to God;" and learn humility: and renew our zeal and diligence in doing good to all men, as we know not how soon we may be summoned to give an account of our stewardship. Sailor Missionaries.

Without in any way presuming to point out the best manner of spreading the gospel over the world, or touching the question of which portion of the human race has the first claim on Christian charity; that immediately at our doors, or that separated by vast distance from us; I would beg attention to a few suggestions in reference to seamen, and the efforts now making in their behalf, because it seems to me, among the many reasons which may be urged to enlist universal co-operation in this work, not the least is this, that the sailor occupies in the matter of missions a middle ground. Those, who with bleeding hearts are striving to lessen the misery and want around them, and cannot, while so much remains undone at home, be persuaded to search for other objects of compassion, must at once admit the sailor's claim. He is here to speak for himself. While on the other hand those who mourn for the poor dying heathen, and absorbed in the contemplation of the untold and inconceivable horrors of their situation, overlook all intervening objects, may find in the sailor the most efficient instrument wherewith to effect their hallowed purpose. Wandering from pole to pole, and from the rising to the setting sun, in every distant sea, sequestered harbor and lonely islet, the sailor is emphatically the missionary, whether as the agent of hell, or the messenger of peace. It is beyond all reasonable probability, if not possibility, that the Church can ever send her ministers to many of the spots which have long since been familiarly known, and are constantly visited by the "pilgrims of ocean," and through the seamen alone are the heathen who dwell there to hear of "Jesus and salvation." Over the greater portion of the vast field of foreign missionary labor are spread the "whale ships." They extend their wings like angels of death over many a fair spot of creation, and are sowing the seed which must yield a harvest of bitter fruit. Several hundred of these emissaries of Christendom with twenty or thirty thousand men composing their crews, are now giving the heathen a knowledge of Christianity. I say giving the heathen a knowledge of Christianity, for in their simplicity, the witless savages will "judge the tree by its fruit," and cannot possibly discern the truth, when the truth is never submitted to their investigation. Now what is a whaler? How is her crew composed—of what materials? What their deportment? Few know who care about ought else except the fortunes they may amass, wrung out though they be, of the blood of their own countrymen, or the despised pagan. Yet fewer will tell what they know, lest they should make enemies of those whom the truth condemns. The following extracts however, from the "Christian Reflector," throw some light on the subject, and deserve at least commendation for the spirit which has caused their utterance, and a perusal for the end they should effect.

"Of the twenty thousand men who go in jeopardy of their lives under every accessible line of latitude and longitude upon the great highway of nations,—what can be said? From one whose position gives him ample facilities for accurate knowledge of the facts in this case, who has not, by a long course of familiar observation of flagrant abuses, become indurated to a sense of their turpitude; who on the one hand has no interests prompting to concealment, or glossing over frightful evils; nor on the other, any feelings of goading retaliation for personal injuries, to cause an exaggerated picture, surely from such an one you may expect the simple truth. The former position, the subsequent tendencies, and the present state of the whalemens in their physical and intellectual, their moral and religious condition are topics of surpassing interest, and should awaken the deepest concern of the wise and good." Viewing them either as fellow citizens, or as our representatives abroad.

After glancing at the combination of adverse circumstances which has reduced whalemens so low in the scale of creation, that they are a "byword and reproach," "not only among the Gentiles, but among their brethren of the sea," the writer proceeds, "*they are now made up, (the crews) to a great degree (and of course with some honorable exceptions) of the very refuse of humanity, gathered from every quarter, escaped from poor houses and prisons, or gleaned from the receptacle of vagrancy and lazaret-house corruption, with a large admixture of foreigners of all languages, complexions, and characters. Such constitute the experienced portion of the crew. To them you may add one third more of "land lubbers" or raw hands, made up of heterogeneous materials. Here will be found the young roving adventurer, who pants for opportunity to see the world; he has heard marvellous stories of the facilities of foreign observation furnished in the service, while at the same time, visions of easily acquired wealth, golden harvests to be here reaped, have filled his mind, and he hurries from the interior to ship himself on board a whaler. The reckless and impatient who spurn all control are also here, thinking this a fit place to indulge unbounded license. Here also you find the spoiled sons of over-indulgent parents, who having made themselves intolerable by their vicious propensities, and constantly in danger of bringing disgrace on themselves and their connexions, by their intemperance, their fits of passion, or unbridled licentiousness, are sent on a whaling voyage as a school of reform! * * With two thirds of the required number of men of the above description, the ship sails, relying on making up her complement in Portuguese sailors at the Western Islands, or in Kanakas from the Sandwich and other islands of the Pacific Ocean. Both these classes are usually as filthy and disgusting specimens of humanity, as can well be conceived; with this difference, however, that the former are perfectly incorrigible, while the latter do sometimes improve. This motley crew are at length mustered on board. Here with no possibility of classification, or separate quarters, crammed together into a horrid den, with few or no books, or opportunity to use them, if they were possessed, with the constant din of roistering disorder, superabundant profanity, and teeming lasciviousness of conversation and songs, with no sabbath, no prayer, no words and efforts of superiors to win them to something better and worthier, they pass years of their lives, in what too truly may be called a 'floating hell.' When they are on shore or lying in port to refit, corruptions by libidinous intercourse with impure women, intemperance, and other abominations vary, while they still more degrade their condition.*

Now I would ask all Christians, but especially those who are most actively engaged in the work of foreign missions, what it behoves them to do in this matter? If such is the fact in relation to these co-laborers in the conversion of the heathen, (and I can bear personal testimony to the rigid and unexaggerated truth of all that is said above, and might add even more,) what a wide departure from wise policy is it to overlook seamen, while striving to gather pagans into the fold of Christ. Admitting even that you can send ministers of the gospel in the course of time, to these haunts of whalers, and undo their work, will you in the meanwhile suffer the reproach they bring upon Christendom, and do nothing to stay the plague. We stand between the dying and the dead, and even while we pause to think, the work of destruction is going on! Imagine, if you can, such a set of men as whalers generally are, (for thankfully I admit there are a few noble exceptions,) removed beyond the restraint of human laws, without the fear of either God or man before their eyes, turned loose like demons among savages; revelling in every excess of ungodliness, given up to the vilest affections; with nought to check their awful career, and then paint the scene! What pencil can do it? But is there no remedy? Is there no balm in Gilead for this mortal disease? Suppose in lieu of the "outcasts of society," you substitute Christian men as the crews of your ships? Instead of compassing sea and land to make their proselytes if possible, "two-fold more the children of hell, than themselves, would they not carry the joyful tidings of salvation to the remotest parts of the earth and the distant isles of the sea?" Might we not then begin to hope that the gospel would spread its glory from pole to pole, and the day at length arrive when that which is written shall come to pass. "I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth?"

Rev. R. S. Taylor.

Diocesan Intelligence.

New York.—Rev. Dr. Higbee, of Trinity, is spending some time in the District of Columbia, where his wife's relations reside. His time of leave of absence terminates on the first of May, and he will probably recommence his valuable and acceptable labors at Trinity, with an Easter sermon. Rev. Dr. Haight, who has been filling his place during his absence in Europe, has greatly endeared himself to the parish, both by his pastoral and parochial fidelity and ability.—N. Y. Express.

Maryland.—CONFIRMATION.—On Quinquagesima Sunday, fourteen persons were confirmed in St. Timothy's Church, Catonsville. Of these seven were pupils of St. Timothy's Hall.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. G. G. Moore has accepted a unanimous call to the Rectorship of the United Parishes of Trinity Church, Covington, and St. Paul's Newport, Kentucky. Post Office, "Covington, Ky."

of the Apostle "to do good unto all men, but especially unto those that are of the household of faith."

For more reasons than a mere love of gossip, which, as Aristotle tells us, is natural to all men, Mrs. Maddox would probably have hastened away at once to carry this intelligence to Mr. Marmaduke's committee, then sitting in secret conference in her own drawing-room. But just as she was wishing Bentley good morning, who should issue out from Mr. Atkinson's brass-knocked brass-plated door, and escorted to the door with very deferential politeness by the grave Mr. Atkinson in person, but the mysterious stranger himself! He passed Mr. Bentley with a gentlemanly bow of recognition, but found considerable difficulty in executing the same manœuvre with Mrs. Maddox; for what with the surprise, and the notion at being so close to a Papist, and the indignation at his standing against Mr. Brook, and at the same time a little awe inspired by his great dignity of manner, and a little confusion at the consciousness of her own thoughts, besides a doubt whether she ought to notice him, and a resolution to toss up her head as he passed—all these things so embarrassed poor Mrs. Maddox, that shifting backwards and forwards from side to side, she ended in very nearly pushing her parasol into his eye, and compelled him, with an apology for his awkwardness, to step out into the road. But the apology was gracious, the voice refined, the manner noble. And Mrs. Maddox, after achieving her evolution, could not help looking back at his tall commanding figure. She then recollected (it is singular how recollections of the kind do come upon us) that it was her duty, a duty which she reproached herself much for having so long neglected, to call on Mrs. Atkinson to inquire after the health of little Jesse Atkinson, the youngest but four of Mrs. Atkinson's ten children, and who had pricked herself with a thorn a full fortnight back, and had been suffering from a swelled finger. She moved to the door, rang the bell, and to her great delight Mrs. Atkinson was at home. But Mrs. Atkinson, a plain, sensible, domestic person, little stirred by curiosity, little disposed to communicate her husband's secrets, and caring for little in the world but her own family duties, and Mr. Atkinson's comfort, and her ten children's health and happiness, was not the person from whom much information could be expected on the subject of the mysterious stranger. She was surprised at the call, for there were political reasons why Mrs. Maddox did not call often,—Mr. Atkinson was a Conservative, Mr. Maddox a Radical,—she was surprised at the tender inquiry after Jesse's finger, for Jesse's finger had been quite well ten days ago. And when Mrs. Maddox's careless well-managed "by-the-by" (for Mrs. Maddox was rather an intriguer, and understood diplomacy) had brought forward the subject of the stranger, Mrs. Atkinson knew nothing about him. She believed he had some business with Mr. Atkinson—he had been often to the house, closeted with Mr. A. in the library—was fond of children.

"Oh, yes," cried little Willy, who was in the room playing; "and do you know, yesterday, when I was in the library, he came in and took me on his knee and asked me my name, and told me such a pretty story!"

"How artful and electioneering!" thought Mrs. Maddox.

"What was his name?"

Mrs. Atkinson did not know.

"Was he rich?"

She could not tell.

"How long would he stay in Hawkstone?"

She had not heard.

"Had Mrs. Atkinson seen him?"

Yes, for a minute, but only for a minute, except at church, when he sat in Mr. Atkinson's pew.

"At church!" exclaimed Mrs. Maddox. "Why, he is a Papist!"

"I should think not," observed Miss Simpson, the governess, who had been sitting by in silence; "for every time that I have been to eleven o'clock prayers on Wednesdays and Fridays, he has been at church, and also on the last saints' day."

"How singular!" thought Mrs. Maddox, and also Mrs. Atkinson.

"What can a gentleman have to do at church on a week-day? He is no clergyman, is he?"

(To be Continued.) Since made

Week Day Prayers in Lent.

FROM DR. KIP'S "LENTEN FAST."

"What! could ye not watch with me one hour?" was on a certain occasion the appeal made to some of the disciples of our Master. And how solemnly must it have sounded in the ears of those to whom it was addressed! The Person from whom it came—the time—the place in which it was uttered—all united to invest it with emphasis. The Person, was the Lord Jesus Christ. The time, was when His career on earth was just closing, and the morrow was to behold Him stretched upon the Cross. The place, was the garden of Gethsemane, the very name of which awakens in our minds, the remembrance of those fearful sorrows even unto death, of our suffering Lord.

And we think that our Lord might address this same touching inquiry to many among us, who in this day profess His name. There is too, in some respects, a degree of analogy between our situation, and that of the disciples who first listened to these words. We also are looking forward to that sacrifice on the Cross, the celebration of which will soon arrive. At this solemn season, we are or—ought to be—endeavoring by prayer, and weeping, and fasting, to prepare our hearts for uniting in its commemoration. And to aid us in this work, the Church has appointed peculiar services, well adapted to lead our thoughts away from the things of this world, to contemplate the mysteries of Redemption. During each week in the season of Lent, in accordance with her regulations, the House of God is open, that His children may meet, and turn unto Him with that appropriate petition—"Create and make in us new and contrite hearts, that we, worthily lamenting our sins, and acknowledging our wretchedness, may obtain of Thee, the God of all mercy, perfect remission and forgiveness, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

This then, is the most solemn period of our Ecclesiastical year, whether we look at the nature of the services in which we are invited to join, or that mysterious event to which we are constantly pointed forward. And yet, how seldom do even those who "profess and call themselves Christians," embrace as fully as they ought, these opportunities of communing with God in His holy temple! How frequently, when the sanctuary each week opens its doors, and invites them to break off for a brief period from the bustle and engrossing cares of the world do they permit the most trivial excuse to prevent them from answering to the call! May not our Lord then say to many among us, as He did to His disciples of old, in a tone of mingled sorrow and reproach—"What! Could ye not watch with me one hour!"

Let us then briefly look at some of the motives, which should induce every Christian, to avail himself of the week-day services of the Church during this period.

The season itself, presents its earnest appeal. When God delivered the law upon Sinai, the people of Israel were commanded for three days before, to sanctify themselves, that they might be prepared to behold, even from a distance, the glory of Jehovah, as the mountain was wreathed with clouds, and "quaked greatly, because the Lord descended upon it in fire." When therefore we are called upon to approach that wonderful mountain, on which, by the tears and blood of the Incarnate Son of God, was wrought out the sublime mystery of man's redemption, should we not be earnest to put away from us our earthliness of feeling, and to purify our hearts in anticipation of that solemn scene? Yes, as the time draws near, we are to be led to the Cross—to contemplate the Passion, the bitter agonies of our Lord—and to behold Him dying for our salvation, it seems but proper, that we should undergo additional preparation of heart. We should not rush at the tumult of this noisy world, to the foot of Calvary, still far distant, we should veil our heads, and put our hands from off our feet, realizing that we are on holy ground. We slowly approach that spot, to which even angels would with intense emotion, a holy fear should fall upon us, and there the path of our souls we should meditate upon the solemn truth which is to be unfolded to our view.

Is it then asking too much, if during the brief period of forty days we are invited to assemble in the house of God, in each week, for a short time to think of our dying Saviour, and to bewail the sins which brought him to the Cross, there not an evident propriety in that regulation, common even in Primitive times, by which Wednesday (the day which the Jews took counsel to betray our Lord,) and Friday (the day of his death,) are devoted to affectionate remembrance of Him, and humiliation for ourselves? Did He suffer in atonement for our transgressions, and yet, shall we think so lightly of the guilt which we will not "rend our hearts," and pray God to blot out our guilt? Can we, while pursuing this course, realize the exceeding depth of our degradation? Can we estimate, from how fearful a woe we have been delivered, we will not look to our Lord on the Cross, or remember terrible were the sufferings which then crushed His humanity?

From the Journal of the General Convention.

State of the Church.

WESTERN NEW YORK.—Since the last General Convention, (1844.) 22 new Candidates for Orders have been admitted; 13 Candidates have been ordained Deacons; 19 Deacons have been ordained Priests; 3 Candidates have been transferred to other Dioceses; 9 new Congregations have been received into union with the Convention; 5 new Church edifices have been consecrated; 20 Clergymen have been received into the Diocese; 29 Clergymen have been transferred to other Dioceses; 4 Clergymen have been instituted; 4 Clergymen have died; and 2 Clergymen have resigned the Ministry, and been displaced.

At present the Diocese consists of the Bishop, 93 Presbyters, 11 Deacons, 22 Candidates for Holy Orders, 125 Organized Congregations, with 100 consecrated Church edifices, and five Churches are in process of erection.

The average number of Missionaries in the Diocese since the last General Convention, has been 44. The present number is 40.

The fund for assisting disabled Clergymen, made up by annual collections on Christmas day, has afforded aid to 9 Clergymen, amounting, since the last Convention, to upwards of three thousand six hundred dollars. ($3,688.08.)

There exist, in operation in the Diocese, under the auspices of Churchmen, one incorporated College, to endow which more fully as a Church institution, measures are in progress; two incorporated Academies, and several private male and female Seminaries.

A system of monthly collections and donations for the various institutions of the Church, Diocesan and General, has been steadily pursued for eight years, and yields about 4,500 dollars annually.

The fund for the support of the Episcopate, consists, in all, of thirty-eight thousand six hundred dollars, with an accumulating fund of five hundred and twenty-eight dollars, under the management of five incorporated Trustees, chosen by the Convention.

Since the last General Convention, there have been Baptisms, (adults, 440—children, 1,962,) total, 2,402; Confirmed, 1,027; Marriages, 736; Burials, 1,217. The present number of Communicants is about 6,000; of Sunday School Teachers, 1,657; of Sunday Scholars, 8,263.

The Bishop of the Diocese, by injury arising from a fall from a carriage when on his visitation, was providentially prevented from the full discharge of his duties, from May, 1845, to January, 1846, and during the years of 1846 and 1847, he officiated in and for about 120 parishes in the Diocese of New York, at the request of the ecclesiastical authority thereof.

The Diocese has still to lament the frequent change of parishes among the Clergy, owing to the inadequacy of support, or irregularity in the payment of the amount promised, which circumstance, together with the frequent removals of individuals and families to the Western States, continues to render it a fluctuating Diocese, in regard to the number of the Clergy, and the stability of parishes.

Peace, harmony, and mutual confidence still prevail among the Clergy and Laity, combining them both in a steady adherence to the Bible and Prayer-Book. With increased and increasing attachment to the doctrines, principles, and institutions of the Church, we may record also the growth of a more earnest spirit of devotion to Christ our Saviour.

Some of the Missionary stations are at present vacant, and the demand for self denying Missionaries is very great.

NEW JERSEY.—There are at present fifty-five Clergymen, the Bishop, forty-eight Priests, and six Deacons. There are forty-nine commodious Churches and Chapels, and four others in progress. Seven churches have been consecrated since the last General Convention. There have been added by ordination and transfer, two or three travelling

THE RETREAT.

A Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies.

Under the supervision of the Rector.

Eighteen Churches have been consecrated since the last General Convention. Eleven are now awaiting consecration, which is delayed on various grounds; in most instances, because they are not yet entirely paid for. There are ten places of worship now building. The Diocesan College is now completely organized, and in successful operation. It comprises a Preparatory Department, or Grammar School. Both departments contain about 80 Pupils, under 11 Instructors, 3 of whom are Clergymen and 4 Candidates for Holy Orders. The incorporated Institute for the education of girls, under the visitation of the Bishop, continues to be entirely successful, and has now the whole time and care of a Clergyman, or resident Chaplain. A second School for boys, under the visitation of the Bishop, is recognized by him as a Diocesan School. It contains between 50 and 60 Pupils, under the charge of a Clergyman, and several Candidates for Holy Orders. Besides these, there are Day Schools for boys and girls in the city of Baltimore, established and conducted as Church Schools, under the visitation of the Bishop. Other schools, for both sexes, in connection with the Church, but not under the official supervision of its Diocesan authority, are becoming numerous, and, for the most part, doing well.

The Diocesan board of Missions, and Prayer Book, and Homily Society, continue their operations as last reported.

The Candidates for Holy Orders in the Diocese are 18.

The Communicants, reported at the last Diocesan Convention, were 6,555;—adding the members previously reported in one parish and two Congregations, from which returns were not then made, the whole number in the Diocese becomes 6,639. Of these, 1,544 are reported as having been added in the last three years.

Baptisms reported in the last three years are—adults, 218; infants, 3,128; not specified, but mostly infants, 2,017. In all 5,363. Marriages, reported, are 1,318; Funerals, 2,027; Persons Confirmed have been 1,326, on one hundred and eighty-nine occasions. The amount of contributions for religious and charitable purposes, reported to the three last Diocesan Conventions, is $13,326 06. The reports of such contributions have not been full—some of the largest Parishes and Congregations having made more.

The reports of Sunday Schools in the Diocese are also very imperfect. Those made to the last Convention represent only 214 Teachers and 1,407 Scholars. Several large Schools are not included in this Report.

The number of parishes in the Diocese is now 71; that of organized Congregations, 30.

MICHIGAN.—This Diocese, since the last Triennial Convention, has enjoyed its usual prosperity, under the protection and guidance of its Divine and ever-present Head.

With the utmost freedom of thought and expression of sentiperfect harmony has prevailed in all the deliberations and decisions of the Annual Councils of the Church. No distinction of parties is practically known, feared or courted, but Christ is the focus.

Our Rt. Rev. Father in God possesses the affections and entire confidence of his Clergy, and the Clergy possess the confidence and share the benefactions of a liberal and energetic Laity. The Diocese is rapidly increasing in importance. Its location, as a connecting link between the overflowing wealth and population of the East, and the unlimited resources and extent of the West—the fertility of its soil and the enterprise of its inhabitants, make it a place of great importance to the Church, for the day is not far distant, when multitudes, from its crowded villages and cities, will be onward in that tide of emigration, which now does, and will always find a channel in the deep waters of the surrounding lakes or across its iron pathways. While the peace and prosperity of the Church in this Diocese is a just cause of gratitude and rejoicing, none can look upon her present wants or future prospects without a feeling of sadness. The demands for our services are so numerous and urgent, that, if suitable Clergymen could be obtained, and in part supported, the number of parishes within one year be doubled. Such however, is the state of the Missionary funds, that the General Board have been compelled, though reluctantly, to diminish, rather than increase its appropriations to us. The Church of Christ, like Lazarus at the gate of Dives, is famishing for the “crumbs which fall from the rich man’s table.”

There have been added to the Church by the Holy Sacrament of Baptism, 562, of which 126 were adults. Three Churches have been consecrated; four are in the process of erection, and many others have been repaired and much improved.

There are 29 parishes; two places of worship, where the services of the Church are regularly performed—one for sailors, the other for persons of color; and many stations where the Clergy and other Missionaries occasionally officiate. The number of Clergy is 29—seven have been dismissed to other Dioceses, and seven have been received from others—one has been graduated. There are four Candidates for Orders; five have been ordained Deacons, and two Deacons ordained Priests. There are about 1,200 Communicants. On account of the Bishop’s absence, to perform Episcopal Service in the Diocese of New York, the Confirmations of 1815 do not appear reported in that year’s Journal. In 1816 and ‘47, there were 249 Confirmations.

The vacant parishes are the following:

Christ Church, Adrian; St. James’s Church, Albion; St. Michael and All Angels’ Church, Cambridge; St. James’s Church, Constantine; St. James’s Church, Dexter; St. John’s Church, Ionia; Trinity Church, Monroe; St. John’s Church, Wythe.

Questions about the Forms of the Church.*

“Let all things be done decently, and in order.”—1 Cor. xiv. 40.

Since it is spiritual worship which God requires (John does not the Church of England direct too minutely and unnecessarily concerning forms, which are merely “bodily exercise,” and as such unprofitable?—We think not: 1. Because the Church, consisting of soul and body, is required to serve God with the body (Cor. vi. 20). 2. Because in that system of religion (the Church) which was in all parts ordained by God himself, there is required a strict attention to numerous forms. 3. Because the Lord and the apostles (themselves most careful to observe the forms and suitable gestures) never rebuked others for acting similarly. 4. Because the second commandment, which bids us to bow before an image, is justly considered as directing us to adore outwardly the true and living God; for, if it be a mockery to give honour to an image by a bodily action, it is irreverence to omit such homage to the Lord. 5. Because it is needful that a church should so direct certain forms, that “all things be done decently and in order” (as St. Paul commands); otherwise there must be confusion (which he assures). 6. Because experience shows that the spirit of the Church is much influenced and affected by the body, indolent poses soon causing apathy, while alert movements and well-regulated positions maintain animation and preserve attention.

II. Are the postures of the body, as directed by the church, scripturally selected?—Yes; since we are instructed to kneel when we pray (as Christ himself did, Luke xxii.), to stand when we praise (as both the Jewish, Rev. ix. and the triumphant churches, Rev. vii. are represented), which is respectful; to sit when we are learning (as Jesus did, and permitted, Luke ii. 46, iii. 16, &c.), which is obedient.

III. Why are the ministers and people directed to change their postures so frequently?—For the same reason that the nature of the public worship is so varied, changing from confession, to prayer, to praise, to instruction, namely, to keep attention alive, and to recall wandering thoughts.

IV. Why are the members of the church required to bow the head, when Jesus is named in the creeds?—We are not required to do this, but merely (in one of the ancient canons or rules) commanded, in this way “to testify our acknowledgments that he is the true Son of God, the only Saviour of the world.” Surely, those who believe this important truth should not object to show homage now, which at the end of the world all creation will openly confess, according to Isa. xlv. and Rom. xiv.

V. Why use the gesture of bowing the head?—I. Because among men this is the usual and most expressive mode of showing dutiful respect. 2. Because such homage is predicted to become universal. 3. Because history informs us that the early Christians devoutly attended to that mark of respect. 4. Because, when Arianism afterwards prevailed, that was the test adopted by those who believed Jesus to be God.

VI. Why bow the head when Jesus only (the second Person of the Godhead) is named, and not also when you profess belief in the Father and the Spirit?—1. Because it has been predicted of him alone. 2. Because He only of the sacred Three was made man, and became despised of men. 3. Because it was about His divinity only that any controversy existed.

VII. Why bow thus in honor of Jesus at the repeating of the creeds only, and not at every mention of His name?—1. Not to multiply ceremonies too much. 2. Because, when we name Him in prayer, His great majesty and powers are admitted. 3. When named in the creeds, it is in connexion with a statement of His earthly humiliations, which is a most fitting occasion to declare belief in his full divinity; therefore we adopt this sign of respect to Christ, because the Arians haughtily refused it; and we introduce it seldom, because Romanists superstitiously observed it.

VIII. Why are your ministers directed to make the sign of the cross at baptism, this not being commanded by Christ when he ordained the sacred rite?—The reason is stated at the time the sign or symbol is introduced, namely, to be a token that afterwards the person baptized shall not be ashamed of Christ crucified, and that he will prove himself a faithful soldier under the banner of the cross.

IX. Does not this ceremony savour somewhat of popery?—Not in the least; because the pious custom existed many centuries before any of the popish errors were known, and was recommended and practised by the earliest and most pious fathers of the Church.

X. What was the origin of the practice?—The ancient habit of imprinting or branding marks on the bodies of those who enlisted in the service of kings, to show the connexion which existed.

XI. Perhaps this was merely a heathen and unholy custom?—This cannot be alleged, because the figure or emblem has been significantly introduced into scripture, for the purpose of expressing privilege and solemn dedication (see Ezek. ix.; Rev. vii., ix., xvii.), which fact imparts a hallowed character to the ancient usage: moreover, St. Paul (as written in Gal. xi.) declared that “he bore in his body the mark of the Lord Jesus;” and, again, that “he would glory in His cross.”

XII. Is this sign considered essential or necessary to baptism?—By no means! 1. Because in private baptism (which is full and perfect) it is not used. 2. Because it is after the child has been baptized publicly that the symbol is made in the presence of the congregation.—R. M. Ch. of Eng. Mag.

Communications.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:

Please inform your inquiring friend that a Steel bar is a wretched substitute for a Church bell, only a little better than a tin kettle! This comes from

ONE WHO KNOWS.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—

Your cotemporary of the “Christian Witness,” following in the wake of a correspondent of the “Calendar,” has been criticising, with a temper not the most becoming, the religious services in Burlington College Chapel, on the Festival of the Nativity.

The act which has excited his pious indignation, is thus recorded in “The Missionary,” a monthly Diocesan paper published by the Bishop of New Jersey.

“The Bishop, accompanied by the head Master and the Librarian, and the Rev. Mr. Germain, and Dr. Ver Mehr, said the early prayers. The music was admirable. The Gloria in Excelsis, the Venite and Adeste Fideles were chanted in Latin.”

The authority of the Church which is quoted as opposed to, or condemning, the chanting in Latin, which is the length, and breadth, and depth, of the offence, is her xxiv article. Here it is.

“Art. xxiv. Of Speaking in the Congregation in such a Tongue as the people understandeth.”

“It is a thing plainly repugnant to the word of God, and the custom of the Primitive Church, to have public prayer in the Church, or to minister the Sacraments, in a tongue not understood of the people.”

Tell me, ye critics, gentlemen of the “Calendar” and “Witness,” in what language does the article authorize and require public prayer to be said? In Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, German, Spanish, French or English? Or in which of “all the speeches of this babbling earth” does it forbid them to be said?

I pray you answer me these questions; and if you cannot do it, admit that your authority has failed to sustain you, and before you again read lectures to your superiors, be very sure you are right, and spare your modesty the mortification of being abashed at your erring presumption.

The article quoted, does not condemn saying public prayer in Latin, more than in any other language; but it does condemn the practice of the Romish Church which requires them to be said “in a tongue not understood of the people.”

It would be a violation of the article to say public prayers in English, if the people who heard them did not understand the language; and it would be conforming to the requirement of the article, to say them in Latin, if the people who heard them did understand it.

The article simply requires that public prayer shall be said in a tongue which the people understand, that they may take their proper part in the celebration of Divine worship. If it be not so, why expend so much time and money to have the Prayer Book translated into French, German and other tongues?

Would you have the congregation of French Protestant Episcopalians, which worship in New York, use the English Prayer Book? Why then have it translated into French for their use? Or the Germans, would you have them use the English Prayer Book, which they do not understand, in their public worship; or the German translation of it, which the Church has provided especially for their use, that they may worship with edification? Perhaps you may say these illustrations are not analogous to the case of the College boys who know the English language. They are not intended to apply to that case, but to your singular use of the Article, which you seem to make require the prayers of the Church to be said in some particular tongue, which, however, you have wisely forbidden to name.

It is not many months since Divine Service was celebrated in St. Andrew’s Church in this city, when the prayers were said, and the sermon preached in French. No one, I believe, ever objected to that. Can you tell me what difference there would have been had the same services been said in Latin; for in both cases they would probably have been understood by nearly an equal number of those present.

Mr. Editor, your captious cotemporary, and critic, the “Christian Witness,” had better learn what “the wholesome teaching of our mother the Church” is, before he chides those, his superiors, as disobedient children, whom if he would reverently follow, he would walk more safely and obediently, and especially would he be taught by example, the important duty, which is so much overlooked now-a-days, of studying to be quiet, and mind our own business.

A singular feature in this blind attack upon the Bishop of New Jersey must not be unnoticed. The authors of it have been obliged to fortify themselves behind the “Catholic Herald.” O shame, that the Editors of, and writers for, Church papers, should be willing to use the munition derived from such a source, with which to reproach a Bishop of their Church! I wish them repentance and better minds.

On the occasion at Burlington College, which has so warmed the zeal, and opened the anticipating eyes of some among us, public prayer was not said in Latin—though I do not see why it might not have been, for all would have understood it—but some parts of the service were chanted in that tongue. The object I suppose to have been, to familiarize the scholars with the use of the language, to teach them to speak it fluently and correctly, and as one mean to that end, I do not know a better. The Latin is called a dead language, but if it be used at Burlington College it will be revived, reanimated, made to live; there is nothing dead there; all is vitality; even the dead languages, we find, are made to speak their Maker’s praise.

Why should not all the languages which are taught there, be made to perform, in their turns, the same office. Why should not each child be taught to worship in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, Spanish, Italian and English, all of which are learned within the College walls, and learned too, not as amusement, but for use.

But enough; it is no pleasure to me to reply to such attacks as those I have thought proper thus to notice; they manifest a thoughtlessness, or a recklessness, on the part of their authors, inexcusable in any one, and especially in those who occupy their positions, and are calculated, so far as they may have any effect, to injure a young and most promising Seminary of the Church. They deserve therefore to be sternly rebuked, and if I had the authority to do so, I should administer it.

A LAYMAN.

For the Banner of the Cross.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

I can hardly express to you the comfort derived by me from the communication in your last signed G. in which we are told that Philadelphia is at length to have a Church. To be sure I always thought we had a good many churches here among us, and never reflected that our Bishop, was constantly violating Rubrics in the consecration of buildings which were not churches by the use of a solemn service “For the consecration of a church or chapel;” but since such has been the case I am comforted with the thought that he will have a chance for once at least of doing his duty and using the service for the purpose for which it was designed. But my dear Mr. Editor, my joy is mingled with fear. I dread that when this real church is built we shall not be able to enjoy its beauties, or at least that we shall be delayed in participating of its capabilities by a defect in our prayer book. For I find from the communication of G. that the church is to be put under the patronage of St. Mark! Now sir we have no form in our Prayer Book for that service. We have a form for consecrating the whole building to the worship of Almighty God—but no authorized way of invoking the protection of its patron saint. Perhaps this is provided for and alluded to by G. in his declaration that “orientation” shall be preserved! Not finding any such word in my dictionary I am at a loss to know what it means, but suppose it must refer to some Eastern mode of making saints patrons of churches. If this is so, my mind will be much relieved by the knowledge that a way exists in which we can do all things decently and in order, and secure a patron to the proposed building in a rubrical and churchman-like manner.

I find Christ Church is reckoned by G. a Church (though the only one in our city) which has “the essential parts of a church.” But I am afraid even this Church is essentially defective, for after inquiring diligently of the Rector, church wardens, sexton and other authorities, I can’t find that Christ Church has any “Sacristy.” How great then the need of having one church in our midst worth then in.

A friend at my elbow suggests that “orientation” may mean nothing more than placing the building East and West, and “Sacristy” signify “vestry room”! If this be so the matter is altered. We have a good deal of east and west in our city, “enormities of modern erection,” and all of these I believe have “vestry rooms.” But my friend gives me no light on the subject of Patron Saints. Patron (says Richardson) signifies “a protector or defender, one who guards, supports or maintains the cause, the interests, advancement or advantages of another;” and Blackstone writes “advowson—advocatio signifies, in clientelam recipere, the asking into protection, and therefore is synonymous with patronage, patronatus; and he who has the right of advowson is called patron of the church!” Is St. Mark to have the right of advowson on the building about to be erected? If so how is it to be given him? If the thing is to be done I do hope it may be done rubrically. Do not let us have a real church ruined by any irregular and extemporaneous dedications.

NEOPHYTE.

Rev. H. J. Morton.

*By a late clergyman of the diocese of Armagh.

Against works of this class, in general, we think many serious objections may be urged. There is sufficient excitement in controversy itself, without calling in the aid of imagination, to increase our horror of the issue of wrong principles and false doctrines. There is already sufficient danger of transferring our hatred of evil principles to the individuals who are guided by them. Controversy should deal as much as possible with right and wrong, in the abstract. In controversial works of fiction, these good or evil principles are furnished with imaginary flesh and blood, and become incarnate. And our abhorrence is often more excited against the individual whose actions we detest, than against the principles which animate the wicked one. Thus these fictions encourage the too prevalent disposition of our day, to hate the man whom we think to be wrong, rather than the principles which make him so.

Again, there is fearful danger in associating the great and solemn verities of religion with fiction, especially if it be of an improbable or exaggerated kind. The great defect in the faith of our day is its deficiency in a strong sense of the reality of eternal things. With those who are guided more by sight than by faith, the unseen is the unreal. The practical effect of this lack of a realizing sense in spiritual matters, is discovered in the greater hold which worldly duties, and the things of earth, have upon the Christian heart. Will not this fearful deficiency be increased by associating the principles, truths, and practical doctrines of our Holy Faith with the creations of fiction, often most improbable and sometimes altogether incredible?

Besides, in reading an exciting narrative when the mind is hurried along its current of events, there is little disposition or ability to pause and reflect upon the important truths presented. We become impatient when the history is stopped by long discussions. The ablest and most powerful discourses of heroes and heroines, or their theological disputes, are annoying interruptions. Our minds are not eagerly bent upon searching for the truth, but upon following up the fiction! We want to know whether the heroes die or get married, whether the villains are hung or escape, and whether the good or evil triumphs. Therefore we argue that a book, filled with perilous adventures, thrilling incidents, bloodshed, crime, and misery, is not the place for the calm discussion of theological truth, and in following its stirring narrative, we are not very likely to arrive at the just conclusions of sober reason and sound judgment.

"Hawkstone," is a work showing great powers. It is a learned book, a most interesting one, and one which will be read. Its discussions are all able, its conclusions are for the most part right, and, as a work of fiction, parts of it are truthful and natural. But it is a narrative filled with improbabilities. We do not believe such things ever have happened, and we have some hope they never will happen. Some of its opinions are, in our esteem, as much exaggerated as its incidents. A drama might be extracted from it which would suit the horror loving taste of the day; and of what is left, with some modification, might be made a most instructive treatise and discussion upon the Church, vindicating and asserting her noble system, against the extreme errors by which she is opposed from within and without.

In another part of our paper will be found extracts from this work which will enable our readers to form a partial judgment for themselves. Those who wish a further opportunity must obtain it from the work itself.

To the Messrs. Appletons we are indebted for a copy. It is published in New York, by Stanford & Swords, 139 Broadway.

Obituary.

Died, in Burlington, on the 10th instant, Miss Rachael Bradford Wallace, in the 64th year of her age.—The death of this excellent lady leaves a void in many hearts, which time will never fill. A daughter of the venerable Joshua Maddox Wallace, who was long identified in this community, with all that was most eminent, in piety, hospitality and charity, she continued among us the virtues, with the name, which she inherited. Of the kindest and most unselfish nature, her delight was chiefly in doing good. The poor, the sick, and the afflicted were all familiar with her face; and will never lose her from their memory. Slow and careful in her attachments, she was the firmest and most faithful of friends. Born and nurtured in the Church, she loved its very shadow more than all the abodes of men. She was never absent from its services, and never indifferent to its interests. Her piety was of primitive stamp; unostentatious, quiet, and self-abasing. She, literally, thought every other better than herself. One of her latest acts was the eucharistic commemoration of the Saviour, whom she adored and loved, on the evening of Ash Wednesday. Her latest words were words of self distrust, and of meek confidence in Christ. Her dying moments were attended, with the consolations and commendation of the Church, by her Bishop, Pastor and friend. And her last breath was breathed out with these sweetest words of the closing benediction, "peace both now and evermore!" She sleeps among her kindred in the quiet church-yard of St. Mary's, where her first vows were paid, and her last prayers offered, in the service of her confidence and joy. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; for they rest from their labours."

Ecclesiological Society.

At a meeting of some of the Clergy and Laity, held in the Seminary Buildings, on Friday, the 3d inst., an Ecclesiological Society was organized. After the adoption of laws, the Rev. Dr. Forbes was elected President, and the Society's Committee were appointed. Mr. Frank Willis was chosen Architect, and the election of Vice Presidents was postponed until a future meeting. It is now thought desirable to give to the Church generally a copy of the laws by which the Society will be governed, and some account of its intended operation. For this purpose we request the publication of the following document:

A Statement of the Object and Intended Operations of the Society, Read and Adopted at its Primary Meeting.

"The object of the Society shall be, to promote the study of Ecclesiastical Architecture and Antiquities."

The great want of some competent body in this country, to give advice in questions of Church Architecture and Church Arrangement, has led many, both of the Clergy and of the Laity, earnestly to desire the formation here of an Ecclesiological Society, to which those who were in want of information might apply, and which should become the vehicle for diffusing a truer and more extended knowledge of the subject through the Church.

With a view to the formation of such a Society, a body of laws has been drawn up; but as they do not enter into detail as regards the object and intended operations of the Society, it was thought best to lay these briefly but clearly before this meeting.

The great advancement which has been made, within the last ten years, in the study of Church Architecture, is due mainly, if not entirely, under God, to the efforts of the English Ecclesiological Societies; and this advance has been made by them chiefly by their thorough and careful study of the old Parish Churches and other Ecclesiastical buildings of England. From this means of acquiring knowledge, we are cut off. We must, therefore, for the present, have recourse to books—especially the publications of the English Societies, whose footsteps we must be content, for the present, to follow; not taking them implicitly as guides, but looking to them as our principal source of information.

The Society's first object, then, will be the collection of a complete Ecclesiological Library, embracing all the publications of the societies in England, all the best works on Church Architecture and Church Arrangement, and also those on Decorative Painting and Church Music, as well as any other works which bear on the general subject. The publications and transactions of the English Societies will probably be presented to us. If not, the Society must purchase them. To an Ecclesiological Society in this country, a complete library is essential, and the forming of it should be the first thing attended to. This collecting of a library, however, is but a preparatory step, though a necessary one, towards the ultimate object of the Society—the diffusion, through our branch of the Church, of a purer taste and greater knowledge in Ecclesiastical Architecture. The principal duty of the Society, for the present, will be the furnishing of information on questions of Church Architecture, Church Arrangement, &c., to all that apply to it; but as its means increase, its influence will also be extended by the publication of such works as shall from time to time be thought best.

The reading of original papers before the Society, will, it is hoped, elicit much valuable information, which will thus be spread among its members.

In addition to this, it is recommended that there be a periodical published, either monthly or every two months, under the direction of the Committee. The greater part of this publication would, for the present, consist of a reprint of the most important and practical articles in the back numbers of the "Ecclesiologist." A portion would be reserved for original articles; another for notices of new Churches, and a fourth for the answers to correspondents.

The Laws of the New York Ecclesiological Society.

I. The Society shall be called "The New York Ecclesiological Society."

II. The object of the Society shall be, to promote the study of Ecclesiastical Architecture and Antiquities.

III. Church membership shall be required of all who would become members of the Society.

IV. The Society shall consist of a President, Vice Presidents, an Architect, Honorary and Ordinary members.

All members shall be elected either by the Society by ballot, or the nomination of a single member, approved by the Committee; or, during the recess of the Society, by the unanimous vote of the Committee on the nomination of three members. In either case, the form of nomination shall be as follows:

I, (or we,) the undersigned, do hereby recommend—, of —, to be a member of the New York Ecclesiological Society, believing him to be disposed to aid its designs.

(Signed.)

V. Every Bishop becoming a member of the Society shall be ex-officio Patron of the Society.

VI. Every member shall pay an annual subscription of Five Dollars, to be due on the first of January in each year. Any member may compound for all future subscriptions by one payment of Fifty Dollars.

VII. If any member's subscription be in arrear for one year, he may be removed from the Society after due notice, at the discretion of the Committee. No member shall be considered entitled to his privileges as a member whose subscription is in arrear.

VIII. The affairs of the Society shall be conducted by a Committee of six members, three of whom shall be clergymen. They shall be elected at the Anniversary meeting, in the month of May, in each year, (the day and place being appointed by the Committee;) and of them three at least shall have been members of the Committee of the preceding year. The Committee so elected may subsequently add to their number.

IX. The Committee shall elect out of their number a Chairman, a Treasurer, and not more than three Secretaries.

The President, and such of the Vice Presidents as are pleased to attend, are members of the Committee. Any other member of the Society may attend the regular meetings of the Committee, but shall have no voice nor vote in their proceedings.

Two members, not being members of the Committee, shall be chosen annually by the Society, at the same time with the Committee, to audit the Society's account.

XI. The Society shall meet on the first Monday in January, April, July and October, in such place as the Committee shall appoint; and at every such meeting an original paper shall be read on a subject, and by a member appointed at a previous quarterly meeting.

The Committee shall have power, at any time, to call a meeting of the Society.

XII. The Officer in the Chair shall be sole interpreter of the Laws, and shall have unlimited authority in every question of order.

XIII. The regular meetings of the Committee shall be held on the first Monday of each month.

XIV. These Laws shall not be altered except at a stated meeting of the Society, and upon a vote of two thirds of all its ordinary members.

This Society, as will now be seen, is not to be confined to any particular city or diocese, although it has its centre in New York. We therefore earnestly invite the interests and active co-operation of all Churchmen who may be disposed to aid our design, trusting in this way to serve the Church of Christ and the glory of God.

In behalf of the Society,

THOMAS S. PRESTON,

Recording Secretary.

The Late Major Vinton.

A recent number of the American Review contained an interesting sketch of the life of Major John R. Vinton, of Rhode Island, who fell during the bombardment of Vera Cruz, and was remarkable for being not only a brave and gallant soldier, but a man of unobtrusive and most scrupulous piety. The following is an extract from the article in the Review.

"While in Florida in the prosecution of the war, his mind came under the influence of religion far more than ever before. His whole soul was warmed into a new life, and for a while, like the bewildered Apostles, he seemed to 'stand gazing up into heaven.' His journal and letters during this period are of the most intensely interesting character. Nothing in the famed life of Martyn, more touches the heart, than the humility, self-accusation, and child-like devotedness of the high-minded heroic man. At a secluded post, in the midst of the interminable pine forests, the solitude and silence of which he describes as awful and almost oppressive, far from his family and friends, his mind and affections ripened into the highest state of Christian experience and discipline. He then turned his thoughts, or rather, they were turned for him, towards the office of the Christian ministry. His letters are full of doubts, hopes, and plans for taking Holy Orders. He fears that his health will not enable him to follow a sedentary life; he doubts his fitness; fears that selfish motives, the prospect of being with his family and friends, may combine with others; and examines himself in the most thorough and humble manner."

"In a letter from Fort Taylor, he says:—'Since I have been here, which is five or six weeks, the following has been my daily course: rise at reveille; private devotions; study Greek and Hebrew; walk to my palmetto temple, a mile distant; Church service aloud; return to reading; dinner; reading aloud with Major G.; study Greek an hour; walk with Major G. to palmetto temple; social prayer and hymn; return to tea; Bible class of twenty soldiers and two or three officers, in the evening; after tattoo, retire to my tent; Greek and Hebrew or religious reading; private devotions and bed. On Sundays we have public worship, with good attendance from the men and officers, the Major and I officiating alternately. Our interruptions are so few, that the foregoing routine is carried on with great regularity day after day.' It is proper to remark, that this is from a letter written to one whom he had selected as a confidential adviser in his religious habits and studies."

We were recently favoured with the perusal of the following lines by the late Major Vinton, descriptive of the palmetto temple above alluded to. They were in the possession of the estimable lady of the gallant officer spoken of in the extract from the A. Review, as his fellow-worshipper, in this natural temple with its columns and arches of living trunks and boughs, its green sward floor, and roof of graceful foliage through which came gleams of sunshine, like the glory which rested upon the tabernacle of old. They have never appeared in print. And thinking their intrinsic beauty, as well as the melancholy interest which they derive from their author, might recommend them for insertion in your interesting journal, we expressed a wish for their publication, and have been obligingly permitted to copy them.

THE PALMETTO TEMPLE.

Here in this deep palmetto shade,
Where christian foot has never trod!
This Temple which no man has made,
(With rustic dome and colonnade)—
Here let us worship God!

Around the wild green prairie glows
As broad and clear as yonder skies—
Here where the field no culture knows,
Where hymns of homage never rose,
Our orisons shall rise.

Though freely spread from year to year,
Our God His bounteous love displays:
(In vain His lavished gifts appear)
No grateful heart to feel is here,
No voice to lisp His praise!

Here nature's gems so richly spent;
Have erst to thankless hearts been given;
The savage—like the brute content,
Keen for his prey, his eyes are bent,
But never turned to Heaven.

But now we'll break this darksome spell,
Let heathen silence reign no more—
Full on the air let anthems swell,
And echo to the wilds shall tell
God and the Lamb adore.

The Attitude for Receiving the Eucharist.

EDITOR:

is of course well known to your readers that some denominations contend for the sitting posture at the holy communion, the one used by our Lord and the twelve at its first celebration. Not that their men of learning do not know better; but they suffer their uninformed brethren to think so; and some go far as to encourage them in this mistake. Paintings and statues, even from great masters, further the deception. The figure actually assumed at the first Eucharist was reclining or lying down; or possibly, as the rabbies declare, a mixed one, combining the oriental sitting on the bent legs, not on a chair or stool, with recumbency; the former is most probable. Chairs, stools, and benches, are not found in the East, till you reach the Far East, China. Our sitting attitude has no authority whatever in the position of the body at the holy supper is of no importance, is plain. At the first celebration of the Eucharist, it was eaten standing. In our Saviour's time, however, recumbency had been substituted; that being the table-posture of the Romans, who had subjugated Judea. But recumbency did not originate with the Romans. Before the city of Rome was founded, the Prophet Amos (vi.) records incidentally the practice,—“that lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the stall, and calves out of the midst of the stall that drink in bowls the banquet of them that stretched themselves shall be removed.” the censure is not of the viands or of the manner of social eating, in themselves, but as being inconsistent and irreverent in the two nations, Judah and Israel, and “Samaria,” over whom public calamity, sharp reproaches, and threatened by divinely commissioned prophets. At present, we are only concerned with the fact, that recumbency was a table-posture in Palestine before the birth of our Saviour, and more than seven centuries before the birth of our Saviour. How widely it then prevailed, we know not, except as we may infer its extent from the great numbers who were in “ease in Zion,” and “put far away the evil day.” After the Roman conquest, the custom appears to have been general.

At the “feast” made by Ahasuerus, (Esther;) “the beds of gold and silver,” &c., i. e. the ornaments and drapery of the beds or couches and their fabrics, as they had been of “gold and silver” two centuries and a half before. And at the “banquet” of Queen Esther, (vii.) “Haman was fallen upon the bed whereon Esther was;” the appalled man, rose from his own couch at the feast, and “stood up to make request for his life before the queen,” but, while thus entreating mercy at her feet, he was overpowered by his extreme conster-tion, and “fell” upon it.* Here again, we have the recumbent table-posture, when Rome was in comparative youth,— one three hundred years in fact before the custom obtained here, about the second Punic war.

Virgil, upon what authority I know not, assigns this table-posture to Dido and her guests at the feast she made for Aeneas,—though some transmute the language as is done in the translation, and represent them as sitting on couches or beds. The poet implies reclining; and, if not merely poetical, carry back the custom to some three or four centuries earlier than Amos.
The queen “aurea composuit sponda,” placed or adjusted herself on a golden bed: the Trojan youth came, “stratogue super cumbitur ostro,” lie down on the spread [couch of] purple:
(En. i. 698, 700;) and when their leader opened his narrative, “pater Aeneas sic orsus ab alto,” thus began from his elated couch. (En. ii. 2.) That Virgil meant the recumbent posture seems evident, however he may have taken advantage of the poetic license. Equally plain it is, that translators, who have no license, assume a large one whether with classical poets or with holy scripture. Dryden had the poetic privilege, and has neutralized that of Virgil.

The same eating posture is found likewise in Tobit ii. 1, and dith xii. 15, both wrongly translated. And “other examples might be given,” says Dr. Campbell, “that this fashion was introduced [among the Jews] by the Greeks,” but it was introduced much earlier adopted by at least a portion of them.
More passages of the New Testament are involved in this erroneous translation than would be imagined without a search: and the following probably is incomplete. At the house of Levi, Jesus and the company “reclined at meat.” Twice our Lord fed the multitudes, the five thousand and the four thousand, when they lay on the ground or grass, not sat. Twice were His feet anointed, by the penitent woman and by Mary, when He reclined at meat: they did not creep under the table to reach the feet of a sitting person, but stood at the bottom of the table, where his feet were. Our Saviour, at the double paschal solemnity, washed the feet of the apostles; which, as just mentioned, lay from the table, instead of being under it. At that solemnity, the beloved disciple “was leaning on Jesus’ bosom;” for the reclining was partly on one side, so that the companion who lay next in front was near the personage lying at the head of the table, and by a slight movement might touch his bosom and “lean” upon it. The whole rows of guests at a table might indeed be regarded as thus lying in the bosom of the master of the feast; just as the departed godly are represented as “in the bosom of Abraham,” the father of the faithful. These all, from the East and the West, it is declared “lie (not sit) down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God.” Add to these, “shall make them to lie down to meat,”—“whether is greater, he that lieth at meat; or he that serveth,”—“if a man see thee who hast knowledge lie at meat in the idol’s temple.” The crowning example is, of course, the reclining of our Saviour and His chosen twelve at the first Eucharistic table.

It is said that Luther, translating the New Testament, was the first to change the original word “reclined” into “sat.”
The substitution was unfortunate, as keeping all but the learned ignorant of this very ancient table-posture, without a knowledge of which many parts of scripture cannot be understood.
And it is lamentably unfortunate, in the further result of a cavil against the most reverent posture at the highest ordinance of the Christian religion, and the apparent grounding of that cavil on the gospel itself. The custom of walking abroad on the “housetops” (roofs would be more vernacular) is as little known to us and in England, and most of the countries in Europe, as that of “lying down” at meals; and, if our notions were not forestalled, we should account that usage quite as singular, in reading the Bible, as we would that of reclining on a couch at a dinner or supper table. What idea of the very words of the Holy Spirit could we form, were our Lord’s injunctions translated,—the one, “what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye in the public walks,” giving at once the idea, to Parisians, “on the boulevards,” to New Yorkers, “in the Park,” to Philadelphians, “in the State House Yard,”—the other, “let not him who is upon the thoroughfares (suggesting Broadway or Chestnut street) go in to take any thing out of his house.” Our practical ignorance of Eastern customs is quite as fair a reason for these translations as for the other, picturing to the thought chairs, stools, and long or short benches. And at the period when the version was made, the ignorance was far greater, there being fewer travellers in the East, fewer of their books, fewer readers, —to say nothing of rightly conducted Bible classes, or of a panorama of Jerusalem, showing to hundreds of thousands (apt to view it however as a curiosity rather than a custom) that the “house-tops” were so public as to be a place for shop-keeping, and for the administration of justice, even to the infliction of the bastinado.* Yet the rendering was faithfully made concerning this, and unfaithfully concerning that: and in the time of James I, when the present authorised version was set forth, the error had acquired an inauspicious moment,—a consideration which precludes an entire acquiescence in the apology made for it by Campbell, who throws the blame on those which preceded it,—“If the first translators of the Bible into English had thought fit, in this instance, to keep close to the original, the phrases would not now have sounded awkwardly.” (Prelim.
Diss. 8.) At that early period, Puritanism was not the thorn in the Church which it was becoming at the later one: and unflinching probity should have despised all temporising with God’s record, and cancelled the once comparatively excusable mistake.

Though the passover was observed for nearly fifteen hundred years, there is no entry of the posture of receiving it (I think) except at the first and the last celebrations: at the one, standing; at the other, lying down. It never was received sitting.

But it is alleged, that, as reclining was the ordinary table-posture when the Eucharist was instituted, so the ordinary table-posture of later centuries, sitting, should now be conformed to.
This however is a mere verbal fallacy. Reclining was the posture for meals; and for meals sitting is the present posture:
whereas the Lord’s Supper is not a meal; and St. Paul bade the Corinthians discard the meal they had obtruded upon it.
The meal proper was over, before the new sacrament was superinduced, and the first or Jewish “cup” had passed round; (Luke xxii. 17.) and then the bread and the Christian “cup” were distributed. That “cup” is expressly declared by Luke and Paul to have been given “after supper;” and every one knows that the principal food of the meal was the lamb; nor can it reasonably be supposed that the bread and the wine of the superior ordinance were administered at a needless interval.
The viands were, however, to sense, a mere appendage to the meal, though to faith a solemnity infinitely more important; and the meal-posture (so it should be called) could not well be changed to kneeling, for the meal-couches were heavy and cumbersome, not to be gently turned aside like chairs, or quietly thrust back like benches. Nor were the two passovers, the old and the new, to be separated, when the former was merged in the latter. And hence the posture at the first Eucharist was accidental,—a complete answer to those who object thus to kneeling,—and also ample proof that the attitude is never of intrinsic importance.

Yet it has a due measure of importance. As in other cases, there is a right and a wrong, though neither be vital. The Holy Supper, as before remarked, is the highest act of Christian worship; and therefore it demands the most reverent attitude of devotion. Sitting is not a devotional attitude; it never was, except as combined with kneeling, in an oriental posture, (see Calmet, v. 4, p. 264.) and except probably at the older sacrificial feasts, which however were hearty meals. The chief posture of worship has always been KNEELING,† whether

* My own fancy, in childhood, regarded the “preaching” of the apostles on the “house-tops”—as the coming forward of venerable men to the front of flat roofs of one story houses, and there speaking loudly to the passengers in the street below.
Neither years, nor books, nor panoramas have set me quite free from this early-settled imagination.

† Kneeling is employed in idolatry of the wafer, as it is in the idol-worship of the heathen. Those who reject it, for such prostrate or upright; and prostrate kneeling would be the right one for the Eucharist, were it not for the obvious inconvenience in both administering and receiving; which leaves for this ordinance only upright kneeling, sometimes called “standing” in the Bible. In the Apocalypse, the “four and twenty elders,” previously “sitting,” leave that posture to render their act of worship, and “fall down [in prostrate kneeling] before Him that sat on the throne;” which passage discountenances all mere sitting (except for the sick or feeble) in devotion, though it is proper (1 Cor. xiv. 30) during the adjuncts of devotional offices. The principle named is strong enough to settle the question, without looking to others. The most exalted act of adoration requires the most intense devotion; and such devotion implies the most complete devotional attitude, both for the sake of congruity, and as a reasonable part of the act itself.

Maryland.—The Rev. Libertus Van Bokkelen, Rector of St.
Timothy’s Hall, having been received into the Diocese, has been unanimously elected to the Rectorship of St. Timothy’s Church, Baltimore Co., and has accepted the same.

COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES.—The steady growth of this prosperous institution is still continuing. The increase of scholars both demanding and justifying an increased provision for their accommodation, a new building is now in progress, to serve as an additional dormitory, with wash-rooms, &c. underneath.
This is not to supersede the contemplated addition to the College of an entire wing, of substantial and permanent structure.
The present erection is designed only for temporary use, as now appropriated. It will be completed by the 1st of May, and furnish ample quarters for the additional students that are expected.

South Carolina.—Society for the Advancement of Christianity in South Carolina.—The 38th Anniversary—the day before the meeting of the Annual Convention, at St. Michael’s Church, the Rev. W. Dehon, Rector of St. Stephen’s Parish, and the Church of the Epiphany, and Trinity Church in St. John’s Parish, preached the Sermon (which we expect to publish) from the text “Thy kingdom come.” The obligation of the Missionary work—the extent of it in South Carolina, and the peculiar, though not exclusive claims of this branch of Missions, were judiciously and earnestly enforced. The members convened at the Library room, heard the report of the Board of Trustees; appointed a Committee to report amendments to the Constitution; and elected their officers. Several gentlemen became members of this valuable Society on that occasion.

Convention of the Diocese.—The 59th Annual Meeting was held February 9th–11th. “Morning Prayer” was read by the Reverend Rector of Trinity Church, Edgefield—the holy Communion was administered by the Bishop, assisted by the Rector of St. Helena’s, Beaufort, and the two senior Deacons—the alms were collected by the Rector, and Assistant Minister of St. Michael’s, and by a Deacon. The Sermon was by the Rector of St. Paul’s, Radcliffeboro; his text was from ix.
Mark, 50th v.—“Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another,” and his topics, the fault of Diotrophes, who loved the pre-eminence—and the true nature of intolerance. Our readers, we trust, will be gratified by the perusal of it in our next number.

A resolution was passed, recommending “the School of the Diocese” to the patronage of the Church, that it may be enabled to educate the destitute gratuitously, and all others at reduced prices, and that a Sermon and collection be had in behalf of these good objects.

Another resolution was passed, recommending “Calvary Church” intended for the better, but not exclusive, accommodation of the colored people, that largest class of our poor.

of it.—Charleston Gospel Messenger.

FAIR FOR THE CHURCH OF THE REDEMPTION.
The Ladies interested in making and collecting articles for the sale to aid in finishing the Church of the Redemption, are requested to meet at the house of Mrs. Ducachet, No. 8 Girard street, on Monday March 27th, at 12 o'clock, A. M.

A number of Ladies intend holding a Sale during the Easter Holy-days, to aid in finishing the Church of the Redemption, at Fairmount.
As this Church is situated in the midst of a very spiritually destitute neighborhood, all the friends of true religion are earnestly urged to exert themselves in forwarding this enterprise; that through the blessing of God, it may be effectual to the object for which it is undertaken.
Please send your donations to Mrs. Ducachet, No. 8 Girard street, Mrs. Hawkins, No. 35 Clinton street.

Importation of European Books.

GEO. S. APPLETON, Publisher and Importer, 148 Chestnut st., Philadelphia, and 16 Little Britain, London, respectfully informs literary and professional gentlemen, that he still continues the branch of his house in London, as ESTABLISHED IN 1830, and he invites the attention of the friends of literature to the important advantages the establishment affords for the importation of books specially ordered. Among the great variety of publications abroad comparatively few are for sale in this country. A great inconvenience is therefore obviated by this arrangement, as any person may have his order for any particular work, and by the rapid communication of steamers, the work is at hand in a few weeks.
Professors and students of Theology, Law, and Medicine—architects, mechanics, and all who are unable to procure foreign books in our own country, may, for a small commission on the cost, procure any work published in any part of Europe.
G. S. A. has, in addition to the branch in London, an agent in Leipzig, for the supply of all orders for books published throughout Germany—also in Brussels, Paris, Florence and Madrid; so that he is prepared to execute with great fidelity and promptness, all orders entrusted to his care, from any portion of the Continental Book Market.
*The London house is under the immediate superintendence of one of the Mr. Appletons, whose long residence in Europe and an acquaintance with the languages of Germany, France, &c., is a guarantee that all orders they may be favored with will be executed with correctness and on the most favorable terms.

"The Churchman," from 1833 to 1848.

A TEACHER WANTED.

Wanted immediately, a Female Teacher, to take charge of the education of three or four little girls, and to give lessons in Drawing and Painting, and on the Piano, to a few boys. She must be a Communicant of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and bring good testimonials of qualifications, experience in teaching, &c. One who has a good voice, understands Church Music, and can teach singing with the Piano, will be preferred. Apply, post-paid, to the Rev. P. L. Jaques, Rector, St. Matthew's Hall, Port Colden, Warren co., New Jersey. Jan. 22—tf

Just Published by the Episcopal Female Tract Society.

The Blind Slave in the Mines; the Roll Call; Patient Suffering; a Tract upon the Lord's Supper; also, 4 Tracts for boys, viz: The Reward of Disobedience, Truth and Honesty, Tom White, the Post Boy, and a Conversation upon the character of the Prophet Daniel, between Mr. Russell and his Scholars; the last written expressly for American Boys. Those who wish to improve the rising generation, and to curb the riotous and licentious spirit of the youths who infest our streets, especially on the Sabbath Day, might effect some good by purchasing a supply of these tracts, and distributing them, with affectionate exhortations, among these neglected idlers, who are pleased to receive them, and generally listen with respect to the conversations of those who appear to take an interest in their welfare.

They can be procured at the cheap Bookstore of Mr. Simons, at the corner of Fifth and Spruce streets, where purchasers can obtain very valuable books, at a reduced price; and also a variety of useful articles. All the publications of the E. F. Tract Society, which are in print, can be procured there. Tracts are so very cheap, that there are few persons who cannot afford to do good by purchasing a few to distribute. There have been such innumerable demands upon their Depository during the past year, that their gratuitous distribution must necessarily be limited, until they can procure the requisite funds to replenish their stock, by donations, and by their sales.

St. Timothy's Hall, Catonsville, Md., A DIOCESAN SCHOOL FOR BOYS,

REV. L. VAN BORKELEN, A. M., Rector.
Prospectus of this Institution may be obtained by application, per mail, to the Rector. The course of instruction extends from the elements of an English and Classical Education to preparation for the Junior Class of our best Colleges, or for Mercantile pursuits.
Terms, $200 per annum. Vacations in April and October. Nov. 27—eowtf Lays of a Pilgrim.

BY MRS. H. W. RICHTER.

To be spiritually-minded is life and peace."—Rom. viii. 6.

Give us, O Lord, the mind and heart
Above all low terrestrial things;
Affections, that from earth may part,
And mount to Thee on soaring wings;

Hopes, that beyond the grave are seeking
For joys immortal promised there;
Wishes, that earthly chains are breaking,
The soul's eternal rest to share.

Thoughts, that expatiate on that morrow,
Awaiting pilgrims sad and worn,
Where, in the mansions without sorrow,
The countless years of heaven are born.

Give us to know that things of earth
Are gliding—gliding ever by;
How vain, how poor, how little worth,
A spirit's endless destiny!

And, when the billows chafe and roar,
Let there be sunshine in each breast;
Reflected from that far-seen shore
Where all our hopes and wishes rest.

Ch. of Eng. Mag.

FROM LIVES.

A Tale of and for England in 184—

the mean time Bentley had slipped away, soon after Mr. maduke Brook's appearance, and was walking home alone ugh the park, uncomfortable and dissatisfied with himself. had heard things, which he did not like, though why, he ld scarcely explain, and had done things which he felt to wrong, though no one was likely to reproach him with n. And yet what could be better than his motives? There s a population under his care ignorant and turbulent, and ngst whom habits of intoxication, encouraged by the pre- ence of distress and by the gambling spirit of manufacturing oloyment, were rapidly spreading. One after another, pot- se after pothouse in the streets of Hawkstone had been erted into splendid buildings with pillars, and carvings, illuminated interiors, and pawnbrokers' shops opposite, to ply means for the pale, haggard beings who all day long pped in to spend their last pence in purchasing a temporary etfulness from hunger and misery. And without some orts made to check this fountain of evil there was no hope Hawkstone. Why not take advantage of an engine which done so much good in America, and was converting even and, by hundreds at a time, to sobriety and decency? What the harm of men binding themselves by an open resolution o that which was evidently right, and binding themselves together without regard to religious distinctions in a matter ere religious opinions clearly could not alter the duty? ntley was perplexed for the solution, and yet could not make his mind that Temperance Societies were the good thing ich he had once fondly believed. It did not occur to him, no wonder, since no one had taught him, that by God him- , long prior to the nineteenth century, there had been nded a Temperance Society, with its initiatory vow, its ointed officers, its festive meetings, its solemn sanctions; reover with an especial promise of aid and blessing from aven; and that Bentley himself had been created an officer vern this old society, and not to supersede and destroy it any new association of his own, or of human invention: never occurred to Bentley that such a society was the urch. Of the Church as an associated organized body itic, he had entirely lost sight; just as if a subject living in British empire, perhaps a magistrate charged with the ad- ministration of its laws, were to forget some day by any strange lucination that he had already a Sovereign, and a Parliament, statute laws, and tribunals of justice binding him to exe- e his office, and were then to frame or fall under some new- ented constitution and governor set up by a popular enthu- st—continuing all the time to sit on the bench and adminis- justice in the name of the old establishment. Strange contra- dictions and painful perplexities would assuredly arise in such onflict of relations: but not more strange or more painful than se to which Bentley had been exposed, when, as a minister he Church, he had attempted to fulfil an end of the Church means not appointed by the Church, and in conjunction with a who were in open rebellion against it. And why was Bentley not alive to such simple truths? Be- se, as we said before, no one had taught him. He had been ught up as a boy under parents of lax principles, who never spoke to him of religion: from them he had been transplanted to a school, where, with the exception of a dull sermon on the Sunday—a sermon on morality only—and a chapter in the Greek Testament on Monday, in which nothing was thought of but the syntax, religion again was as if it did not exist; and all vice was allowed to flourish, without effort to correct it, if it only had cunning to escape the eye of a master who did not wish to see. From school he went to Cambridge. And here the first germs of his religious feelings began to develop themselves. He was thrown (by accident) among a set of clever cool-headed, profligate young men, who formed themselves into a sort of club, of which the motto, if the spirit had been expressed, would have been a dilemma between Atheism and Pantheism. He was caught by their sparkling vivacity, overawed by their sarcastic pretensions, involved with them in rivalry of mere intellectual power, in which he was encouraged by the hope of obtaining a fellowship, for which nothing but intellectual power was required. And the very studies of the place, engaging him almost solely in mathematical speculations, fostered in him a dry, critical, cold-hearted, sceptical tone of mind, which was prevented from hardening into avowed infidelity, solely by the natural warmth of an affectionate disposition, and the blessing of Providence. The very circumstances of a place of education in which, as at that time was the case unhappily in both universities, the externals of religion had degenerated into empty forms, and yet were still strictly maintained as instruments of College discipline, necessarily engendered doubt as to the sincerity of its professors, and the reality of its system. He saw the chapel service enforced strictly on the pupils, and neglected by the tutors—attendance on it selected as a fit punishment for trivial offences, and a refusal to receive the Holy Communion visited as a sufficient penalty by the most trifling fine. He found himself within the walls of the chapel kneeling side by side with an avowed Socinian, a professed Jew, and an hereditary Roman Catholic. And yet the authorities of the College, without hoping or attempting a conversion, were satisfied with exacting from them all an external act of worship, which, to any sincere believer, either in Socinianism, or Judaism, or Popery, must have been revolting and impious. He attended lectures on divinity, but instead of the positive truth of the Gospel, they turned on grammatical disquisitions, or evidences of Christianity—evidences which, if belief had been strong in the Church, would scarcely have been deemed necessary to be taught. Of ecclesiastical history, of religion either as embodied in a social system, or as a vital habit of the heart, he heard nothing. Church livings and Church patronage were the only forms under which the Church appeared: and its political connexion with a mere Tory party, who upheld it as an instrument of government, rendered it peculiarly obnoxious to the contempt of a liberal Whig; and by liberal Whigs he was surrounded. At this stage in the formation of his character, when he had already done much of which, at a later date, he bitterly repented, and was on the eve of doing worse, it pleased Providence to throw in his way one of those many biographies, with which a peculiar school of divinity has endeavoured to supply the place of the Acta Sanctorum, or Lives of the Saints of Romanism. It was taken up first in mere idleness; but it happened, or rather it was ordained, that it should rouse a train of serious reflection; and Bentley became an altered man. A new world seemed opened to him—a world of feeling and passion, to which the dry, cold associations of his past life gave new zest. The book which first touched his heart was now read again and again with avidity. Others were procured of the same stamp. Hymns, sermons, devotional exercises, preachers, doctrines, all formed on the same model, were at Cambridge within reach, until he had worked himself into a fever of religious excitement, in which remorse and triumph, despair and confidence, love and fear, alternated in strange confusion, and his imagination was filled with a wild phantasmagoria, obscuring all the plain duties and sober realities of life. By degrees this passed away. But still excitement of feeling was the predominant element in his religion. He entered into holy orders with a fervent zeal to redeem, if possible, his past life by an entire devotion to his duty. But of this duty itself he had never formed a clear and definite notion. And notwithstanding his horror of Popery as a religion of forms superseding the vital doctrines of the Gospel by the craft of a priesthood, he fell at the very outset of his ministry into precisely the same error which led to the corruptions of Popery—that of making the object of his ministry to be the salvation of men, instead of the plain, straightforward, uncompromising enunciation of the message committed to his charge. His first thought was man, as if the glory of God depended on man's obedience. And thus he labored for his flock with an energy exhausting his own strength and often defeating its purpose. Night and day, morning and evening, Bentley's thoughts and actions were engaged in devising and executing plans for winning souls to God. Sermons—lectures—visits—exhortations—some new association—a prayer meeting—attractive music in the church, allurements for charity—besides innumerable parochial designs for ameliorating the condition of the poor, in penny clubs, and blanket clubs, and benefit clubs—and then the schools, weekdays and Sundays—the gaol—the workhouse—all these suggested themselves and pressed on him with an anxiety which allowed him no moment of respite for quiet contemplation or scarcely for prayer. Measuring the rectitude of his exertions by their success, and seeing them constantly fail, he was constantly miserable. Every new scheme was seized as gladly if no schemes had been already provided by the Church whose minister he was. A character of bustle, and vacillation, and excitement, pervaded all his undertakings. His best efforts to do good were generally out of place. He was constantly exhorting—constantly debating; bringing religion before men at all times, seasonable or unseasonable, with no rule to guide him but his own conscience; and his conscience could never be at rest.

His very phraseology acquired an affected, technical character which destroyed its force. It was violent without warmth, and strained without power. And singular to say, as he began, so he proceeded; and with all his dread of Popery, which he never ceased to denounce in the strongest and often in improper language, he gradually adopted all the worst principles of Popery, and brought them into action. Like Popery, he endeavoured to bring men to religion by appeals to the fancy, the feelings, the reason, instead of plainly and simply setting before them the truths of God, and leaving them in the hands of God to work their fruit. Like Popery, he learned to look with contempt on the Catholic constitution of the Church, and, if not to despise bishops, at least to depreciate their authority. Like Popery, he formed his own standard of opinion, and fixed his own centre of obedience, instead of submitting to the standard and the centre fixed by God in the Catholic Church. Like Popery, he had his saints and his fathers, recent, indeed, and selected by himself, and canonised by himself on account of their agreement with his own opinions, to whom he deferred implicitly as individual men, while he stigmatised as criminal any reverence for the Fathers of Primitive Christianity. Like Popery, he shut up the Bible from the comprehension of the people. The book, indeed, he distributed abundantly, but as he threw each reader on his own powers of interpretation, and cut off from them the sound comments and typical illustrations of Christian antiquity, he might as well have given it to them in the Arabic text; for what uneducated man could find out the one true doctrine in the variety of possible interpretations, and who could take an interest in a work which he could not understand without assistance, and in which assistance was denied him? Like Popery, he encouraged the growth of a multitude of voluntary self-organised bodies, emancipated from Episcopal control, and which were intended to perform the various functions of the Church, but by a different machinery; just as if a man to whom nature had given legs should insist upon walking upon stilts. Monastic, indeed, they were not; Bentley would have shuddered at the world. But perhaps they had all the evils of monasticism without any of the good, as we may see hereafter. Like Popery again, Bentley preached loudly the doctrine of justification by faith, and practically inculcated justification by works; for he threw men on their own internal emotions, tested their goodness by their feelings, which after all are only works of another kind from alms, fastings, and mortification of the body, but without the advantage of producing like them external good. They produced no good at all. Like Popery, Bentley indulged in forms, and laid on them the greatest stress—forms of speech, forms of intonation of voice, forms of society, abstinence from certain amusements, associations with certain persons, the reading of certain books. Unhappily they were forms of his own creation, or adopted from his party; not the forms of the Catholic Church. Like Popery, Bentley tampered with the Catholic apostolical creed—added to it—omitted from it—fixed his own limits as to what was essential and what non-essential—and denounced an anathema on all who did not subscribe to his peculiar views. Like Popery, Bentley tampered with the sacraments. If monasticism introduced a second baptism, a second vow of obedience, a second commencement of a new life, which invalidated the former, Bentley had his notions of conversion, which went precisely to the same point. If Popery, in order to satisfy a curious reason, explained the mystery of the Holy Communion, by the irreverent theory of transubstantiation, Bentley had his theory likewise, constructed for the same purpose, but equally destroying the nature of a sacrament, by denying the inward grace of it, as Popery denied the outward sign. Bentley had also his confessional; not a private confidential chair, in which he might guide the consciences of his flock, but open confessionals, where he encouraged every one in the presence of every one to recount their spiritual experiences, and throw open to the common gaze that sanctuary of the heart which God has so carefully hidden beneath the veil of diffidence and shame. And this confessional he endeavored to extend, by putting up a box in his church to receive communications from his flock, without the pain or difficulty of personal intercourse. Unhappily, this plan he was obliged to abandon, for just as monks and friars are charged with leading away silly women, so Bentley found his box filled with communications from ladies, who, as any one might naturally expect who knew his real godliness of heart,

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 98 south Fifth street, Philadelphia.

A CLERGY FOR THE UNLEARNED AND RUDE.—As some are disposed to hold us responsible, not only for the sentiments but even for the phraseology of our correspondents, we must be more careful in guarding against such unjust judgments. We would esteem it a novel idea of the liberty of the press, for any individual, be he Editor or not, to refuse to let any sentiments or expressions have place in a Paper, open to contributors, which did not exactly square with his single judgment. This might do in a paper edited by a Pope, or controlled by an Autocrat, it will not answer in a Journal conducted with no such infallible or authoritative pretensions. Still we claim the right, when it seems necessary, of dissenting from the sentiments or expressions of our correspondents.

In the article of "Western," whose views are entitled to regard as those of a practical missionary, there are some observations on the kind of clergy needed in the ruder portions of our country, with which we do not entirely agree. We look with great apprehension upon every movement tending to lower the standard of ministerial attainments, and we cannot think that those uncultivated, either in mind or manners, can be considered "a ministry adapted to the people." Indeed the ruder and more ignorant the people are, the greater need for a higher measure of refinement and learning on the part of those who are not to bring themselves down, but rather to bring the people up, elevating their mental and moral condition by the power of Christian Truth. The fearful errors, and the false systems of religion, so prevalent in the less cultivated regions of this broad land, are doubtless in a great degree, the result of "the blind leading the blind." We regard, with fearful apprehension, any plan whereby a large number of half-instructed teachers, such as we conceive to be the character of "a rough and ready ministry," would be brought into the Church. The advantage of meeting in this way the immediate wants of the vast field in which laborers are needed, is most questionable. Indeed we think the most learned are best qualified to "adapt" themselves to the ignorant, and the most refined to accommodate themselves to the rude and uncultivated. Few better missionaries, to instruct the most ignorant, and to refine the most uncultivated, could be found than "Western" himself. Yet, we may speak of him as one unknown under his assumed name without shocking his modesty, few of our clergy are more cultivated in mind and manners than this advocate of "a rough and ready ministry."

Depend upon it, the true resource of the West and other similar portions of our country is in such Institutions as "Nashotah," of which more will be said in another article. Train up the vigorous and hardy sons of your "Western" soil in such practical schools as these, educate them thoroughly for their great and glorious work, and though "Truth" must wait for her champions to be armed, they will go forth to battle more successfully against "ignorance and prejudice," and be less apt to fall themselves, or to lead others into the toils of Error and Falsehood.

Nashotah.

We are much indebted to the kind friend who has furnished us with the following most interesting extract from a letter, not written for publication. The admirable Institution of which it speaks, commends itself to every true heart, as one of the most efficient and important agents of the Church, in accomplishing Her blessed mission upon earth. It's peculiar excellence, for these parsimonious days, is, that it does so much with so little means. Much as Bishop Kemper has done, in various ways, in the practical missionary work of the church, the wisdom and zeal manifested in the fostering this Institution, will be his greatest honor. And this will be largely shared by the devoted and faithful minister of Christ, who has given to this noble work youthful energy tempered by the wisdom and sound judgment of riper years. May the hearts, and hands, and prayers of the members of the Church be ready to further this blessed enterprise!

Extract of a Letter from the Rev. James Lloyd Breck—Feb. 25th, 1848.

The increased number of our household has made great demands upon our houseroom. Our accommodations have always been narrow, but never so narrow as now. Since the Ordination of the six in June last, there have been twelve additional divinity students received into the institution; these as well as the remaining part of our household, have come to us, not from Wisconsin (for only three Americans have become attached to the institution by reason of a residence in this Territory,) but for the most part have come from the various dioceses—two are from Philadelphia, four from New York, one from Boston, one from Maryland, two from Ohio, one from Mississippi.—Two are Swedes, one is a Dane, one a Norwegian, four are English and one Irish; one is a converted Israelite from St. Croix, and there are three Oneida Indians. Some of our young men are of great promise, and I think they will in due time be valuable men for the Church. I have written to the Secretary of Foreign Missions, stating our readiness to receive three or six native Chinese, to educate for the China Mission. Bishop Boone in a late number of "the Spirit of Missions," expressed his strong desire for such education. There are many constraining reasons to make Nashotah peculiarly happy in training such foreigners; our discipline in the general routine of duties, particularly the labour; our plain (but now, at least) wholesome diet: our experience with those ignorant of our tongue; (two of the Scandinavians could only say "yes and no" when they came to us; three others were very imperfect in our language, two of the Oneidas knew nothing of English,) and lastly the entireness, so to speak, of the Church with us, would greatly tend to establish the Church in the hearts of these far distant people; I have made the offer in all sincerity, and hope it will be received in like manner. In June next, with divine permission, three more of our brothers will be admitted to Holy Orders; an Englishman, this young man has been with us over five years, also an American, four years, and a Dane. In June, also, seven of our young men are expected to be admitted to the Candidatuship. You will perhaps have heard that for want of room, we have made use of our Icehouse! forasmuch as this was built in part by special contribution, it is due that I should here state, that the size of the building was such as to allow of our running a brick wall up through the middle, and then dividing the one half part thereof into four rooms, which are occupied by as many students, by day and by night; the other half part is now filled with ice.

Now, my friend, I must declare to you, that never since the first establishment of this House, has there been so great real contentment as now—there has been uninterrupted good health for almost a year past. It affords me great pleasure to inform you, of the establishment of a Parish school, which is under our charge; the schoolhouse is built upon the mission lands, and the school constitutes another "Committee of labour;" it is taught by certain of the brothers, Mr. — the converted Israelite is its superintendent. The school consists of forty children, who come to us from the surrounding country. When it is considered that we do not live in a village, also the strict church character of the school, and the usual charge for tuition required, it will be thought by all, a most happy addition to our Mission. The school does more than support itself. It was begun the 1st of December last. This is the first Parish school west of the lakes.

The editor of "the Southern Churchman" who, on account of a single expression of a correspondent, refers "the editor of the Banner of the Cross" to "the Homily against the peril of Idolatry," is respectfully and affectionately invited to reconsider the ninth commandment of the Decalogue. A clear view of this Divine command may be found in the church catechism in the answer to the question—"What is thy duty towards thy neighbor?"

THE CALENDAR.—With unfeigned regret, we notice the retirement from his editorial post of one of the most esteemed of our Brethren. We can honestly say that in our humble judgment the Calendar under the management of the Rev. Mr. Payne, has well fulfilled the end proposed by the Editor, as stated in the following "Valedictory." He will carry with him, not only the kind and good wishes of many friends, but the satisfaction of having discharged, faithfully and well, the duties of a trying post. May he enjoy the peace and comfort which he wisely seeks in resigning an editorial chair.

We doubt not that, under its new conduct, this excellent Church paper will sustain its high character.

VALEDICTORY.—The undersigned here fulfils a long cherished intention of retiring, with the present number, from the editorial care of the paper, which he has now conducted for three years. Having been summoned to this post of duty by his Bishop he resigns it into his hands with his consent, gratified to know that its general tone and spirit have had his uninterrupted approval. To his brethren of the Clergy and Laity, so many of whom have, in various ways, cheered and aided him in his difficult and trying duties, he renders his acknowledgments and assurances of his most grateful remembrance. If there be any who think that the paper has had its imperfections, he would say that no one can be so sensible of that as himself; and if any who, on that or any other account have regarded it with coldness and neglect, he entertains towards them no more unkind wish than that they themselves may some time be subjected to the difficulties and perplexities of a station like this. During a period of excitement and controversy in the Church, he has endeavoured to do what he could for the dissemination of Catholic Truth and the promotion of Apostolical Order, and for keeping the Diocese of Connecticut true to her ancient principles. He has intended to give no uncertain sound; to present a paper decided and firm in its Churchmanship, yet not of a partisan character—spirited, yet not unchristian—temperate, and yet not tame and temporising. Hoping that by having such an aim in view, though falling far short of his wish, he has by God's blessing done some service for His holy Church and His blessed religion, he now takes leave of the friends of the paper, recommending it to their continued patronage, and not doubting that under its new auspices it will present new claims upon their favor.

WM. PAYNE.

By the advice of the Bishop of the Diocese, the Publisher has made arrangements, for the future editing of the paper, with the Rev. Professor Jackson, who will enter upon his duties with the next number.

A JUST TRIBUTE.—In copying the following most interesting account from a secular paper of this city, we may be excused for saying again that Philadelphia has good reason to be proud of her Physicians. The clergy of this city have also strong reason to speak well of this noble body of men, distinguished not only for their professional skill, but also for their liberality. The clergy can always command, for themselves and their families, the services of those whose time is most valuable, which we can attest are rendered most cheerfully "without money and without price." And in many a heart are treasured thoughts of gratitude, fervent and deep to those who have thus been the means under God, of preserving dear and precious lives. The venerable and distinguished physician to whom the following just tribute has been paid, has many claims to such blessed remembrance.

INTERESTING SCENE.—The presentation of an admirable likeness of the venerable Dr. Chapman, painted by Sully, for the Medical Class of the University of Pennsylvania, as a contribution to the Wistar Museum, took place yesterday at noon in the College Hall, in the presence of a crowded audience, consisting mainly of the students of that university. The presentation address was delivered by Daniel A. Langhorn, of Virginia, who made allusion, in eloquent language, to the long and faithful services of Dr. Chapman in the fields of science, and asked the acceptance of the portrait by the University as a memento of their respect and esteem for their beloved preceptor, as a companion for the portraits of Wistar and Dewees that already adorn the walls of the Museum.

Dr. Chapman rose to respond amid the enthusiastic applause of the audience. He said that he could not be other than gratified by the eloquent address just delivered; gratifying and touching as regards himself, and the only fault that he could detect was that he had been endowed with merits that he could only attribute to the partiality of the speaker, and dare not ascribe to himself. He could only say that he had been deeply affected by the proceedings. Among the reproaches generally attributed to age, was the assertion that it gradually loses the sensibility to pleasure and to pain, to censure and to praise. Though it may be true that the objects so eagerly sought for, and so dearly prized in early life lose their charms as age creeps on, yet the Speaker could with sincerity say that his heart still retained its original sensibility, its warm, generous and grateful emotions.

It was on occasions like the present, he said, that even from the ashes of age, the wonted fires of youth could be kindled into fresh life. He returned his grateful thanks for this fresh expression of these favourable sentiments of which he had so much reason to boast. They were his pride and his glory; ample rewards for his exertions in behalf of those with whom he had been associated as preceptor. The intimate relations existing for the greater part of a century between the speaker and the University, as pupil and professor, he was admonished by the ravages of time, were soon to cease; it was proper therefore to let this portrait be hung up in the gallery among those of his former colleagues, to serve hereafter by its likeness to awaken agreeable associations among his hearers. He concluded with a fervent wish that God would bless them all, and that his fond anticipations of their future usefulness should be more than fulfilled.—Phila. Ledger.

Olden Times in New England.

The Springfield Gazette lately published a literal copy of a letter written one hundred and thirty-four years ago by one Lawrence Conant, a member of the ordaining Council at the settlement of the first Pastor over the old South Society (Congregational) in Danvers, Mass. It not only gives an insight into the manners and customs of the Puritans of those days, but also shows the position held by Churchmen of those times. On the former point, take the following:

When ye services at ye house were ended, ye Council and other dignitaries were entertained at ye house of Mr. Epes, on ye hill near by, and we had a bountiful table, with bear's meat and Vension, the last of which was from a fine buck shot in the woods near by. Ye Bear was kill'd in Lynn Woods, near Reading.—After ye blessing was craved by Mr. Garrish of Wenthams, word came that ye buck was shot on ye Lord's day, by Pequot an Indian, who came to Mr. Epes, with a lye in his mouth, like Ananias of old; ye council thereupon refused to eat ye Vension; but it was afterwards agreed that Pequot should receive 40 stripes save one, for lying and profaning the Lord's day, restore Mr. Epes ye cost of ye deer; and considering this a just and righteous sentence on ye sinful Heathen, and that a blessing had been craved on ye meat, ye council all partook of it, but Mr. Sheppard, whose conscience was tender on the point of Vension.

On the other point, the writer makes the following curious record:

Ye Governor was in ye house, and her majesty's commissioners of ye customs, and they set together on a high seat by ye pulpit stairs. Ye Governor appears very devout and attentive, although he favors Episcopacy and tolerates ye Quaker's and Baptists, but is a strong opposer of ye Papists.

The Proposed St. Mark's Church.

The following is an authorized account of the edifice about to be erected by this new Parish. We rejoice to be thus assured that another Sanctuary is to be reared for the worship of the Most High. We feel bound to say that whatever judgment may be entertained of a former communication on this subject, it is the plainest injustice that the anonymous communication of an individual, should be used to excite prejudice against this new and important enterprise.

THE CHURCH OF ST. MARK'S, to be erected in Locust street, will be built of brown free stone, in the style of Gothic architecture that prevailed in the early part of the fourteenth century called the Decorated or Middle pointed style. The Churches of which period are distinguished by their fine proportions and beauty of interior effect, and the elegance of their windows, being richly foliated in the head or arch.

The plan is made to suit the site, having the Tower in the usual position of the south porch, attached to the aisle wall, in the second bay from the west end, projecting from the Church all its size, to the line of Locust street. From thence it is the principal entrance, its first story being the porch. The Church, comprises a Chancel, Nave and Aisle, and Organ or Choir Aisle, and a convenient Vestry.

The interior dimensions are 138 feet in length, 56 feet wide, and 54 feet high to the ridge of roof. The Chancel is 38 feet deep.

The Nave has a clerestory with two light windows in each bay, over the piers or arches of the aisles; these will be built of dressed stone.

The Roof will be open timbered, framed of oak, with hammer and collar beams.

The Chancel will have a polygonal ceiling of oak. The Organ Aisle is in continuation of the North Aisle, with an arch open to the Chancel. An open screen of oak will mark the division of the Chancel and Church.

The windows will be glazed with quarries set in lead, the mullions being of stone. The East window will have five lights, glazed with painted glass of subject design.

The West window will be of four lights, having also enriched glass.

The Tower will have a stone spire, the whole height of which will be 175 feet.

The Church will contain seats for 1000 worshippers, many of them to be free.

To Correspondents.

"Y. Z." shall appear next week.

"H. M. Nashville" shall also receive an early insertion.

We beg as a particular favor, that if correspondents find their articles will occupy more than two columns, they will divide their communications, or indicate where they wish them divided. This will insure an earlier insertion, and increase the probability of their being read. Many Readers "skip" long articles, as young Readers "skip the long words."

TWO LECTURES TO YOUNG FEMALES.—Recently delivered in St. John's Church, Lafayette, Indiana, by Rev. J. W. McCullough, D. D. Rector. Published by request of the vestry.

These are excellent lectures filled with sound and judicious advice, set forth in a pleasing and impressive form. They are such as we might have expected from the high character of their Author. Although there are several extracts we would like to give, and which we have marked for future use, we have room only for the following pleasant and truthful words, attesting their correctness by our own pastoral experience.

It only remains to contemplate Woman in her relations to the Church. The majority of communicants in all our congregations, are females. The proportion is sometimes two, three, or even four, to one. It is among this class of Christians, too, that we generally find the deepest, purest, and most consistent piety; and the loveliest and most attractive examples of Christian excellence. If there be any spiritual vitality in a Church, it is usually here. No one can help noticing and admiring the energy, steadiness and perseverance of Woman's piety, and her untiring devotion to her Lord and his mystical Body—the Church. She gives of her wealth, and of her penury, and the fruits of her labor, to build the temples of the Lord. She furnishes them with decency and taste. She decorates them with evergreens in honor of her Lord's nativity. She furnishes them with musical instruments, and aids in singing the songs of Zion. She aids in supporting the ministry of reconciliation; and is often the chief comforter and encourager of the Pastor. Let it be cold, or warm, wet or dry, far, or near, we generally find a majority of this delicate and fragile sex in devout and reverential attendance upon the services of the Church. I have often wondered—more elsewhere than here—that healthy, robust, and well-clad men were not ashamed to be, in this respect, so far outdone by their mothers, wives, sisters and daughters.

Most if not all of our Churches are greatly indebted for their beauty and comfort, to the taste, ingenuity, and liberality, as well as the prayers and zeal, of our pious females. I trust that the future conduct of none of my youthful hearers will ever contradict what I have now said in just commendation, not in flattery, of their sex. Let that Saviour who honored Woman so much in his birth, was so kind and courteous to her in the days of his flesh, and has so greatly meliorated her condition by his holy religion, ever find them, like the meek and docile Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, sitting at his feet in the person of his ministering servants, and listening to the words of eternal life. Let them love and honor, that Holy Church, which is "his Body—the fulness of him who filleth all in all." So shall they be prepared to meet the Lord in peace; and, having fulfilled their mission on earth, be fitted for the communion of the Church Invisible in Paradise, and the Church Triumphant in Heaven.

LANETON PARSONAGE; A TALE. Second part. By the author of "Amy Herbert," &c. Edited by the Rev. W. Sewell, B. D. Republished by the Messrs. Appleton, 200 Broadway, N. Y., 148 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

We have only read portions of this book, enough, however, to see that it is in keeping with the other productions of its talented and popular authoress. As a commendation of more weight than any we could give, we offer the following from the "English Churchman."

"As we found by the Preface that this was a tale of 'school-life'—of girls' school-life, and that the work consisted almost entirely of their every-day sayings and doings, we confess that we did not expect to be very much interested or edified by it. We have, however, been agreeably disappointed, and astonished to find that a most instructive and interesting volume has been made out of such apparently slender materials: and we are inclined to estimate its practical value—to parents, teachers, and children—at even a higher rate than the former excellent works of the same author. Though it is a continuation of a previous volume, under the same title, it may be read as an entirely distinct tale; but for this purpose it would have been well if the author had given a few lines by way of explanation for those who had not read the first part."

A PLAN FOR GIVING THE GOSPEL TO OUR SERVANTS. A Sermon preached in several of the Protestant Episcopal Churches in Charleston—on Sundays in February, 1848. By the Rev. Paul Trapier, Minister of Calvary Church. Preached and published by request of a committee of the Convention.

This is a plain, sensible and interesting Discourse upon a subject of great practical importance, especially in the South. Of the excellence of the plan here proposed, to secure this important end, we are unable to judge, as a just decision in such a case can only be the result of experience. Of the duty of making such provision, forcibly set forth by Mr. Trapier, we can have no doubt. And that this grave duty is becoming more and more acknowledged in the South is a good sign, and one at which every true Christian must rejoice.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE, A FIGHT OF FAITH. By Rev. H. Hooker. Author of "Portion of the Soul," &c. Philadelphia, H. Hooker, 16 south Seventh street.

This is a Practical Work, and although we may not assent to all its doctrines, it is on the whole a production of much excellence. We like its motto particularly—"What evangelical religion is, is told in two words: Faith and Charity, or Belief and Practice."—MILTON. There is a sententiousness and point in the Author's style not often found in modern composition. Take the following example from the Preface. "What my motives have been in writing this work, I leave to be inferred from the work itself. For if they have not been as good as the work itself is, my professing that they have, will be of service to none; and if they have been better, yet will they not relieve the defects of unsuccessful execution."

CONSECRATION OF THE NEW CATHEDRAL AT CALCUTTA.—The Rt. Rev. Bishop Wilson, in a communication to the 'Christian Knowledge Society,' gives an interesting account of the Consecration of the Cathedral which has been in the course of erection for several years past.

The Bishop remarks:

'The anxious labors and cares of many years were amply rewarded on the day of Consecration, October 8th last. Such a sight had never been seen in Calcutta as on that day. An uninterrupted success had attended the progress of the works. The deviation from the regular Gothic, imposed by the climate, had long been acknowledged to be wise and proper. Expectation was all awake. The magnificence of the scene, both within and without the sacred edifice, must have been witnessed in order to be fully credited.—At the Offertory nearly 2,000 rubees were collected for the Calcutta Additional Clergy Society. The Holy Communion then commenced. The Clergy kneeling round the sacred table, all in their surplices, as in Cathedrals at home, was a touching scene. Between 140 and 150 Communicants partook of the blessed Sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Lord. The entire Service lasted about five hours. The impression of the whole scene on the native crowds was extraordinary, and scarcely less on the East Indian population. Daily service has been celebrated since, and two full services on the Lord's Day, with every prospect of steady congregations. About 400 on Sunday mornings, and from thirty to fifty on week days.

Discursus.

MR. EDITOR:

In late numbers of the "Spirit of Missions," interesting accounts have appeared of the labours of the first Episcopal Clergymen of Kentucky. Among them stands conspicuous the name of KAVENAUH, of whose services at Henderson on the Ohio Gen. Hopkins is said to have expressed himself thus in a letter to a friend: "To-morrow being Lord's Day, we expect to hold divine service for the first time in this settlement, after the forms of the old Church in Virginia, under the great oak in my front yard; we having been so fortunate as to secure the services of the Rev. William Kavenauh; and a grander set of rascals and ragamuffins than will be then and there assembled the sun has never shone upon, since the venerable assemblage which met David in the cave of Adullam." It appears that "the population of Henderson was at that time very small, and consisted mostly of persons who lived by hunting, many of whom were of the most abandoned, dissolute and desperate character. All were rough and uncultivated, and neither knew nor cared any thing even for Christianity, not to speak of particular churches." Mr. Kavenauh—when young—was a Methodist Preacher, nor are all the circumstances known which influenced his decision in determining to renounce Methodism and enter the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church. "It is quite remarkable, however, that no less than four of his sons are ministers of the very Church forsaken by their honoured father for the service of the Episcopal Church; conviction having led the one onward towards the conservative, whilst position and circumstances have conducted the others rather towards the enterprising and active."* The narrative before us does not state what progress the Church made from 1800 to 1807 under the ministrations of Mr. K., nor in subsequent years under the ministrations of others; but it is very certain that in the Western States generally the increase of Churchmen has not been proportioned to that of the regular Baptists, the reformed Baptists, or the Methodists. "Conservatism" has not kept pace with sectarian "enterprise." To what are we to ascribe this disproportion? It cannot be owing altogether to the prejudices which grew out of the American Revolution. Where the Gospel is preached faithfully by Episcopal Clergymen such prejudices do not last forty or fifty years. It cannot be owing to any undue enunciation of the "distinctive principles" of the Church. Except in the larger towns neither "Catholic" nor "Evangelical" Churchmanship has made very decided progress.† Let a faithful and apt Church Missionary go into a settlement where no sectarian minister has gone before, and he will not fail to secure an audience and an attention to Church principles. To what, then, is it to be ascribed? I answer, mainly to the want of a ministry adapted to the people. We need a "rough and ready" ministry. In the cities there is a sufficient number of refined and educated inhabitants to uphold and sustain a polished clergyman; and in the course of time the influence of a gentlemanly deportment combined with the celebration of evangelical services and the delivery of a well-written sermon in a consecrated temple will be sensibly exerted upon the population at large. But from Wheeling to Fort Leavenworth there are in the country tens and hundreds of thousands who have souls, without much external adornment; and if these are to be won to Christ, we must have ministers who, uniting the wisdom of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove, can become all things to all men, who are willing to lodge with Simon the Tanner‡ no less than with Dionysius the Areopagite. It is to be hoped that in this extensive field very few settlements exist embracing such materials as distinguished the society in Henderson forty years ago; it is nevertheless true that the Missionary in every step of his journey will find sinners, some who are opposed to the essential truths of the Gospel, some who are indifferent as to the progress of the Gospel, and some who would pervert it in order to serve their own purposes. And if the pioneer of the Church has from his childhood moved in a different sphere of action, if his habits and

* One of the four is the eccentric and enterprising agent of the Indiana Colonization Society; (see the "Banner" of March 11th.) Mr. J. D. Nourse, of Bardstown, Ky., has lately published a book entitled "Remarks on the past, and its legacies to American society." Mr. N. (says the Louisville Journal) "is a devoted student of history, and in his survey of the annals of the past has convinced himself that the introduction of Christianity and the birth of American democracy are the two grand events toward which the movements of society and the arrangements of Providence have converged." I have not yet seen the book; but I should not be surprised to find its learned author and the Indiana preacher in agreement on one point. It is a captivating thought that we—republicans—are under a government which is only not a Theocracy.

† In Wisconsin, it is believed, the Church has increased more rapidly than in any other Western Diocese. This, I presume, is to be ascribed in a great measure to the fact that the tide of emigration has rolled there large numbers of New York Churchmen, and of foreigners predisposed to receive our formularies.

‡ "The trade of a tanner was esteemed by the Jews so contemptible that all those who followed it were required to mention the name before their marriage, under the penalty of the nuptials becoming void. It is recorded in the Mishna, that after the death of a man whose brother exercised the trade of a tanner, the wise men of Sidon decided, that the widow of the deceased was permitted to decline intermarrying with that brother. This custom explains to us the probable reason why the Evangelist was so particular in relating so apparently a trivial circumstance as the lodgings of the Apostle. St. Peter took up his abode with the most mean and despised of his countrymen, although at this time, without divine interposition, he would have refused to preach to Cornelius, an honourable gentile."—Townsend on Acts, ix. 43.

modes of speech and style of living have been such as to produce the impression that he is rather above those to whom he now preaches the humbling doctrines of the Bible, he will deeply lament his want of adaptedness to the work, and unless he possess in a high degree the grace of perseverance, will quickly seek a situation which is congenial to his feelings.

The writer of the Kentucky Annals whom I have quoted tells us, that at the period of the Revolution "many of the then Baptist dogmas rung like a tocsin in the ears of the poor white people of old Virginia. An unlettered Clergy, not haughtily superior to the poor; a laborious, unpaid Clergy, sharing in the daily toils, and thankful for the rough hospitality of the poorest farmer; forms of religion which made the wild wood and the mountain stream, ever dear to the heart of the backwoodsman, the most fit and welcome temple of Jehovah, and, in their estimation, the only consecrated font of baptism." "Their own sons and brothers, in every day attire, often in their shirt sleeves, and with their own homespun modes of speech, rich in the embroidering of inspired sentences, and eloquent with all the ardour of impassioned earnestness, preached to them the unsearchable riches of Christ, and laboured for them freely as their servants in the Gospel for Jesus' sake."

Your present correspondent, Mr. Editor, is by no means an advocate for a ministry precisely of this character. But as we are allowed to take lessons from our opponents, he may with propriety argue that if the Baptists emigrating from Virginia with an unlettered ministry were enabled to overrun large portions of Kentucky and to make it the "most Baptistical State" in the Union, if with all their errors they carried with them much genuine religion, checking the inroads of infidelity and preserving a knowledge of a crucified Saviour, then will "the Church of the Living God, the Pillar and Ground of the Truth," the Church to which the promises are specially vouchsafed, firmly plant her standard and extend her sway in the "Far West," provided she has pious labourers who are "apt to teach," and able, from their modes of life, to associate familiarly with the masses.

As to the amount of knowledge which is requisite to constitute a well-furnished Missionary, it would be a waste of time to attempt to lay down rules uniformly to govern us. The Church in General Convention has decided that certain studies shall be pursued by candidates for the ministry, and that in certain cases, viz. where there appear to be an "extraordinary strength of natural understanding, a peculiar aptitude to teach, and a large share of prudence," a knowledge of the Latin, Greek and Hebrew languages may be dispensed with. Still, it may not be presumptuous to doubt the expediency of dispensing with a knowledge of the Greek Testament except under very extraordinary circumstances, or to declare the conviction that studies not now provided for ought for particular districts to be rendered obligatory. Missionaries on the borders of Mexico ought to understand the Spanish language; in parts of Louisiana the French; and in numberless settlements the German. How much is the Church to gain in the West from the publication of her German Prayer Book, if her ministers cannot use it in public? The Lutheran immigrant is not indisposed to receive it; but he needs it in the congregation; to appreciate its contents he must be exercised in it as in a book of common prayer. The Missionaries of the Church should study the Greek Testament, not only for general reasons, but also for this special one, that they may meet the sectarian teachers whose pretensions to knowledge are often large. The Methodist preachers when perplexed can fall back upon Watson or Adam Clarke. The Baptists when pressed with the interrogatory, "Who immersed Roger Williams?" or told that no valid argument in favour of total immersion can be drawn from their favourite texts because the persons immersing and the persons immersed both went into the water, and both came up out of the water, can resolutely insist that Bapto is sufficient for all their purposes. The Universalists, eager to take advantage of "partialist" concessions, can readily produce their manuals, and as confidently quote Hammond and Lightfoot as if they had seen their venerable folios. But sciolism will give way to scholarship. Intelligent people with a moderate share of learning will discern the difference which exists between reality and pretension; and if they perceive that in the Church Missionary there are united sincerity, humility, a devotional spirit, a sociable disposition, and a capability to draw spiritual water from the original fountain without resorting to the muddy streams of Clarke or Bal-lou, they will testify their respect by giving him the hearing ear, and then their affection by sustaining him and the Church to which he is espoused.

It is scarcely necessary to add that itinerant missionaries should be "extemporaneous" men. The preachers of the sects are almost always so, well knowing that promptness and readiness are power. Let a missionary arrive at nightfall at a village where the inhabitants are easily assembled, and let the report get abroad that a "strange preacher" has come; let him be told that the people are anxious to "hear the word" and are ready to accompany him to the school-house or court-house; let him then gravely announce that unfortunately his sermons were lost in the slough that he had passed, or that he was unaccustomed to preach off hand in a dimly-lighted room; and the consequences may well be imagined. Happy, indeed, the man who possesses such "an extraordinary strength of natural understanding," and such "a large share of prudence" that he is enabled to "leave" just at the proper moment!*

* A story is told in New England of an extemporaneous effort which it may be well enough here to repeat. A young candidate for the pastorate of a Congregationalist Society was required to preach by way of probation. As he went into the pulpit the following text was handed to him for the subject of his discourse. Ezra i. 9, Nine and Twenty Knives. Not at all disconcerted he commenced on this wise: Brethren, I have been presented with nine and twenty knives wherewith to perform my office. I shall therefore divide my sermon into nine and twenty parts. Thereupon he indicted upon them such a chastisement for the offences of which they were reported to be guilty, that they acknowledged themselves to be completely cut up, and invited him to become their pastor.

But whence are the suitable missionaries to be obtained? Establish parochial schools in the West—says one—train up the young the principles of the Church, and let your missionaries be sons of the soil. A very good plan, if it can be carried out, to operate upon the missionary field ten or twelve years hence. But what in the meantime is to become of the millions who are filling up the valley of the Mississippi and making strides towards the Pacific? Our Missionary Bishop of the Southwest has laboured as such for more than three years, and in the large State of Arkansas his hands are at this day upheld by just the number of men that supported Moses in the terrible conflict with Amalek. Now if immediate victory over our spiritual foes were to be obtained by prayer, we might rest satisfied with the belief that three soldiers of Jesus Christ were doing their duty in Arkansas. But what reason have we to indulge the hope that without obtaining auxiliaries from abroad Bishop Freeman will in the course of the next ten years be materially strengthened in the Missionary work and enabled to make advances upon the enemy? The Eastern Dioceses must, for a long, long term of years, in part supply the wants of the West. "That the West should, in so rapid a progress of population, be adequately supplied with the means of intellectual and moral improvement, without special aid from without itself, would be a reversal of the universal law of rapid increase by immigration, little less than miraculous. Schools and colleges and churches do not emigrate; and their establishment amidst a rapidly advancing and heterogeneous population must necessarily be slow and difficult."

By what means, then, are we at an early period to obtain suitable missionaries? On this point, Mr. Editor, it is not at all difficult to throw out "suggestions." Mine, I am afraid, will meet with but little encouragement from the Eastern Clergy generally. It is with no expectation, therefore, of seeing a new plan carried into execution, that I declare my belief that the interests of the Church would be furthered if pious men who had received a good English education were exhorted to reflect on the extent of the harvest-field and the paucity of the labourers, and on the obligation under which they lie to consecrate themselves entirely to the Lord of the harvest; if those who offered themselves were to be expressly told that as obedient sons of the Church they were, yielding their preferences for particular stations, to submit to the direction of their respective Bishops; if they were to be placed separately or in classes for eighteen months or two years under the tuition of country clergymen approved of by their Bishops; and if provision during this short probation were to be made for their support. According to such a plan as this, it is believed that 26 dioceses might send forth annually at least 20 candidates who from their lack of a collegiate education would in all probability follow mechanical, mercantile, or agricultural pursuits; in eleven years 200 itinerant missionaries, with suitable qualifications, and adapted to the people, would be labouring where now there are none; and all would be accomplished at an expense of less than 2,500 dollars per annum.†

"The Study of Prophecy, a Commanded Duty. By Richard Newton."

MR. EDITOR:

I live at a great distance from the metropolis of Pennsylvania; and in this remote region—dark enough—feel an interest in all the great efforts of your gifted divines. I have just finished the perusal of Mr. Newton's Sermon with the title given above. I have read it carefully, and without interruption. Some things in this sermon have struck me as deserving a passing notice; and I trust you will allow me a corner in the "Banner," for a few remarks.

First of all, I should be glad to know if there are any of our Clergy, either "Evangelical," or unevangelical, who do not "take heed" to the Prophecies of Scripture. If there be any such, they are sadly delinquent. But perhaps Mr. Newton means merely that we are bound to exercise our critical acumen, and our imagination, in finding out new and fanciful interpretations, or our tact in reviving old and exploded notions respecting the meaning of certain prophetic portions of the Bible. This is quite another thing, and a "duty" which may not be so evident as that of taking heed to the general, though somewhat obscure, intimations of prophecy. From a passage which occurs on the 21st page, I suspect that this must be his meaning. It reads thus:—"The word of prophecy, as well as the whole vol-

* Ex-Governor Slade's first report as agent to the Board of "National Popular Education," Cincinnati, 1848.

† Bishop Kemper, addressing the Indiana Convention (July, 1847,) said, "Brethren, we want men, men constrained by the highest and holiest motives, even the love of Christ and the value of immortal souls, to devote themselves for life to the ministry of reconciliation. Let the clergy make this a prominent topic of their discourses for some time to come; let them appeal to those youth of our land who have willingly bowed to the yoke of the Gospel, and who have commenced that service which alone is perfect freedom." And how, he continues, shall the candidates "be educated?" "I verily believe the Nashotah plan is the best adapted to the West. If you prefer, organize such a school within your own bounds, at the earliest opportunity; in the meanwhile, and certainly as long as you please, students not only from here, but from every other part of the world, will be welcomed to all the privileges of the humble establishment in Wisconsin. Seventy-five dollars per annum will cover every expense, and if clothing is provided by the pupil or his friends, only 25 dollars per annum are required." The advantages of such an institution established in Indiana are fully appreciated. If buildings, however, are to be erected, the principal funds must come from the East, and time is requisite to collect them. The plan mentioned in the text supposes that the 20 candidates are to come from several dioceses. From the feeling which exists in some parts of the Union, it is hardly to be expected that they would be concentrated at any one Western School.

ume of Scripture, is not like a mint or bank, where the precious metals, refined and purified, and wrought out into finished coin, are to be obtained without toil, whenever they are called for: no, but it is like an unwrought mine of wealth; and the man who would possess himself of its treasures, and know how profitable it is, must be willing to descend into its depths, and dig, and delve, and labor; he must seek for the truth as silver, and search for it as for hid treasures; and then he shall find it."

This I can understand: it is the doctrine of "private interpretation," and Mr. Newman's "Development." But surely all are not obliged to "dig, and delve, and labor" in the mines! It is enough that a few of our strongest, most sagacious, and discriminating divines devote themselves to this arduous and lucrative employment. Let them go on to the very bottom of the lowest stratum, and work it out to its utmost verge; and when they shall have delved it all out, smelted it, developed it, coined it, and stamped it with the "Image and superscription" of the "Great King," then we who meanwhile are attending to some other "bounden duties," shall be willing to receive and circulate it as "pure gold" and genuine "coin." Too many miners might impede each other. Mr. Newton's skill has been clearly demonstrated in the sermon now before us; and therefore we hope he will go on and be recognized as an "Overseer" in the mines.

Again; on the 11th page of the sermon I find a reference to a class of men in our mother Church of England, respecting whom and their peculiarities I should like to know a little more. "It is almost a rare thing now to meet an Evangelical clergyman in the Church of England, who has not, in the language of our text, given 'heed to this sure word of prophecy,' and who is not accustomed habitually to instruct his people in the same. And it is no doubt mainly owing to their intimate acquaintance with this important portion of God's word, and the salutary influence exerted by it, that we are to trace the eminent spirituality and devotion which so remarkably characterize the clergy and people of the evangelical part of our mother church."

Now I am anxious to know what "portion" of the venerable Church mentioned are the "Evangelical" "clergy and people." In my ignorant and unsophisticated charity—which, I trust, believeth all things, hopeth all things, "suffereth long and is kind," and "vaunteth not itself," "doth not behave itself unseemly," "thinketh no evil"—I had believed that all the "clergy and people" who use the Prayer-Book, and preach and hear the Gospel, must, of course be "evangelical." But it seems that I was entirely mistaken. This characteristic belongs only to a "portion of the clergy and laity of our mother church,"—poor thing! Were it not for the high authority and unquestionable charity of the author of this sermon, I should have been disposed to exclaim in view of this insinuation, "Ah! Mr. Simeon! there you are right;—this 'mining' and 'coining' business, 'in which no two of its advocates agree; which fills only with vain conceits, intoxicates the imagination, alienates brethren from each other, and by being unduly urged upon the minds of humble Christians, is doing the devil's work by wholesale!" (Life of Simeon.) But Mr. Newton not only says that Mr. Simeon is wrong, but that this very thing is the great secret of "the eminent spirituality and devotion which so remarkably characterize the clergy and people" alluded to. Mr. N. must be right, for Mr. Simeon, although an Evangelical leader of "eminent spirituality and devotion," lived only in the midst of these "clergy and people," whereas Mr. Newton lives in Philadelphia. Moreover, while Mr. Simeon composed many thousands of skeletons of sermons, on all parts of the Bible, making a work of some twenty-four royal octavo volumes, he must have merely skimmed over the surface of the whole, whereas Mr. Newton, like his great namesake, Bishop Newton, has been "in the mines" "digging, delving, and laboring."

If this study and this mode of "habitual" preaching have the same effect on this side of the Atlantic which it has had on the other side, we shall presently have in our church "clergy and people" as "eminent in spirituality and devotion" as those who bless our mother Church. Moreover, it will soon be demonstrated here, as well as there, that "eminent spirituality and devotion," are not to be expected from prayer, self-examination, the faithful discharge of duty, and constant communion with God in secret, at the altar, and in the dust of abasement, but that it must be "no doubt mainly owing" to the study of prophecies respecting the second Advent, "and the salutary influence exerted by it." This is probably the secret of "the eminent spirituality and devotion," of the founder of the sect of the "Millerites," and of the Millerites themselves, flighty saints! I learn also from this sermon that "the time of the end" spoken of by Daniel, is neither the end of the Jewish state, nor the end of the world, but that "This is the time in which we live," when "the wise shall understand these matters;"—as evidenced—of course—in this sermon: that "prophecysings" mean "prophecies;" and that "transpire" means to occur, to happen, to take place. It appears, further, that whoever does not adopt the interpretation which Mr. Newton and his friends have, with so much digging, delving, and labor, eliminated from the Holy Text, disobey the command, "Despise not Prophecysings."

But, without touching upon half the points worthy of notice in this excellent and instructive discourse, I find that I have already made my article unreasonably long. This fault, Mr. Editor, I trust you will forgive in a benighted brother in the FAR WEST.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Honour thy Father and thy Mother.

In the Banner of the 19th Feb. I noticed a poetical effusion, upon the Fifth Commandment, which I am somewhat surprised should have been copied into it without some comment from the Editor.

The poetry, is certainly very pretty; but the sentiment strikes one as entirely contrary to the spirit of the commandment, and calculated to mislead the untaught mind, and to destroy much the beauty and harmony of that portion of our Liturgy into which it is incorporated.

Is it true, Mr. Editor, that the command and promise, are conceded to those alone who are blessed with the continuance of their parents on the earth, as their guide and comfort? If so, how many lips would indeed be closed in silence, when "the people shall ask God's mercy for their transgressions in times past, and grace to keep the law for the time to come." Who does not know, how prone the human heart is to throw off the personal application of each of the ten commandments, and applying them literally, say, "is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?"

How much pains we take, to teach a child that it has broken and is constantly liable to break, each and every of them!
"Thou shalt do no murder," has ever been pressed upon the conscience of a child, as applicable to the sin of ungoverned temper; "Thou shalt not steal," to the covetous desire of that belongs to another. And shall we restrict and limit the command to honour and obey, as applicable only to those who are our fathers and our mothers according to the flesh, forgetting of the obligations that bind us to others, who in the Providence of God, have been, in some sense, such to us?

There is, Mr. Editor, far too prevalent a desire, to cast off obligation and reverence, and obedience, both in the church, and the domestic circle: it is needless to dress up, in the bewitching strains of (religious?) poetry, the idea that any one of the commands of God may be thrown off.

Those verses fell upon my ear, as a sweet and pleasant sound, for there was in them a harmony and beauty that could not fail to arrest attention; they called up the tear of sympathy for the orphan mourner; but worse than useless are harmonious sounds, if they conceal false teaching, or hide from view the glorious promises of God's Holy Word.

MR. EDITOR:—

Not being much inclined to the "cacothetis scribendi," I should have entirely overlooked the communication of your correspondent "Neophyte" in your last number, did I not consider that a great wrong had been done to the parties interested in the matter alluded to; as well as to arrest the fears of others who may be alike, sensitively nervous. I ask your indulgence to take seriatim his criticisms. Neophyte, apparently confounded at the exclusive appropriation of the term "Church" to the new edifice (now in process of erection) very irrelevantly enlarges upon the violation of rubrics, &c by the Bishop; being foreign to the point, I respectfully pass them by, and would next only refer him to the extracts (published sometime back in the Banner) from a publication of "the Ecclesiological" date "Cambridge Camden Society" (England) giving the essential parts necessary to constitute a Church. On the requirements of that authority, and by inference deduced therefrom, I asserted.
and still hold, that with the single exception made, we have not a "church" in our midst—by a church 'twas intended to express not a structure built for mere accommodation, or in other words a preaching house, for we have very many such, but a building aiming at expression, and that appropriate; such as elevates devotion, and marks a Catholic worship—a fabric that speaks a mystic language of its own, and such as Coleridge has defined "the petrification of our religion," such I have yet to see, or the least approximation to it. But to pass to the objectionable feature of this criticism. Neophyte fears "that we have no authorized way of invoking the protection of its patron saint." And what induces this fear? Forsooth, because the Holy Apostle St. Mark, whose name it bears, is called the "patron saint," a term as common in all Ecclesiological reviews, as the use of the word altar to express what some so tenaciously call the communion table.

Does your correspondent for a moment entertain the fear that the apostle will be invoked, or is it only ill-timed and misplaced merriment? Does he believe those interested so near idolatry? Does he in the exercise of charity, that greatest of christian virtues, utter this suspicion, (and that too in a public print) without the strongest warranty? Would it not have been better to have said in the words of nature's bard,

I'll see before I doubt; when I doubt prove:
And on the proof, there is no way but this.—

Such charges are not however new, for "for that which hath been is now, and that which is to be hath already been." And to a like charge, a holy father of the Church once said to a Manichee, "That they never offered sacrifice to any martyr, though they erected altars in memorial of the martyrs;" and so the Church at Carthage was called "Mensa Cypriani," not because it was built for his worship, (for St. Austin says it was erected only to God and His service,) but because it was a memorial of his martyrdom. What exact benefit is conferred by such a patronage, or dedication or memorial, I am not prepared to say, but when we consider that the humblest child is not unworthy the patronage of the highest angel, and that "by His appointment they may succour and defend us on earth," and that moreover an article in our creed requires us to believe in the Communion of Saints; that the triumphant departed still hold communion with the Church militant, and that their prayers may benefit us on earth; what especial benefit we receive we know not, the Church only forbids us making invocation to either saint or angel, prayer being solely due to the Blessed Trinity. Neophyte had conjured up a phantom from an excited imagination, rather than from the place he supposed it existed.

As to the term orientation, though not to be found in "Richardson" it is not very new, and his friend has rightly guessed the riddle, that the expositor could not solve—and to conclude, it need only be added that although Neophyte "shows up" certain persons to great disadvantage to support himself, yet Christ church has a "sacristy," and moreover 'tis most correctly placed. For the benefit of all, the following definition will serve, though not in Walker is to be found in a Glossary of architectural terms that has passed through four editions.—

"Sacristy, a room attached to a church, in which the priest puts on his robes,—sometimes included within the walls of the fabric, and sometimes an adjunct."

unanimously, That by virtue of the authority vested in the Standing Committee, they invite the Rt. Rev. Christopher E. Gadsden, Bishop of the Diocese of South Carolina, to extend the benefits of his Episcopal visitations, to such parts of Florida, and at such times as may be convenient and agreeable to him."

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing be transmitted to Bishop Gadsden, signed by the President, and countersigned by the Secretary of this Committee.

A true copy from the minutes.

FRANCIS H. RUTLEDGE,

President of the Standing Committee.

F. EPGERS, Secretary.

Extract of a Letter from Rev. Dr. Rutledge.—I take pleasure therefore in forwarding (as above,) a formal invitation to you, to visit such places in Florida, and at such times, as may be convenient and agreeable to yourself, and to render such services as a Bishop only can perform. We are greatly in need of clergymen and missionaries; can you help us in obtaining 3 or more—for whom ample provision can be made. The Churches at Apalachicola and Jacksonville are without ministers.

For Monticello and neighbourhood, (to operate between the two,) the services of an unmarried man, might be very useful, and a salary, I think, of $500 secured to him. The people of Marianna also have raised by subscription $500, and desire that a young clergyman might be sent them. Pray do for us what you can in this way. If the now vacant Parishes, are not soon supplied, we have much reason to fear that our people will join the sects, who are more numerous, enterprising and persevering than ourselves.—Charleston Gospel Messenger.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. William F. Halsey, late of the Diocese of Mississippi, has become the Rector of St. Paul's Church, Sing Sing, in this Diocese.

Rev. N. S. Richardson has resigned his Parish, Christ Church, Derby, Conn. in consequence of the duties connected with the management of "The Church Review and Ecclesiastical Register."

A misery it is under the sun, men live poor to the end that they may die rich; and make no end of gathering, they know not themselves for whom, so they may leave rich executors; but they respect not the estate of their needy souls. There are riches that no shipwreck can take from us: God grant us to be "rich in all good works, laying up a good foundation for the time to come."—Sutton's Learn to Live.

HINT TO BIBLE THUMPERS.—The devout Methodist Preacher, Rev. Daniel Isaac, who was celebrated in England for his mental vigor, his eloquence and his eccentricity, on finding that his Chapel Bible was getting dilapidated, and sinking beneath the vigorous blows often inflicted upon it by his brethren in the ministry when desirous of making a strong point, wrote on one of the blank leaves, the following brief address, which may not be without use, even on this side of the Atlantic:

'To all Bible Thumpers.—Gentlemen:—You are certainly required 'rightly to divide the word of truth;' but I must beg leave to remind you, that to thump me to pieces, is not to divide me 'rightly.' How can you persuade others to regard me with reverence, when they see you treat me with such shocking abuse?'

Dr. FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY was born at Berlin, in the year 1809—the grandson of the celebrated Jewish philosopher—the son of an opulent banker and a lady distinguished by her great beauty and accomplishments. The education, therefore, of the young musician was of a quality and among a society superior to that generally enjoyed by youths trained to his profession. His musical studies, entered into at first merely by way of amusement, were principally made under Felter and Berger; and while he was yet a boy he succeeded in securing the interest and affection of Gœthe, in whose house at Weimar he was a frequent guest. Hence not merely a rare amount of scientific knowledge, but also a tone of high intellectual cultivation which distinguished his life and conversation. With him, however, advantages of fortune and position were not the hindrances they have so often proved to the selfish and supine.
Few musicians have been more diligent. At a very early age, in 1824, Felix Mendelssohn made himself known by publishing two pianoforte quartets, which at once established him as a composer of the first class. Five years later he came to England, and laid the foundation of his European renown by the production, at the Philharmonic Concerts, of the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" (the first of a series of similar compositions, in form and conception truly original,) from that time pouring forth a series of works in almost every style, the number and high excellence of which were but exceeded by the care with which they were finished. To enumerate them here is unnecessary. The last which he produced, "Elijah," was like the first, written for England, and performed at Birmingham in the autumn of 1846. Dr. Mendelssohn successively held official appointments at Dusseldorf, Leipzig, and Berlin. It is needless to say how he was, year by year, more and more looked to and waited for as the one man in Europe—let us not have to say, the last of the great German musicians? Young in years, but old in honors; rich in fame and rich in friends (for to know him was to love him,) his decease leaves a void it is hard to imagine filled. The disease to which he yielded was a nervous affection of the brain. A wife and five young children are left to mourn a loss which, to them at least, is irreparable.

JUVENILE LITERATURE.—Religious Books for Children.—"We may here say a few words upon a set of books which, professing to facilitate and promote the reading of the Scriptures, in reality sometimes excludes them. Endless, nowadays, are the assistances for the understanding of that which we can neither add to nor take from without danger, and which, as far as concerns young and old, is in itself adapted to every capacity. Innumerable are the 'Guides to Scripture' and 'Helps to the Bible'— the 'Bible Les-sons' and 'Scripture Stories'—which, though they may faithfully give the spirit of Holy Writ, materially interfere with the letter. Two or three of these are very beautiful, and several more of them, we acknowledge, in some way edifying; but this is not a walk for ordinary writers—and even as to many cleverly executed works of the class, it may be justly questioned whether, in the ardour of exemplification, the clearness of the example has not been obscured, and in the exuberance of commentary, the simplicity of the text forgotten. Some are plain enough, but then what can be plainer than Scripture?
Too many, however, seek to give a meretricious interest, the taste for which it is of all things most dangerous to encourage.
There is no greater mistake than to suppose that the Bible gains anything by a superficial garnish of sentimentality, or a margin of matter-of-fact elucidation—that the pathos of Ruth's devotion is enhanced by any superstitious romance on which the text is silent, or the miracle of Peter's Deliverance by a mechanical description of the lock which burst open. Some commentary is necessary, and that best determined by those most conversant with the individual mind: but nothing, under any pretext, ought to be allowed to interfere with the knowledge of the Scriptures, word for word as they are. There is enough in them that children can understand, and what they cannot in no way suffers by being acquired young.—Literary World.

DON'T WORRY.—When Bulstrode Whitelocke was embarking as Cromwell's envoy to Sweden, in 1653, he was much disturbed in mind as he rested in Harwich on the preceding night, which was very stormy, while he reflected on the distracted state of the nation. It happened that a confidential servant slept in an adjacent bed, who finding that his master could not sleep, at length said, "Pray, sir, will you give me leave to ask you a question?" "Certainly." "Pray, sir, don't you think that God governed the world very well before you came into it?"
"Undoubtedly." "And pray, sir, don't you think he will govern it quite as well when you are gone out of it?" "Certainly."
"Then, sir, pray excuse me, but don't you think you may trust him to govern it quite as well as long as you live?" To this question Whitelocke had nothing to reply; but turning himself about, soon fell fast asleep till he was summoned to embark.

neither striking nor original, nor even absurd. It is simply common-place. We will give a specimen, and so conclude our notice of a book, which might, if the materials had been wrought by more skilful hands, have turned out both amusing and instructive:—

"Dr. John A. Clark was at this date one of the most popular preachers in Philadelphia; so, having the privilege of travelers to follow the crowd, I inquired the way to St. Andrew's, the next morning, which was Sunday. St. Andrew's Church, where I first worshipped, like most Philadelphia churches belonging to the 'Protestant Episcopal' communion, appears better without than within. It is a chaste Grecian temple, with a row of pillars in front. On entering I found the service, which was conducted by an assistant, commenced. The sermon was partly extempore, on the danger of 'procrastination in religion,' and closed by a fervid and high-wrought appeal to 'the worldly and the pleasure seekers.' I could see at once that the preacher owed much of his popularity to his delivery, and none of it to his style or intellectual resources. The former was striking and effective, giving weight to language and ideas generally common-place and never brilliant. This he made up for by his elocutionary tact, and the exciting nature of the topics introduced."

"How apt are we to imagine, when a man is overtaken by sickness, or withdrawn through one cause or another from more active duty, that his period of usefulness has closed! How ready are we to lament over what we call a mysterious dispensation, as the Roman Christians may have done over the imprisonment of St. Paul! But who shall say that it does not often come to pass, that the minister preaches far more effectually from his sick bed, than ever he did from his pulpit! The report which goes forth amongst his people, of the patience with which he bore pain, and the calmness with which he met death, will perhaps do more towards overcoming their resistance to the gospel, than all his energy effected, whilst he gave himself night and day to the bringing them to repentance. Let no one think, that because unable to exert himself openly and actively, as he once did, for God, he has no duties to perform, no services to render, no rewards to secure. A true Christian is never, if we may use a common expression, laid by: God makes use of him in sickness and in health, in life, and in death."

And the influence which proceeds from him, when languishing on his couch, reduced to poverty, or overwhelmed with affliction, is often incomparably greater than when, in the fulness of his strength, with every engine at his disposal, he moved amongst his fellow men, and took the lead in each benevolent enterprise. It is on sick-beds, that the sustaining power of Christianity is most displayed; it is amid multiplied troubles that its professed comforts are put to the proof: it is by dying men that its best promises are shown to have indeed been made by God. And even when the grave has closed upon a righteous man, is it not often true, that "he being dead, yet speaketh?" His memory admonishes and encourages, and that, too, more powerfully than even his living example."—MELVILLE.

THE MANNER OF THE SPEAKING OF THE SCRIPTURE.—The scripture speaketh as a father doth to his young son: Do this or that, and then will I love thee; yet the father loveth his son first, and studieth with all his power and wit to overcome his child with love and with kindness, to make him do that which is comely, honest, and good for itself. A kind father and mother love their children even when they are evil, that they would shed their blood to make them better and to bring them into the right way. And a natural child studieth not to obtain his father's love with works, but considereth with what love his father loveth him withal, and therefore loveth again, is glad to do his father's will, and studieth to be thankful.—Tyndale.

Female Benevolence.

When I visit the charitable Institutions for which our City is justly celebrated it refreshes my spirits to observe the alleviation that is afforded to so many "ills to which flesh is heir." God sends afflictions to exercise the faith and patience of the sufferers, to purify their hearts and to elevate their characters; and also to excite the best feelings of human nature in those who are temporarily exempt from calamities, to soothe and relieve them. A stranger would imagine, from the number and variety of the Institutions and Societies which distinguish the city of brotherly love, that ample provision was made for all kinds of want, and that they would supersede the exercise of private benevolence. But there are innumerable cases of silent distress over which they exert no influence, that can only be relieved by individual charity. There is one province in which women especially may exert a powerful influence, in vindicating the just rights of their own sex. I mean in procuring adequate remuneration for poor seamstresses. If a small portion of the money which is worse than wasted by destroying that virtuous spirit of independence in the poor, which would lead them to strenuous exertions to support themselves; which increases pauperism, by encouraging idleness, vice, and deception, were added to the pittance which is given to seamstresses, how many little comforts might it procure for them. To cheer their languid spirits in their monotonous sedentary life. How many who have been accustomed to every luxury, by a reverse of circumstances, are compelled to toil incessantly merely to support their existence, as their most indefatigable exertions cannot procure even the necessities of life. Those who employ them should make it a point of conscience to give them an equivalent for their work: the considerate and benevolent will enliven their spirits by delicately adding some little gratuity. Many ladies are fond of the exercise of their needle, and consequently form a very low estimate of the compensation which should be allowed to those who sew for their support. They should consider under what different circumstances they ply their needles. They only work at intervals in healthy, airy apartments, making articles for those they love, or for personal decoration. They can strengthen their nerves by exercise in the open air and return in a healthy glow to a palatable meal; in the evening they have a clear brilliant light and the conversation of their friends to enliven the social circle; while their unfortunate sisters are toiling without intermission, in a small close room with their nerves unstrung and their health impaired by their sedentary occupation their eye-sight injured for want of sufficient light, half-fed, and meanly clothed, consumption, and liver complaint laying wait for them; while they are working for strangers, who grudgingly give the smallest pittance for which they can have their articles made: and who frequently find fault with the execution, (and forgetting the injunction "be pitiful, be courteous,") wound their feelings by coarse and insolent language. If their hearts were regulated by the Golden Rule, they would not thus disgrace their Christian profession. If every little girl were taught to sew neatly, as soon as she could manage a needle there would be less cause for complaint, against some work-women. There are three feminine accomplishments which are indispensably necessary in the education of women: viz, sewing, and a knowledge of the culinary art, and the minutiae of domestic arrangement, and grace and skill in nursing the sick. The acquisition of the languages, and every art and science for which girls manifest a talent should be superadded when practicable, as they will always be a means for enjoyment, and frequently of advantage to them: but the three above mentioned are absolutely essential, and will be in constant requisition in Domestic life. Women with good principles and these requisite qualifications, may procure eligible situations in families who would highly esteem them, appreciate their services, and amply remunerate them. They would enjoy better health than seamstresses, and save money for future contingencies. All those who have young girls under their charge should consider it their duty to instruct them in these matters. This is a most efficient charity, and can be performed, without any expense, in their own quiet domicils. Now there are such innumerable multitudes of ignorant emigrants daily arriving on our shores, there is a constant call for the exercise of this kind of benevolence. We can promote domestic comfort and social pleasure by imparting to them the necessary instructions in their duties. There is another province in which women may legitimately exert their influence, and wield their pens, and petition and memorialize, to their heart's content, and use the most pathetic and persuasive eloquence in procuring higher wages for their starving oppressed countrywomen who work for the navy and army. Patriotism as well as philanthropy should stimulate them to wipe off this disgrace. Can half-starved mothers and sisters teach their sons and brothers to love their country? The needle kills more than the sword. I revolt at the unnatural idea of injudicious, eccentric and masculine women courting publicity through the medium of many societies, which being conducted by the ignorant and self-sufficient, produce incalculable mischief. But, when they submit to proper authority, they frequently quietly effect, in their appropriate sphere, by their vigilance, their activity, and their tact, more than masculine intellect and muscular strength can accomplish.

Among the charitable Institutions which embellish our city, The Ladies' Depository, (in 9th above Chestnut St.) pre-eminently deserves the patronage of ladies. The store is filled with the most beautiful and useful specimens of needle work. Every lady who can afford it, should purchase some of these articles, the results of much persevering toil, and physical and mental suffering endured by many who have been reduced from affluence, and have no other means of supporting themselves. A Lady's charity purse must be of very small dimensions, if it will not allow her occasionally to purchase a trifling article, to reanimate the depressed spirits of some silent sufferer. It is incalculable the good they may effect, and the misery they may prevent by supplying the depositors with work, and purchasing the articles exposed for sale. In this walk of charity they need fear no imposition, or encounter any of those annoyances to which they will subject themselves in their useless visits to the filthy hovels of vice and intemperance. Those who assign as a reason for refusing to assist to work for Fairs, that they interfere with the employments of the poor, can prove their sincerity and obviate that difficulty, by purchasing articles from this establishment, and presenting them, thus relieving the corporeal necessities of the indigent, and providing for the spiritual wants of the poor by erecting Churches for their accommodation. It is this practical sensibility which makes the professor "feel another's woe," and leads the kind and gentle spirit to find its own happiness in relieving the sorrows of the afflicted that gives such a peculiarly lovely expression of compassion and sympathy to the female countenance. It is the constant performance of these unostentatious deeds of charity, which are prompted by the spirit of light and love, and are so acceptable to God, through Christ our Divine Master, who commanded his disciples not to let their left hand know what their right hand did, which will be rewarded by Him who seeth in secret, and will reward openly before an assembled Universe and angels, and archangels, and all the company of heaven. "A Protestant Catechism."

MR. EDITOR:—

"The Episcopal Female Tract Society of Philadelphia," have published for the Society of the "Protestant Episcopal Church, for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania," a tract entitled "A Protestant Catechism." We believe it is an old tract republished, it bears, however, the date, 1848. Along with some valuable remarks and authentic historical information, we find several points which we think to be neither valuable nor authentic. We beg leave honestly to point some of them out. And we do this with entire freedom, being conscious of perfect respect for the individual members of this excellent society, and of real interest in the objects which they seek to accomplish. We are quite willing to bear testimony to the good, which their publications, generally, are effecting.—We think the present tract an exception, and shall feel a measure of regret if our criticisms be taken in an unfriendly spirit.

And first, the very title of the tract, is obnoxious to just criticism. Surely an Episcopal Society, acting for a Protestant Episcopal Society, should be a little more discriminating in the title of their tracts. A Protestant Catechism! What sort of Protestant? one may well enquire. Is it a Protestant Presbyterian, a Protestant Methodist, a Protestant Baptist, a Protestant Unitarian, a Protestant Universalist, or, a Protestant Episcopal Catechism? If this be a Catechism for Protestant Episcopalians, the title of the tract should have specified the fact.

But as we shall proceed to show, the contents are for Protestants in general, not for Protestant Episcopalians in particular: which fact itself proves to us that the funds of the Society might be more consistently appropriated.

The contents of this Catechism, in several particulars, are, in our opinion, not worthy of implicit credence, inculcating unsound doctrine. As a specimen, we give the following question and answer, p. 2.

"Q. To what Church or Society of Christians do you belong?"

"A. I thank God, I am a Protestant."

Now, this is not the teaching or the language of the "Episcopal" or "Protestant Episcopal" Church. We are nowhere taught in the Prayer Book or authoritative standards of the Church, that we are to thank God for being "Protestants." We are quite willing to thank God for being "Protestant Episcopalians," but we have nowhere been taught to render thanks for being simply "Protestants." The title of the Prayer Book and other documents teach us that we are Protestant Episcopalians; the creed teaches us to believe the "Holy Catholic Church," and the collect in the visitation office, teaches us to pray God that we may "die in the communion of the Catholic Church." It is unsound doctrine, according to our judgment, to teach a child or any person to give the answer appended to the question above proposed. We have also to add, that the word "Protestant" in its unqualified form is wholly negative; accordingly, the answer to the above question is, when interpreted, just this:

"Q. To what Church, or society of Christians do you belong?"

"A. I thank God, I belong to no Church—I protest."

As another specimen of unsound doctrine, (if this tract be intended for Protestant Episcopalians) we give the following:

"Q. What do you mean by a Protestant?"

"A. One who protests against the errors of the Roman Catholic religion, and admits no rule of faith and practice but the Holy Scriptures," p. 2.

As this tract is published by Episcopalians, for Protestant Episcopalians, we suppose that the above definition is intended to be in accordance with the principles of our Church. But our Church protests against the errors of the Presbyterian religion, as well as against the errors of the Roman Catholic religion—Our church guards the Apostolic succession just as carefully as she does the Apostolic doctrine; and would just as soon (so far as her legislation enables us to judge) admit a man to celebrate mass at her altars, as to admit a non-Episcopal ordained man to preach in her pulpits.

The answer to the question, "What do mean by a Protestant," is (if it is intended to be a Church answer) radically unsound, contradictory to the tenor of our Church's teaching and practice. Had the answer expressed the meaning of 'Protestant,' in connexion with the meaning of the other part of our title, 'Episcopal,' we should not object.

We find other serious objections to this tract, but the above are sufficient to make "Protestant Episcopalians" cautious in their reception of it. On page 3, we are informed that there were "three general councils in the fourth century," which will be news to most students of Ecclesiastical history. We have been taught hitherto that the general council of Nice, which was held A. D. 325, and the general council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, were the only general councils of the fourth century.

Again, on page 2, we have the question "What then do the Protestants mean when they say in their Catechism, The Body and Blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's supper?"

From which it appears that "Protestants" have another Catechism, from which this "Protestant Catechism" extracts the above words. We were not aware of the fact before. The Church of England's Catechism contains a phrase very like that above quoted; and if "Protestants," in their Catechism mean to say what the Church of England says in her Catechism, let it be so declared, and we will rejoice with them in circulating it. Let us frankly say, that in these days of controversy, and division, our good friends of the "Episcopal Female Tract Society" would better promote the cause of truth and charity, by publishing practical treatises on the nature and requirements of the Christian life, than by issuing tracts which embody what we believe to be questionable opinions on points of controversy in the Catholic Church of Christ.

SACRDOTUS.

For the Banner of the Cross.

To the Parishioners of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia.

As the Banner of the Cross is believed to circulate widely in the Parish of St. Peter's, a member of that Parish and a pew holder in its Church, has asked and obtained from the Editor permission to address you on a subject which has already excited interest in the congregation.

It is now supposed to be known to the whole Parish, since due notice has been twice given from the Desk, that the vestry, by a late vote, have ordered that the whole of the quarterly collection to be made on the coming Sunday,—shall, unless otherwise specially appropriated by the contributors, be applied to the repairing of the church.

To this vote, it is certain that no just exception can be taken on the ground of interference with the present system of quarterly collections, for as the vestry is pledged to make such appropriations of the collection as the parishioners may designate, no one, who may believe that his gift can be more fully expended in some other way than upon the repair or embellishment of the present building, will be disappointed in his wish,—should he express it.

This brings me to the subject of my communication, which I present at once in the form of a simple question.

Is the present church worth repairing? or shall it not be taken down, and another erected in its place?

I seem almost to see the eyes, some glistening, some perhaps flashing, with which my question has been read, and to hear the tones, some mournful, some indignant, in which the reply takes the form of the exclamation.

"What, would you tear down St. Peter's Church?"

Respectfully,—deliberately,—but frankly, I reply, I would.

I would take down the present building, endeared though it be to so many, among them to myself,—and I would see it replaced by a church, more worthy in its design and structure (reverently I say it) of Him who is worshipped there,—more worthy, in its arrangements, of the services performed there,—more worthy in all respects of the truths taught there;—more worthy of its beautiful situation, perhaps the best church site in this city;—lastly, but I urge it not, for it has been said by some without, and not in the best spirit,—more worthy of the congregation worshipping there.

And now, fellow Parishioners, if there be some of you upon whose opposition to all this I must reckon, my friends, most, my elders, many, and my betters, all of you,—bear with me patiently, a brief space, while I endeavor to vindicate my views.

But let me at the outset ask you to believe that I underrate not in the least, your strong feelings of attachment to the present church.

I am perfectly aware of the deep and sincere interest with which old associations have invested to many, the homely but time-honored edifice in which we have so long worshipped. I know that with some, the feeling has deepened into an almost passionate attachment, and that to such, each brick and timber in the building is in every sense sacred. To a few such, perhaps, all appeal on this subject would be hopeless, yet not I trust to all such; for I claim to be of those to whom St. Peter's Church is and must remain, what no other church can ever be. But it is to the ideal of the church, that my attachment clings, and not to its crumbling walls and sinking pews. Its decaying materials do not form the elements of its identity. They are not of its essence. With its site retained, its altar unre-moved, and with the dead who sleep around it, undisturbed, it will be still the same St. Peter's, in which we were wont to hear the mild counsels of Bishop White, the masterly readings of Dr. Abercrombie, and the finished reasonings of Dr. De Lancey. The Genius of the place, (to use the heathen figure,) will still remain in more entire possession than before.

Let St. Peter's become what true Church Architecture guided by devotion, and worked out by wealth, would make it, and its identity would not be thereby lost;—"through the beautiful mask of its perfection" our hearts would still recognize the temple in which we have prayed in sorrow and in joy, at whose font our children have been baptized, under whose shadow we have committed to the dust in reasonable and religious hope our faithful dead,—how soon perhaps to follow them!

To rebuild in a new and better form, is not, therefore, to change. This is not fancy. It is fact. In this city, Christ church thrice rebuilt from its foundation attests it. Trinity Church, in New York, renewed as often, confirms it. Throughout the land, a hundred churches prove it.

But what are the defects of the present building? Briefly these.

1. The relative position of the altar, reading desk and pulpit, and the pews,—by which do what they may, a large portion of the congregation must always kneel with their backs turned to the holy table, and sit with their backs turned to the reader of the Scriptures and the preacher of the sermon, and who generally on the floor and always in the galleries must look into each other's faces as they stand, and intermingle their feet as they kneel.

There never was a more extraordinary Church arrangement. It is no answer to say that true piety soars above these outward inconveniences, and has done so for half a century. I do not deny it, but I yet aver, that they greatly mar the solemnity of the worship. To the young they prove a serious evil. The moral police, so to speak, of a Church, can have no existence in a building, where of necessity, eye every where meets eye, and the contagious smile, or the irreverent gaze cannot be arrested, and finds nothing to awe or to repress it.

Church arrangement is fully as important to the due performance of religious worship, as Church music, and the latter at large cost, has never been neglected at St. Peter's.

Let those who deny all this visit the Church of the Holy Communion, in New York, and say where they have seen a congregation of more devout devotion.

The confession ascends from worshippers all "devoutly kneeling," the lessons are read with all eyes bent upon the reader, and the sacraments are "rightly and duly administered" in every sense, rubrical as well as spiritual. The arrangements of that Church, simple, convenient, reverential, were designed to promote the spirit of devotion,—and accomplish the design.

2. The Galleries. Those only who occupy them, know their inconveniences. There, more than half the occupants, can never see their minister while in the desk or at the altar. If they hear him, while below them, it is by the imperfect reflection of his voice from the ceiling. The pews themselves are wells, into which the air first breathed from lungs of worshippers below, then rising impure and hot to be again respired above, falls and remains, seldom dislodged. Few perhaps, but the sufferers, know the delight with which at the close of a long service, under the closed ventilator, the thronging crowd descending inhales the purer air of heaven without. Drowsiness or restlessness is the natural incident to such a condition of the atmosphere.

3. The accommodations for the Sunday Schools. To the young, who are to be won to the Church, the worst pews in the whole building are devoted. In these small prisons. (I do not say pens,) not all the efforts of the devoted and much enduring teachers can avail, to master the difficulties of their position. Of the male teachers not one dare kneel; each becomes in fact a police-man, and must mount guard, or the restless little occupants of the pew will soon make both his devotion and their own impossible. All the general objections applicable to the Galleries apply with double force to these Pews, and how large and yet important a band of future Churchmen is there collected! And how, when grown to maturity, will these look back upon the Church of their childhood?

Many other defects in the arrangement of the building (some having particular reference to the position of the Rector) might be pointed out, but these will suffice.

So much for arrangement, but as to architecture, what shall be said? In early times and in other lands, Churches were built to express a truth; they had a meaning; Chancel and Nave, and Aisle and Porch, all symbolised in stone some doctrine of the Gospel. Religious Truth was thus made visible; nor could any one, as he may well sometimes do now, mistake a Christian Temple for a Concert room, where Grecian and Egyptian and each other unsuitable order, strive by mythologic associations to unchristianize the imagination of the worshipper.

With such irreverent influences, St. Peter's is by no means chargeable. It merely expresses nothing. Its simple homeliness (before the tower was added) might perhaps have justified the description, which was said to be unintentionally given of it by a worthy Quaker, who was fond of sacred music, and who being one Sunday missed from his accustomed bench, was asked by a friend, where he had been on first-day afternoon,—and replied, "In truth, I went to hear them sing, at Peter's Meeting."

Well, I hear it replied, this is all very fine, and part of it amusing, certainly, but what follows? St. Peter's Church was good enough for our fathers, and our forefathers, and it is good enough for us; are we so much better than they? Are we quite sure that we are even as good?

To the ashes of our forefathers, I reply,—peace and repose. But it were better on every account not to bring them into the discussion of a question which we must settle under our own responsibilities.

I do not indeed ask who has said, and where, "I am wiser than the aged, because I keep Thy commandments," for I dare not say that we are better than our fathers. But I go back to their fathers and their father's forefathers, and the old time before them, and I reach the days of those, "of whom we have heard with our ears and our fathers have told us as to the mighty works which were done aforetime," done by Christian men in the erection of Christian temples, to the honor and glory of God. In this argument, I have them on my side.

I scorn the utilitarian's boast of the modern march of mind; I disclaim all alliance with it; but I would not deny that the Church in the last half century has in England and these United States, awakened from a long slumber to a sense of her duties, her calling and her destiny. She now undervalues no external agency, of power to reach the heart or reason through the senses, and of such the greatest is Christian Architecture. Therefore it is, that I would have Word, Sacraments, and Altar, in harmony with the temple where they are found. Therefore I would have old St. Peter's renewed in a nobler shape for generations yet to come.

But at last, I am told, grant all your arguments, how is the new Church to be built? Whence is the money to come? A new Church will cost at least $30,000. The corporation has no resources not already pledged for its existing debts, and even for necessary repairs the coming collection is addressed to the congregation.

I reply, grant the will, and what St. Peter's congregation wills, is done.

I look not to the Vestry at all for the means. I trust that they will never add another dollar to their present debt; and above all, that they will never do so, to build another such tower as the last. I look to the congregation alone. St. Peter's congregation, which has raised at a single collection, a thousand dollars, which yet left not one man the poorer,—St. Peter's congregation, the assessed value of the property of whose pew-holders rumour estimates, perhaps not falsely, at millions of dollars,—St. Peter's congregation can build a new Church as easily as I can pen the line which affirms it.

But are we ready for the undertaking? I trust so. It is not for me to lead, but I am ready to join heart and hand with all who will work in the cause. I am ready to curtail unnecessary expenses, and to make sacrifices if necessary, to compass an object for which I firmly believe that my children, and my children's children, will thank all who have labored.

I have said that it was not to be urged that another and a better Church would be more worthy of the congregation. But I may ask this question, how do the houses in which so many of us dwell, compare in splendor with the building in which we are content to worship?

God needs not our wealth, it is true, but does he need our parsimony? When I hear it said that the present St. Peter's Church is good enough, I recall an anecdote I once heard in New England.

A minister of the Church, making the tour of his rural parish, was accompanied by a clerical friend who was a man of keen wit, fearing God, but without fear of man. They reached the farm of a wealthy parishioner, more noted for his broad acres than for his alms deeds. It was the hour of dinner, and the travellers were from pure necessity invited to dine. The fare was truly miserable, nor did the host make any attempts to improve it, or apologise for it. Assuming a sort of rude humility, he only remarked that we were all miserable sinners, and that whatever Providence afforded, was vastly better than we deserved.

To this it was of course impossible not to assent, and the inhospitable meal was finished. At its close the churlish host requested one of the clergymen to return thanks. The companion of the Rector therefore took up the duty, and in due form returned thanks—"for the refreshment,—which though infinitely better than they deserved from their heavenly Father, was yet not quite what might have been expected of their earthly friend."

In conclusion let me say, that for what I have written, no one is responsible but myself. Especially have I not done our excellent Rector the injustice to commit him by any previous conference upon what I have now said: though against his wishes, whenever they shall be expressed, I shall certainly not feel at liberty to urge the congregation to any measure upon this subject.

Under the influence of these views, I submit to the congregation the propriety of making no appropriations at the coming collection for the repairs of the present Church.

I would further express the hope that for the sake of the choir, and especially of the daily choir, whose assiduous and faithful Director deserves every encouragement at our hands, the organ, which needs very considerable repair, will be remembered in the specific designations of the collection. On Gesticulation in the Pulpit.

By H. M. Nashville.

The main object of every minister of the Gospel is, we presume, to teach the way of salvation. The term preach in its correct import is greatly misapplied. At all events it is now employed to signify the delivering of a discourse from the pulpit having reference either directly or indirectly to our eternal salvation. If preaching then be not teaching the "way of life," it is nothing worthy of consideration. When Jesus invited men to hear the word of truth, he said "come learn of me," not come and hear me preach. If we turn to his sermon on the mount, it is teaching, not preaching. The fulness of its instruction, the simplicity of its language, the depth of its knowledge, and the completeness of its wisdom, would ill suit the boisterous vehemence attendant upon too much of the preaching of the present day. The pulpit should be no place for declamatory action. We sit before its occupant to listen with reverent attention, not to gaze with wonder and astonishment. The soul athirst for spiritual food gains strength from freshness of thought, and not from coarseness of action and loudness of voice. He who would fain teach well, must first think well, so he that would preach well: that is, he must study how to express best his best thoughts, and then how to impress them best. How far gesticulation can subserve this purpose is a point worthy of consideration. A subject properly considered, and plainly expressed can have need of no violent action on the part of the speaker to render that intelligible which is easy to be understood; and if it lack clearness and conciseness, gesticulation of any kind can but render it less clear by misleading our attention.

It is to the anxious listener what the ignis fatuus is to the benighted traveller. An appeal to the heart through the understanding is the only proper mode of teaching deluded people. That this can be done by a concise expression of well defined thoughts, relevant to the subject, delivered in an audible, and dignified manner, no one can deny. And we will venture to assert, that the more the eloquence of the speaker partakes of the simplicity of his inimitable original, the more is he likely to gain the attention of the simple, the approbation of the uninformed, and the admiration of the learned. But an unfortunate propensity to grandiloquence, than which we know of no literary cachexy in a public man more to be pitied, is sure to betray its aspiring votary; for it cannot be effective without its accustomed attendants, lofty intonation, and conspicuous gesture to support its state, which are absurdities too glaring to deceive any but the most vulgar, or to please any but the most fantastical. He who has recourse to such expedients in order to render his preaching effective, is in danger of incurring the imputation of greatly misunderstanding himself, his hearers, and his subject. It is not to be presumed that energy, pathos, persuasion and argument are not to exert their influence because gesticulation is reprehended; but the more rather, that they may touch the more readily the understanding and the heart, by putting behind them that display which can only pander to the eye and the ear.

Any thing bordering upon stage effect, or what is equally bad, ad captandum, can have no part in that service which is offered to the Deity, or employed in His behalf. It is idle to tell us that this one is good, and that one sincere, when their every action tells us in language too honest to be doubted, that all is the result of studied affectation.

If gesticulation could have any effect in strengthening argument; clearing up doubt; adding to persuasion, or in urging to conviction; then perhaps it might receive, for it would be entitled to receive, some consideration at our hands; but since we have never known a good thought well expressed that was not greatly injured by its officiousness, we may be excused for condemning it as a very pernicious habit. The time, the place, the occasion, all breathe of sanctity, when in stalks gesticulation, swaggers apace, jostles for precedence, and throws all into excitement and noise. It is a plea with some who would like to excuse themselves for such extravagance, that the congregation would go to sleep if they did not employ a little animation to rouse them up. O tempora, O mores! Better to get up an interlude at once, if a farce like this is looked for. But, it may be said, is no action to be used, nothing to be done to give life, soul, spirit, force to a discourse? And it may be replied; if such to any man is necessary to add force, spirit, soul, life to the truth, it is because he knows not what "the truth" is.

When he reads his Testament, or another for him, he needs nothing but the written word; it is all sufficient. Any thing at variance with its dignified simplicity cannot be in accordance with good taste and reverence. They who from early habit have thus indulged should guard against it, for how proper, or necessary or customary, or effective, or even animating soever it may possibly be deemed to fling oneself first on one side of the pulpit and then on the other; and then with sudden rebound to start back; to pause suddenly, and shake the head backwards and forwards with important reiteration; to burst out upon a shrill scream and then sink to the depth of a scarce audible whisper; to throw apart the arms to opposite points, then clasp them in silent, passionate energy;—in fact to assume any or all of those startling positions many continue still to practise, of this be assured, a good man will abhor it; a modest man blush at it, an honest man despise it, a wise man pity it, an intelligent man laugh at it, although others may possibly admire it.

To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 89 south Fifth street, Philadelphia.

FACTS IN FIGURES.—The papers of two neighboring cities have given statements in part of the increase therein of places of worship. We think Philadelphia can show as marked an increase as any other city, and one wherein the Protestant Episcopal Church has a large share.

We have before us an old "directory" for the year 1828, containing the "annual return of the marriages, baptisms, and burials of the Episcopal Churches in Philadelphia, by the clerks and sextons of said Churches, together with an abstract of the marriages, baptisms, and burials, in the various congregations in the city and suburbs, from December 25th, 1826, to December 25th, 1827." This statement appears not to contain reports from all the places of worship which must then have existed. There is, however, an accurate report of "the Episcopal," "Roman Catholic," "Presbyterian," and "Baptist Churches." The number thus obtained for the year 1827—we will compare with the number existing in 1847, as taken from "the Philadelphia Almanac for 1848, by John Downes," by the way a most useful and excellent work.

	Epis.	R. C.	Pres.	Bap.	Meth.	Luth.	G. & D. R.
In 1828,	9	4	13	6	—	4	4
In 1848,	28	12	25	16	23	5	5

In the year 1827 there are only fifty "Churches" of all denominations, of Christians reported; in 1847 there are one hundred and sixty-three. There was then, as now, only one Unitarian place of worship, whereas the Universalists have doubled, being one then, and two now!

We append to this the following account of CHURCHES IN NEW YORK CITY.—Twenty years ago (1828) when the population of this city was 200,000, the number of places for public worship here of all denominations, was 101, of which 22 were of wood. Now, with a population of about 400,000, we have 219 places of this character, showing that we are better supplied now than formerly. Especially does this appear to be true when we consider the larger dimensions of the more modern structures. In architectural beauty and cost of materials the difference is still greater. To say that the amount of capital now invested in church property, is four times as great as it was twenty years ago, would probably not be exaggerating. The following figures show the distinction of the present church structures among the several larger denominations, their increase during the last twenty years, and relative strength:

	Epis.	Pres.	Meth.	Bap.	R. C.	Cong.
In 1828,	18	20	12	14	4	0
In 1848,	42	43	32	24	16	9
Inc. in 20 y.	24	23	20	10	12	9

The denominations not embraced in this list, are unimportant as to numbers, or have remained nearly stationary.—Journal of Commerce.

To which we add the following from the Church Times, in relation to Maryland.

COMPARATIVE INCREASE OF OUR CHURCH AND POPERY.—The Church Times gives the following statistics on this point:

1837—Romish Church in the Archdiocese of Baltimore contained 69 churches, 74 clergymen, 3 Theological Seminaries, 3 colleges for young men, and 8 academies for girls.

1848—It contained 81 churches, 80 clergymen, 3 seminaries, 4 colleges, 7 female seminaries.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

1840—Churches not stated; 72 clergymen; Colleges, or schools for boys and young men, none; for girls, none.

1848—29 churches added; 117 clergymen; one college and five schools for boys and young men; for girls four; added.

The statistics are taken from the documents of the Romish Church and from our Convention Journal. It is not certain that there are not more schools established in our Church, the statement as to their increase being taken from memory. It will be seen that in eight years our increase has exceeded that of eleven years in the Romish Church.

MANNER IN PREACHING.—An article from a distant correspondent, compels us to speak on a subject whereon we would prefer only to think. We are little disposed to add the smallest mite to the immense fund of criticism, upon those whose solemn duty it is to preach the everlasting gospel to dying men, and whose message at once awful and consoling, is heard too often, not because of its matter, but for the sake of the manner in which it is delivered. Few who exercise the high and responsible office of preaching, are disposed to criticise others. Conscious of their own defects, sensible how far they fall short of their great subject, aware of their own failings, they dare not point to the mote in their brother's eye.

The sensible and earnest article of "H. M., Nashville" is published with some degree of hesitation. For, although there are many excellent hints in it, and much strong sense, and conclusive argument, it goes too far in its proscription of what may be not only harmless, but useful in enforcing truth. After due consideration, we determined to let our unknown friend be heard, convinced that his arguments, if fairly and candidly weighed, may have a beneficial tendency. For the writer's sake we feel bound to say that he lives in a region of the country where preaching is too often deformed by those extravagances of manner, which rob it of the dignity and solemnity by which it should ever be distinguished.

The great attribute, by which preaching will ever commend itself, is Truthfulness. It must plainly express the feelings of the heart, and manifest itself as the utterance of conviction. It must therefore be natural and free from all artifice. If the preacher's feelings prompt him to make gestures, there is no canon or rubric to restrain him. If, on the other hand, his feelings do not thus move him, there is no law or rule to compel him, may there is the great law of common sense to prevent him. Action must ever be suited to the word, but let none so misunderstand Demosthenes as to think that eloquence, above all pulpit eloquence, resolves itself into action! For our part, we believe that what a Reverend friend said of puns, is true of gestures, "if a man don't make them, it is because he can't."

There is one lesson at which our correspondent not obscurely hints, and which should be deeply impressed upon every preacher of the gospel. In days when the minds of immortal beings are so intent upon the manner of preaching, it is the plain duty of every minister to avoid all extravagances or eccentricities which may divert the thoughts of the hearers from the truth to the preacher. There can be little doubt, with the inspired models before us, that we have, in preaching, as much as in any thing else, departed from the simplicity of the gospel. And we are disposed to look with favor upon every effort, by which the Christian mind may be directed to thoughtfulness upon this most practical subject. Therefore, while we cannot fully assent to all the positions of our able correspondent, we place his article before our readers, asking for it that kind and thoughtful consideration which the important subject demands.

We copy the following from "the English Churchman," heartily coinciding with its concluding wish. It would be well if charitably disposed readers should remember that although a newspaper may be edited by an individual, it is not edited for an individual. And as different persons have various, often opposite tastes, what displeases one may please a hundred others; and, on the other hand, what pleases one, may displease a thousand others. Our word for it, finding fault with a newspaper is a much easier task than editing one so as not to incur censure!

NEWSPAPERS.—Most people think the selection of suitable matter for a newspaper the easiest part of the business. How great an error! It is by all means the most difficult. To look over and over hundreds of exchange papers every week, from which to select enough for one, especially when the question is, not what shall, but what shall not be selected, is no easy task. If every person who reads a newspaper could have edited it, we should hear less complaints. Not unfrequently is it the case that an editor looks over all his exchange papers for something interesting, and can absolutely find nothing. Every paper is drier than a contribution box; and yet something must be had; his paper must come out with something in it, and he does the best he can. To an editor who has the least care about what he selects, the writing is the easiest part of the labour. A paper, when completed, should be one that his editor should be willing to read aloud to his wife, his mother, his sister, or his daughter; and, if he do that—if he get out such a paper—he will find his labour a most difficult one. Every subscriber thinks the paper is printed for his special benefit; and if there is nothing in it that suits him, it must be stopped—it is good for nothing. Some people look over the deaths and marriages, and actually complain of the editor, if but few people, in his vicinity, had been so fortunate as to get married the previous week, or so unfortunate as to die! An editor should have these things in his paper whether they occur or not. Just as many subscribers as an editor may have, so many different tastes has he to consult. One wants stories and another poetry; another abhors all this. The politician wants nothing but politics. One must have something smart, another something sound. One likes anecdotes, fun, and frolics, and the next-door neighbor wonders that a man of sense will put such stuff in a paper. We only wish that every man, woman, and child, who reads the paper, were compelled, but one single month, to edit one. They would then find that it is not quite so easy a matter as they suppose.—Oxford Herald.

This reminds us of a story which, though somewhat amusing, has a serious application. A minister of some "denomination" or other had a troublesome deacon in his congregation, as we might expect lay deacons betimes would be. Among other troublesome traits of character, this deacon was rather disposed to undervalue the duties discharged by his minister. "What an easy life our minister has! He has little else to do besides preaching! And preaching is a very easy thing to do! In fact any one could preach that tried!"

These and such like remarks, having often come to the minister's ears, he called on the deacon one Saturday, and thus addressed him.

"Well, deacon, they tell me you think that preaching is so very easy."

"Yes, so it seems to me!"

"Would you have any objection to try to-morrow?"

"None in the world!"

Accordingly the next day the congregation were surprised to behold the deacon occupying the pulpit. And all anticipated a rich treat from one who regarded preaching as a very easy performance. But sadly were they disappointed. A very small trial convinced the deacon also of his mistake. After bungling and stumbling for a short time, he abruptly finished his discourse with the following honest and eloquent peroration.

"Well, my friends, I thought until now, that preaching was a very easy thing! All I have got to say is that if any of you think so, just come up and try it!"

APPEAL OF THE TREASURER IN BEHALF OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS.—We most earnestly commend to the regard of the Church the following appeal. Surely it will meet a prompt and liberal response!

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

The Treasurer of the Domestic Committee of the Board of Missions would in the most respectful but urgent manner represent that the condition of his department is such as to require the serious and immediate attention of the Church. If funds to a considerable amount are not soon received great injury and wrong will be done to the labourers and faithful Missionaries scattered far away upon our Western borders; besides increasing the treasurer's burthen of responsibility which is already quite large. He presumes to hope that a knowledge of the condition of the treasury is alone necessary to prompt immediate measures for relief, especially by the large number of city and country parishes which have not yet made the Advent collection recommended by the House of Bishops, besides calling forth individual benefactions in aid of so good a cause from those whom God has blessed with wealth.

NEW YORK, MARCH 28, 1848, 139 BROADWAY.

TO THE DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA.—The following notice calls for immediate attention. Surely it is the duty of "Episcopals" to provide duly for the higher as well as inferior orders of the Ministry, specially when Law requires it.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The Episcopal Fund, for the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

The undersigned desires respectfully to call the attention of the Parishes of the Diocese to the following recommendations of the Convention, viz.,—Convention of 1829. See revised regulations, No. 6.

"It is recommended to every settled clergyman, once in every year, to preach a sermon on the Episcopal office, or on the apostolic succession, or on such other subject as to him shall seem best adapted to recommend this fund to support and patronage."

"On every such occasion a contribution shall be received, for the sole and express purpose of making provision for the support of the Episcopate."

"The money so collected shall be forwarded to the Treasurer of the Fund, who shall keep an account of all monies received and report at every stated Convention."

By the Convention of 1846, it was

"Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to the several parishes of the Diocese, which have not as yet pledged a specific annual contribution to the Episcopal Fund, to assume the yearly payment of a sum for that purpose, not less than five per cent. upon the amount paid as the salary of the Rector or minister."

Inasmuch as last year only twenty-six parishes contributed, and forty-one have thus far during the current year, out of 120 parishes in the Diocese, it is not improbable many have no knowledge of the existence of these recommendations. They are therefore now placed before them. The Fund has not increased for many years, and a very large share of the support of the Diocesan now falls on a few parishes, which ought only to bear their just proportion. The co-operation of all would make it easy, not only to provide for the annual claims on the Fund, but for its regular increase, which in a few years might render the annual appeals unnecessary.

Any contributions designed for the current year must be placed with me before the 1st of May, when the account is usually closed.

JOHN WELSH, JR.,

Treasurer of the Episcopal Fund.

Philadelphia, March 28th, 1848.

We have great pleasure in giving to the readers of the Banner able discussions like the following, upon practical questions regarding our holy and solemn worship. Few are better able to discuss questions of this kind than the writer of the article appended. We see not how any can resist the conclusive answer here given as to the rubrical authority for chanting the Psalter.

The title of this portion of our service ought to be changed if there is any impropriety in singing the Psalter. According to Walker, the "Psalter" is "the volume of Psalms" and a "Psalm" is "a holy song." Why it is proper to "sing Psalms," when their sense and beauty are impaired by metre and rhyme, and improper to "sing Psalms," in prose expressing their rich and full meaning, is a question to deep for our philosophy! St. James should then have said "Is any merry? let him sing Psalms" in Long, Short, Common, or Particular metre!

Is Chanting the Psalter Rubrical?

MR. EDITOR:

As the subject of rubrical interpretation seems, at present, to be attracting some interest, allow us to make a few observations which may serve to answer the question prefixed to this article. Every friend of the Church must regard with satisfaction, the attention which many of the Laity manifest in questions relating to the outward, as well as inward efficiency of our system. Instead of attributing such zeal to formalism, or to any other unworthy principle, the charitable christian will recognize in all attempts to improve church architecture, music, order, &c., a godly desire to realize more deeply "the beauty of holiness." To the same excellent motive, are we willing to attribute many of the criticisms of the Laity, on the method of conducting Public service, and of administering the Divine offices, practised by their Pastors. We cannot, indeed, approve of the harshness, which occasionally accompanies the decision of laymen (and women,) on alleged unrubrical practices, where the parties criticised are "Bishops and other clergy" known to be careful of such points, and where the infallibility of the lay critic has not been clearly established.

In no department of Liturgical matters is the necessity of painful study and judicious judgment more obvious, than in that of rubrical interpretation. For we do well to remember that our Prayer book is a part, and only a part of a system, and that an accurate judgment on a rubrical question may require a consideration of contemporaneous practice, and some knowledge of ecclesiastical history. It must also be recollected, that our Ritual is, in the main, no new production, and that in many parts, the correct explication of a rubric may involve a knowledge of other times and other phraseology.

We shall so far apply these remarks to the precise subject in hand, as to observe, that a careful attention to older phraseology may, perhaps, decide the question, "Is chanting the Psalter, rubrical?"

The person who objects to singing the Psalter, generally quotes the following Rubric. "The Psalter shall be read through, &c." And taking the term "read" in its popular sense as opposed to "sung," the objector assumes that this is its rubrical sense, and consequently decides that singing the Psalter is unrubrical.

Our reply is very brief. The popular sense of the term read is not the rubrical sense.

The rubrical term "say" is the antithesis to "sing:" whilst the term "read" comprehends either saying or singing.

For example. One Rubric, in the Church of England Prayer Book, (from which our Prayer Book takes the rubric about reading the Psalter) declares, that "the creed of St. Athanasius is appropriated to be read," whilst another rubric declares "it shall be 'said or sung.'"

Again. The English Rubric directs, "The Psalter shall be read," whilst another rubric, in the Daily Prayer, relating to the Psalter, directs, "Then shall be said or sung the Psalms in order as they are appointed."

It is evident, therefore, that the term "read" which our (and the English) Prayer Book retains in the rubric, "The Psalter shall be read," means "saying or singing."

But we have another way of arriving at the express mind of the American Reviewers of the Prayer Book on this matter.

The American Prayer Book not only follows the English services and rubrics generally, but contains, among other services peculiar to it, one entitled, "A Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God, for the fruits of the earth. &c. &c." Now in directing what portion of the Psalter should be used on this occasion, Bishop White and his coadjutors had a fair occasion, to decide the question, which we are now considering. Had they considered it inexpedient, or improper, or unrubrical to sing the Psalter, they might, in making a new rubric, have settled the point. They have, indeed, settled the point, but directly against those who, in these days, seem fonder of good Bishop White's name, than of his principles.

The American rubric is as follows. "Then shall be SAID OR SUNG one of the Selections, or some other portion of the Psalms, at the discretion of the Minister."

Here then, is a service peculiar to the Protestant Episcopal Prayer Book. Our American Reviewers, as if to settle the question of the right and propriety of chanting the Psalter, at the discretion of the minister, express (what the English Prayer Book evidently means,) and say that the Psalms "shall be said or sung." Observe, the rubric does not use the phrase "read or sung," but "said or sung," thus proving that "say" is the proper antithesis to "sing" in the American as well as English rubric, and that Bishop White and his friends, in constructing new rubrics, as well as in retaining old ones, adhered to the Ecclesiastical and not popular standard of rubrical terminology.

In conclusion, we remark, that in our judgment (founded on the above reasons,) it is rubrical to sing the Psalter, just because "the Psalter is appointed to be 'read.'" The term "read" comprehending 'saying or singing.' The only law, whether to say or sing, being, as the rubric for Thanksgiving Day directs "the discretion of the Minister."

And we humbly submit, that any Minister who surrenders his "discretion," in this or any other matter, to the flippant criticism of a clamorous layman, is as reprehensible, as he who will not surrender it to the godly judgment of his ecclesiastical superior.

In the present article, we have confined ourselves to the rubrical question. Having no very great interest in this subject other than as one of law; being just as content to say, as to sing the Psalter; and quite satisfied with the right to use our "discretion" to do either, we shall not dwell on (what is a forcible view of the case,) the more popular objections to never singing the Psalter. For certainly, now, it is a strange thing, to forbid us to sing psalms, which were written to be sung: it is certainly odd (to use no other word,) to call upon us in the 95th Psalm, "O come let us sing unto the Lord," or again in the 96th Psalm, "Sing unto the Lord all the whole earth," and when we begin to sing, arrest us, saying, "The Psalter is appointed to be read." It is something like mockery, to rouse our souls with the jubilant strains of the 92d Psalm, "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most Highest," and when we prepare to do the good thing, find ourselves checked with the decision that it is a very bad thing to sing the Psalter.

But we shall leave the examination of these points to others who care to discuss them; as also, the setting forth of how, from the beginning, the good Bishops of our Mother Church, who were appointed to watch (among other matters) that the Psalter should be "read," did both permit their Priests to "sing" it, and sang it themselves, right heartily. SACERDOS.

P. S. We beg leave to propose to such as are accustomed to object to singing the Psalter, the following query.

Is singing "Glory be to thee O Lord" (before reading the Gospel for the day) rubrical?

The rubric is "the people shall say." We believe, however, that those whose consciences trouble them about singing the Psalter, are accustomed to sing, every Sunday, that which the Church expressly declares "the people shall say."

SACERDOS.

IMPORTATION OF BOOKS FROM EUROPE.—We call the attention of our readers to Mr. Pennington's advertisement on this subject. Mr. P. has removed to a large and commodious store No. 10 South Fifth street. All who have had dealings with this gentleman will acknowledge his obliging manner, and prompt attention to orders.

CLOSING EXERCISES OF ST. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.—We have received a most interesting communication from one, whose judgment is of high authority, in reference to the above. We regret that it reached us too late for this week's Banner, it shall appear in the next.

THE BISHOP OF TENNESSEE, Divine Providence permitting, expects to be engaged in a visitation of the churches of the Western district of Tennessee, from the 2d Sunday in April, to the 2d Wednesday in May, when the Convention meets.

Obituary.

Friday morning March 31st in the City of Reading, departed this life, Mrs. LYDIA C. wife of David F. Gordon Esq., and daughter of Marks, John Biddle, Esq.

Mrs. Gordon was an intelligent and devoted Church-woman. She became a communicant of the parish in this place in the year 1828,—and was faithful in attendance on the services and ordinances of the Church. Her heart was ever open, and her hand ready to promote its interests and prosperity.

A Lady of cultivated mind,—polished and gentle manners, she was kind to all with whom she had any intercourse. The poor and the distressed found in her a sympathizing and relieving friend. Her works of charity—and they were many—were performed in the most unostentatious manner. In her connection with the Church, in all the relations of life—domestic and social, she was truly exemplary. Her's was a meek, serene, practical, radiant piety. Long will she be remembered by numerous friends for the loveliness of her spirit,—as well as the sound judgment and decision of character, which made her wise in counsel, and energetic in action.

Her death was in accordance with her life, resigned, calm, peaceful. For a long time had she been setting all her house in order.

Feeble and declining health—for the last six or eight years—admonished her daily of a speedy removal. She looked to the close of her pilgrimage, with the feelings and hopes of a Christian. When the hour came to leave the world, it was in the quietness and confidence of humble resignation; and abiding faith in her Redeemer. Her departure was as composed and tranquil, as the little infant falls asleep upon the mother's tender bosom.

Her decease has made a void in an endeared family circle—in the parish church—and in the community of which she was a highly respected and most useful member. Where best known she was most loved, and there will her loss be felt with the deepest pain. She has gone from among us! but has left behind to comfort her mourning and bereaved relatives and friends "the sweet remembrance of the just"

THE "MYSTERY OF GODLINESS." By Samuel L. Southard, A.M., Rector of Calvary Church, N. Y. N. York, D. Appleton

& Co., 200 Broadway; Philadelphia, G. S. Appleton, 148 Chesnut street.

This work, which comes to us in a most attractive shape, and bearing a highly esteemed name, we have received with pleasure, and read, we trust, with profit.

We have unfolded by an able mind, and in an eloquent and striking manner, that rich and sublime text, so suggestive of noble and stirring thought—"Without controversy, great is the mystery of Godliness; God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." 1 Timothy, 3: 16.

Each clause of this verse forms the text of a separate discourse, which though distinct from each other are all parts of one noble plan, thus declared by the author in the preface.

"They are designed to be an humble plea in behalf of the doctrine of the Incarnation of the Son of God, and of His wisdom, manifested in the plan of our salvation."—This is at once a noble and a practical theme. Noble, for it teaches man the dignity of humanity, illustrated in "the Son of Man," who was "made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death," that he might be "crowned with glory and honour." This is a practical theme of highest import, and calling for our most earnest consideration. Although the open heresy of the Docetæ has passed away from the earth, and in theory all who call themselves Christians, recognize the real humanity of our Blessed Saviour, while some ascribe to Him no higher nature, still in dwelling upon the divinity of Christ, it has come to pass that the mind of believers has lost the full, clear, and vivid apprehension of that profound "mystery of godliness," God manifest in the flesh! We do not mean that any could be found to deny the perfect manhood of the Son of God, but their apprehension of this amazing reality is weak and feeble.

We welcome, therefore, with real pleasure, able and stirring discourses like these, which may have the blessed effect of impressing this great mystery, so far as it may be apprehended, upon the Christian mind and heart.

We cannot better show the manner in which this subject is treated, than by quoting the author's own analysis of his work given in the Preface.

The first discourse maintains the theory that there not only are, but must be "mysteries" in the plan of our salvation, it being the device of perfect wisdom, in a case where human intellect must have forever failed. It also defines the meaning of the term, in scriptural acceptance: and answers the objection, which is often raised, that there are mysteries in our religion.

The second gives the Scriptural and Catholic theory of the Incarnation, with proofs of the humanity and Deity of Jesus Christ, and urges, against the objection that the doctrine is so wonderful, the many mysteries which are received.

The third presents the testimony to the divinity of Jesus Christ, before and at the time of his appearing, and subsequent to his ascension; which is the witness of the Holy Spirit, by whom our Lord was "justified."

The fourth supplies the testimony of the Angels, who are examined as to their knowledge of the Eternal Son, ever since their own creation, and their belief, or not, that he became the Son of man, still being perfect God.

The fifth maintains that Paul, in preaching to the Gentiles, on his own confession preached the "unknown God;" and that "the unknown God," whom he declared, was not the God of nature, whose existence may be read upon its ample page, but the God of grace, in Jesus Christ; where He is most "unknown."—It also shows the power which attends the preaching of the cross, to be itself a "mystery."

The sixth rescues the language of the text from what is thought to be a frigid and erroneous interpretation; and shows, that the fact that the doctrine of the Incarnation was "believed on in the world," was not recorded by St. Paul, in this connection, to assert so much, the progress of the gospel, as to declare that its reception, under circumstances calculated to test its consonance with reason, and by men whose understandings were enlightened by the Spirit, proves it to be not only a divine, but rational Christianity.

The last displays the further evidence of his divinity, which is supplied by his ascension, and the benefits which we derive. Then follows the summing-up of all the testimony which has been produced. And it concludes with a concise and general statement of the plan of our salvation.

Imperfect as they are, I am thankful that they have been blessed already. And if now, by their publication, one soul shall be redeemed from error, or one heart, which is already His, shall kindle with intenser love for "the only wise God, our Saviour," it will repay the most unworthy of His ministry, who craves to lay his offering upon the footstool of His throne.

Quotations from the work itself, which will best exhibit the style of the author, and his forcible manner of proclaiming high and holy truth, we must reserve for another number. Though we often feel that in giving such samples we do great injustice to an author, it is very much like taking a piece of a house as a specimen of the whole! This work is inscribed, with a most appropriate and beautiful dedication, "to the Right Reverend the Bishop of New Jersey." The exterior of the book is in admirable keeping with the interior. It reflects great credit upon the Publishers, and is one of the very best specimens we have ever seen from the American Press.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE, A FIGHT OF FAITH. By Rev. H. Hooker.

In a brief notice of this work, one which was intended to be kind and favorable, we said "This is a Practical Work, and although we may not assent to all its doctrines, it is on the whole a production of much excellence." We have been called upon, in a kind manner, "to state the grounds of our exceptions," which we regret not having done in the former notice. There is no doubt that a vague charge of any kind is more injurious than a specific one, and for this unintentional wrong we ask our friend's indulgence.

On the other hand, we must say that it is a very forced construction of our very limited "exceptions," to say, that "it would make the impression on minds that the book is not sound in the faith of the Church." The opinion expressed was that merely of an individual, and of one who has not arrived at that high degree of infallible presumption which would pronounce those, with all of whose doctrines he may not agree, as "unsound in the faith of the Church." We readily assent to the request that we should "state our exceptions."

The term "doctrines" was used in a popular sense, as equivalent to "teaching." And our only exception to the teaching of this work, of whose general excellence we are more convinced, from a more careful perusal, is its deficiency in bringing out the system of the Church with regard to the "Encouragements, Methods and Aids of Grace in the Fight of Faith."

The work is divided into four chapters, having the following titles:—

Chapter I. Prevalence of sense.—Its various workings as a foe to the Spirit.

Chapter II. Separate consideration of some of the foes of the Christian life.

Chapter III. Encouragements, Methods, and Aids of grace in the Fight of Faith.

Chapter IV. Encouragements from example.—Promises to the victorious.—Reflections.

With chapters I. II. and IV. we most fully agree, and regard them not only as most profitable discussions of important practical truths, but as expressing high and just sentiments, in a strong and pointed manner, and indicating deep thought and profound knowledge.

Our "exceptions" are only against chapter III. on account of its deficiency in bringing out the noble system of means, by which the Church so well provides "Encouragements, methods, and aids of grace in the fight of faith." This important practical topic is treated in a way that will suit the most opposite systems. We "may not assent" to any "doctrines" or teachings on this subject, which do not most clearly and unequivocally bring out the "METHODS AND AIDS OF GRACE," which the Church provides for her members, at the command of God's Holy Word. Yet the Author of "the Christian Life" gives us a long chapter on this subject, in which there is not a word of the more solemn ordinances of our Faith, or of those Holy Sacraments which are set forth in the "doctrines" of the catechism "as generally necessary to salvation," and defined to be "outward and visible signs of an inward and spiritual grace, given unto us, ordained by Christ himself as a means whereby we receive the same and a pledge to assure us thereof."

If our author intended his work to suit Christians of all denominations, very well. But if he designed it as a practical work for the edification and instruction of the members of the church, "we may not assent" to the doctrines of Chapter III. In teaching Christian truth, the truth of God, truth which concerns the souls of men, we are bound to speak "the whole truth" as well as "nothing but the truth." Sins of omission are in our esteem as great evils as sins of commission. This deficiency has given to Chapter III. a mysticism and want of clear meaning which forms a marked contrast with the plainness and force of the other Chapters.

In continual and vivid remembrance of our vows, and of the Divine promises, made in the baptismal Covenant; in the voluntary assumption of these vows, and the grace, given in Confirmation; in the "strengthening and refreshing of our souls," in the Holy Communion; in the daily and devout hearing and reading of God's Holy Word; in the faithful and frequent worship of the Most High, in the Sanctuary, at the family altar, in the closet: must we seek for "encouragements—methods and aids of grace in the fight of faith." And we may not assent to any teaching, or "doctrine" which omits any or all of these, however fully it may set forth other "encouragements, methods and aids."

We hope our esteemed friend, the author, will take these remarks in the frank and kind spirit in which they are offered, in answer to a call upon us "to state our exceptions." We must either pass over books in silence, or make "exceptions" which we honestly think ought to be made, no matter what may be our personal feelings. And the author of the Christian Life has the comfort to think that our "exceptions" will be the highest commendation which we could give of his work in the estimation of some.

Foreign Intelligence.

The English Church Journals are almost entirely filled with accounts of the recent political changes in France, and comments thereon. As histories of these matters abound in all our secular papers, of an earlier date, we pass them by with the earnest prayer that France may not become again the theatre of bloody tragedies, like those once enacted there, and that this distracted country may soon return to that "quietness and confidence" which are a nation's only "strength."

The following items of intelligence we copy from "the English Churchman" of March 2d, and March 9th.

The following letter to the Standard, from the Proctors in the recent suit, shows that no further opposition to Dr. Hampden's Consecration is to be expected from that quarter:—

Sir,—We are instructed to request that you will notify, that the case and opinion in the matter of Dr. Hampden, published in your paper of Feb. 22nd, was forwarded to you without the sanction or knowledge of the promoters of the suit therein alluded to. And we are further instructed by the promoters to state, that they have no intention of proceeding by petition to the House of Lords: their plain object having been to try the fitness of Dr. Hampden for the office of a Bishop, on the ground of suspected unsoundness of teaching; that they have had recourse to the appointed Court for the purpose of stating their objections, and, though promised a hearing, they have been sent away unheard; they have applied for a mandamus, and the judges being equally divided in opinion, they have failed to obtain a writ. They have sufficient reasons for declining to enter upon a new question of privilege affecting the House of Lords, and they now leave it to the authorities, spiritual and temporal, in their respective departments, to apply whatever remedies are required. The promoters are content, in patience, that the case thus treated but undetermined, should stand on record for all time, as one of a Bishop elect confirmed uncanonically as they believe; of an Ecclesiastical court refusing to hear those whom it cites to appear; of the law doubtful in the divided opinions of its judges; and yet they hopefully pause for an Archbishop, now the last remaining authority to whom they stand indebted, with this notorious case as his conscience dictates, and as the call of the Church, so widely expressed, requires.

We are, Sir, your faithful servants,
Doctors Commons, Feb. 26. TOWNSEND AND ROBERTS.

It is positively asserted, by some, that in consequence of the death of the Primate, Dr. Hampden will have to be re-Conferred; and it is said to be not improbable that, in that case, a formidable objection will be made. There certainly seems a singular fatality about this endeavour to force Dr. Hampden into the Episcopate.

ROME.—Feb. 15. The journals of this morning have come out with red printing ink, to glorify the three constitutional charters of Turin, Tuscany, and Naples. The Pope sent yesterday a circular note to every cardinal in Rome to attend at the Quirinal, and though the consistory was secret its object is not doubted. Cardinal Patrizi, the Vicar-General of Rome, a retrograde and narrow-minded ascetic, has resigned his office, and is succeeded by Cardinal Orioli, a man of enlarged understanding, and conversant with human nature. Cardinal Altieri attended the theatre, in the state box, on Saturday, and was warmly applauded: he is President of Rome and the Comarca, and as the Cardinal-Legate of every province is expected to patronize the opera, he was ordered by Pío Nono to appear in his place. An account has come from Constantinople of the reception of the Papal Nuncio Ferrieri by the Grand Vizier. That sublime personage presented the glaoui with coffee, and a splendid jewelled pipe, and they sat on the ottoman for an hour conversing on things in general and puffing their chibouks in perfect amity. Titmarsh or Esthen might do justice to the scene. A question arises here why a Papal Nuncio who can smoke with an infidel may not take share of a sirloin at Windsor Castle? "If not, why not?"—Express.

The general opinion in every circle is that before the Carnival the Pope will have fully matured his plan of Representative Chambers, with a House of Peers composed like your own of a select bench of Cardinals and hereditary Roman Princes.—The journals here already give significant hints of what popular expectation and resolve is on the point, for the home news is now placed under two distinct headings, viz., Italia Constitutionale, being Tuscany, Piedmont, and Naples; Italia non Constitutionale, being Rome, Parma, Modena and Lombardy!—Ibid.

For the following we are indebted to the N. Y. Churchman.

Of the several persons spoken of for the See of Chester—Drs. Peacock, Whewell, Waddington, Lord W. Russell, brother to the Premier, and Dr. Graham, Master of Christ College, Cambridge,—the last has been selected. He is one of Prince Albert's Chaplains. In Politics, he has the reputation of being a Whig, and something more.

Dr. Graham will be succeeded in the Mastership of the College, by Rev. James Cartnell, one of the Tutors.

The stall in the Cathedral of Durham, which has become vacant by the elevation of the Bishop of Chester to the Arch bishopric of Canterbury, will hereafter be limited to £1000, the surplus going to the augmentation of small livings. The office, which is in the gift of the Bishop of Durham, must be filled by a Professor in Durham University; and it is probable that the Rev. Professor Temple Chevalier will receive the appointment.

The Archbishop of Paris has given in his adhesion, and that of his Clergy, to the new order of things. He has substituted the name of Republic for that of Kingdom, in the Public Prayers, and ordered the flag of the Republic to be hoisted on the steeples of the Churches. He visited the hospitals in his Episcopal dress, and gave his benediction to the wounded.—

The other French Bishops have taken a similar course. Several Pastoral letters have been issued, inculcating peace and order on the people, and teaching that it is their duty to accept whatever form of Government, in the course of God's providence, may be established. It is stated that the number of communicants in the Churches of Paris was unusually large, among whom were many armed men. On taking the Tuileries, the people found a magnificent image of Christ. They stopped and saluted it. "My friends," cried a pupil of the Ecole Polytechnique, "this is the Master of us all!" The people took the image and bore it to the Church of St. Roch, calling upon the citizens to take off their hats. On the Sunday after the outbreak, all the Churches were opened, and Masses were said for the dead. In the Cathedral of Notre Dame, the Abbe La Cordaire, a celebrated preacher of the Dominican Order—late made the Vicar General of the Archbishop—delivered an eloquent discourse. Addressing the Archbishop, he said, "Mon seigneur, the country, by my voice, thanks you for the courageous and Catholic example which you have given; it thanks you for having known how to conciliate the immutability of the Church, and the sanctity of oaths with the changes which God effects in the world by the hands of men." The preacher, as if to give proofs of this immutability wished to continue the development of the doctrine which he had set forth so eloquently for several years. He appeared to desire to entrench himself behind the divine tradition, and to preserve it from the invasion of history; but the fire burst out, and the Dominican of the people, arriving at the proofs of the existence of God, cried out, "Prove to you God! Were I to attempt to do so, you would have a right to call me parricide and sacrilegious. If I dared to undertake to demonstrate unto you God, the gates of this Cathedral would open of themselves, and show you this people, superb in its anger, carrying God to his Altar in the midst of respect and adoration." The whole auditory were so much moved, that they testified loud applause, which the sanctity of the place could not restrain. The Debats, alluding to this scene, says—"It is well; let the Church take its place like us all. Let it show itself; the people will recognize it. Let it not have any dread of the Revolution, in order that the Revolution may not be afraid of it.—God has delivered the world to discussion. Tradidit mundum disputandi. Let the Church use its arms, the Word and charity, instruction and action. Let it aid itself, God will aid it."

We take the following from "the Guardian" of March 1st.

We observe that the late rescript from Rome is not without its effects in at least some parts of Ireland. In the Roman Catholic diocese of Ossory, which includes the county of Kilkenny, the priests have been enjoined by their Diocesan, Dr. Walsh, to abstain from all political allusions whatever, and even to desist from subscribing to the "Conciliation Hall" rent.

We gather from the Colonial Church Chronicle for this month that at a meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel on Friday, Feb. 8, the election of its officers, with the exception of the President, took place.

There was a very large attendance of members, including, among others, the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of London, Llandaff, Exeter, Salisbury, the Earl of Harrowby, Sir R. H. Inglis, Bart, M.P., the Dean of Manchester, Archdeacons Sinclair, Jones, Thorp, Hale, and Hamilton, Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay, Rev. Sir H. R. Dukinfield, Rev. Drs. Spry, Russell, Jelf, Wordsworth, Vivian, &c. &c. The Archbishop of York presided. The Earl of Harrowby moved, and the Bishop of London seconded, a series of resolutions expressive of the grateful sense of the society of the late Primate's great exertions on its behalf, and sorrow at the loss it had experienced in his death. In the course of his remarks Earl Harrowby said:—

"How can I—how can any one of us—forget that winning gentleness of manner, that graceful simplicity of demeanour, which so peculiarly distinguished our late Archbishop?—qualities which, in him, were by no means incompatible with firmness of principle and even energy of action, whenever occasion called for them. It is no time now to go into evidence on this point as to the general government of the Church; but, at any rate, within these walls this union of qualities will not be questioned. By his conciliating spirit, by the largeness of his views, he harmonised elements amongst us not always of themselves most harmonious; and the facts stated in the resolutions show the spirit and the energy which he threw into our proceedings. When he first guided the operations of the society the principle of Episcopacy was scarcely admitted into our colonies. During his administration, and under his guidance, the absence of it became the exception—an exception, happily, fast disappearing. He found 5 Bishops in our Colonies, he left 21; he found 122 Missionaries in the service of the society, he left full 334, and these certainly not less zealous, not less fitted for the task of spreading the Gospel of Christ amongst our extended Colonies, than the smaller number."

The Bishop of London also bore equal testimony to the memory of the deceased:—

"I shall ever regard our late venerated President as one of the kindest of benefactors, and wisest of consellers. For upwards of twenty years there has been between us the most entire concurrence of sentiment and opinion on all the great ecclesiastical questions which have, during that period, required our consideration. And I shall carry to the grave, as one of the sweetest consolations, a remembrance of the kind and friendly, but too ample, acknowledgments made by his Grace for assistance which I have been enabled to render him."

Again:—

"He was imbued with the deepest and truest spirit of Christian humility. No man ever lived, who had been raised to such a dignity—the highest dignity in the Christian world—I say, the highest in the Christian world, because it is the highest in the reformed Church of Christ—no man so raised was ever more characterised by a spirit of Christian humility. At my last interview with him, three weeks ago, when there was a temporary improvement in his Grace's health, which inspired others with some hope, but did not, I think, deceive him—on that occasion I was speaking to him of the benefits he had conferred upon the Church, and assured him that the prayers of thousands were offered up on his behalf, for his continuance amongst us. He replied, "I do not know what I have done for the Church, I have done my best. But what am I, a poor sinful creature, that should be chosen to do any thing for the Church of Christ!"

The Rev. Ernest Hawkins (Secretary to the Society), read the following anecdotes of his Grace:—

"Just one month ago, on the 18th of January, I saw our lamented President for the last time. On that day, in conformity with our invariable practice, I waited upon his Grace to submit for his consideration the business which was to come before the next board. A grant of 100% towards a fund for the maintenance of the two orphan children of the Rev. Richard Anderson, who had died of fever contracted during his prolonged and most devoted attendance upon the sick emigrants at the quarantine Station near Quebec, had been recommended by the committee, and I took occasion to refer to the peculiar circumstances of the case, as justifying such a grant, notwithstanding the pecuniary difficulties in which the Society was involved. The Archbishop assented to the grant, as a matter about which there could be no doubt; and adding, 'I should like to do something for these poor orphans,' wrote a check for 20%, which he gave me on their behalf. After this, on learning from me that the Society was anxious that the Queen's letter for a general collection should be issued without further delay, his Grace, though obviously very feeble, wrote a letter, with his own hand, Sir George Grey, requesting that the necessary measures should immediately be taken for the transmission of the royal letter."

Communications.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Two Attempts.

Mr. Editor:

Of the following slight effusions the history is this. In 1823, the General Convention appointed a Committee to revise (then) old Hymns, and propose new ones. As is not uncommon with our ubiquitous committees, a quorum could not be had in the recess: but several of the members came together; and the result of their consultation was given in a pamphlet. This pamphlet was reviewed by your humble servant in the "Christian Journal" for 1824 and 1825; and many of the suggestions were adopted. Some, however, were not. Among the latter were two substitutes, for an old Hymn, and one of the proposed new ones; yet they may be worth the corner of a newspaper. The former has been somewhat expanded, and both revised, since their appearance in the "Journal."

Our Hymn 147, ("When I can read my title clear,") was formerly the 41st; and it came into its new position with only slight alteration in the last verse. But it is largely objectionable,—calvinistic in its basis, and enthusiastic, not to say fanatical, throughout: and so it was intimated in the work mentioned, p. 268. The author, Dr. Watts, was consistent in embodying the election and the inflexible grace of the Westminster Confession in the phrases "title clear," and "bid farewell to every fear:" not so, however, the thousands among us, who, because the verses are smooth, and the hymn popular, and carries well a dozen sweet tunes, delight in singing the lubricious error, and in teaching it to their children. Be what they may the imperfections of the the following lines, no fault so grave will, I trust, be found in them.

CHRISTIAN TRUST.

When sin, the tyrant of my soul,
To Christ in thralldom lies,
My hope, surmounting fear's control,
Shall press to win the prize.
With pardon healing all within,
With grace in holy pow'r,
My plighted Victor over sin
Fails not in peril's hour.
Then, should o'erbear a frowning world,
Or, smiling, lure to yield,
Should Satan's fiery darts be hurl'd;
Mine is the Conqueror's shield.
Let care and disappointment come,
Sorrow on sorrow crowd;
Disarmed, they speed me to my home,
The dwelling-place of God.
Joy, weary soul! no hardship there!
New vigour, blissful rest!
Nor sin nor foe invades, nor care
The country of the blest.

In my good-will to hymn-singing, and desire to have no hymns below a fair average of respectability, I offered a substitute for one proposed in the pamphlet, that which is now Hymn 67, "Now the shades of night are gone,"—and which, besides the want of dignity throughout, begins with a false rhyme, and has two similar rhymings in the first and second verses, with no mechanism to render it graceful. My piece, here retouched, is in the "Christian Journal," V. 9. p. 203.

MORNING.

Night is past, and past its gloom,
Morning rises, day is come:
Nature's glories, as they shine,
Lord, reflect thy face benign.
Jesus, orb of heavenly day,
Drive the shades of sin away;
Fill our souls with hallowed light,
Banish doubt, unveil our sight.
Earth is fair by heavenly beams,
Man is pure by heavenly streams:
Bright as nature's beauties glow,
In our hearts thy image show.
When our mortal days shall cease,
Lord, vouchsafe the day of bliss:

Night nor sin o'ercast their gloom
When th' eternal morn is come.

Thus you see, good Mr. Editor, that though my anonyme has gone into heathen company, it does not keep me from the better fellowship of Christians. Translating and mending are humble occupations, yet serviceable in their place; and so is paraphrasing, which is a kind of translation: only the maker is a poet, the maker of thoughts, not of lines and rhymes. Content with being a versifier, I subscribe myself, as before,

Mr. Editor:

Your correspondent G. has completely mistaken the aim and object of the writer, who commented on his original notice of St. Mark's Church. The author of that comment knew that the notice had produced very unfavorable impressions on several minds—he also felt that there was good ground for their dissatisfaction in the terms employed since "Patron saints" were a class of persons not recognized among those who yet considered the saints of God, worthy of honor and reverent imitation. At the same time he had no idea that G. meant any evil, or was in his theology nigh to the awful precincts of idolatry. Under these circumstances it occurred to him that a good-humored notice of the objectionable article in the same paper, in which that article originally appeared, would prevent notices of a much more serious character. Hence he wrote, and if to any reader his spirit seemed one of "ill-timed and mis-placed merriment," he can only beg that reader's pardon, and promise for the future to regulate his humor more judiciously.

But sir, Neophyte has read with feelings very far removed from those of even the most subdued mirth, the defence which G. has seen fit to offer of this doctrine of saintly patronage—"What exact benefit is conferred by such a patronage," (he says) I am not prepared to say," but that some benefit does result he plainly intimates as his opinion, and by his immediate illustration of patron angels for children, and a certain saintly intercession which he thinks the creed teaches, or rather "requires us to believe," shows us that the benefits of patronage must be something conferred on the Church or congregation, through the instrumentality of the "triumphant departed," chosen as a Patron! Mr. Editor I feel disposed to leave the doctrine to stand and speak for itself. But lest by so doing, I may seem to treat your correspondent with less respect than I feel for every honest though mistaken churchman, I simply add—

That whereas God's word says of angels, "they are ministering spirits," &c. And of children, "their angels do always behold the face of my Father," &c., it has not one solitary syllable about the earthly ministry or supervision of departed saints. So that the illustration which G. employs is indeed a scriptural illustration, but the doctrine he would advocate has no warranty of God's word.

Scripture does say, however, "The dead have not any more a portion forever in any thing that is done under the sun," Ecclesiastes, chap. ix. 6 vs. Add to this the following quotations from the Book of Homilies. "What be such saints to whom the safeguard of certain cities are appointed, but Dii Præsides with the Gentile idolaters? What be such saints to whom contrary to the use of the primitive Church temples, and churches be builded, and altars erected, but Dii Patroni of the Gentile idolaters?" (3d part of sermon on Peril of Idolatry.) Add I say these strong declarations to the scripture above quoted, and few will feel unprepared to say that both Scripture and the Church do not go much beyond a prohibition of Prayers to departed saints, forbidding and rejecting all practices built upon the supposition that the dead can patronize, and by their patronage profit any church or congregation here on earth.

There are other objectionable points in the article of your correspondent G. but I forbear to comment upon them.

NEOPHYTE.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR—

If you feel sufficiently interested in the dissemination of "Evangelical truth" and the extension of useful knowledge, you may say to the editors of your contemporary, that the author of that horribly hyper-criticised article signed "G." has, subject to your disposal, for the benefit of said editors, probably one of the best series extant of the lives of the apostles, which work not only distinctly defines the term, but also contains the life of the "Holy Apostle S. Mark," as well as a detailed history of another apostle, altho' not one the "twelve" who nevertheless under the name and rank of "S. Paul the Apostle" was the human author of the several epistles contained in the canon of Scripture.

He will likewise loan any of sundry very good architectural works, which clearly define between the styles of Christian and Mahomedan, or as more technically known, Pointed or Gothic, and Arabic or Saracenic architecture; both propositions however subject to one condition, to wit, that the editorial article under the caption of "Who was the Holy Apostle S. Mark?" was not inserted in the Recorder on the 1st of April, with any express bearing upon the privileges ordinarily granted to that day.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—Will you insert in your paper the following acknowledgment.

Mocksville, N. C. Feast of St. Matthias. 1848.

In the name and behalf of the Church of St. Philip the Deacon, I would acknowledge the receipt of the very beautiful present of materials for our Altar cloth, from the Rev. Dr. Crosswell of Trinity Church, New Haven, Connecticut.

May this work of his be found perfect before God, and be remembered to him for good in that great Day, for His sake, the place of whose Presence it is intended to adorn.

O. S. PRESCOT.

Diocesan Intelligence.

Pennsylvania.—At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, held this day, Testimonials were signed in favor of Mr. Samuel Randall, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Deacons.

Application was made by Mr. Joseph J. Elsegood, to be recommended for admission as a candidate for Holy Orders.

Philadelphia, April 4th, 1848.

M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE,
Secretary.

SERVICES BY THE BISHOP.—Tuesday Evening fourth preached in Emmanuel Church, Kensington, and confirmed eleven.

WEDNESDAY, A. M. in St. James' Philadelphia, admitted Samuel Randall and Rees O. Evans, to Deacon's orders, and confirmed eleven.

WEDNESDAY, EVENING, in St. Paul's Philadelphia, preached and confirmed.

New York.—SERVICES BY THE BISHOP OF PENNSYLVANIA.—Fourth Sunday in Lent.

A. M. preached and consecrated the Church of the Holy Comforter (a floating Chapel for Seamen and Boatmen.)

P. M. in St. Luke's Brooklyn preached and confirmed eighteen.

EVENING, in Emmanuel Church, Brooklyn—preached and confirmed twenty-five.

New York.—CHRIST CHURCH, N. Y.—It is a singular fact, says the Christian Advocate, that Christ Church, N. Y., which was organized in 1794, has had but two Rectors, both of whom were originally Methodist preachers, the first being Rev. Jos. Pilmore, one of Mr Wesley's first missionaries to America. Dr. Lyell, who recently died at New York, was the other.

ALBANY.—Trinity Church.—The Rector, Mr. Selkirk, with the Vestry and Wardens of Trinity Church in this city, Monday afternoon, at half-past three o'clock, broke ground for their new edifice in Broad street. Mr. Selkirk, who has taken much interest in the erection of this new edifice, claimed the privilege of first breaking the ground, which was readily conceded to him, and which he commenced with a hearty good will; and was followed by the Vestrymen and Wardens. The ground was surveyed and staked out by Mr. Carpenter, and the trees and fences removed by order of the mason, Mr. Night, for the purpose of excavation and putting up the walls. The site for the new church is a very handsome one.

Western New York.—BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATIONS.—On February 27th, Bishop De Lancey preached twice in Trinity Church, Seneca Falls, and confirmed in the afternoon two persons. Prayers were read by the Rev. Rufus Murray.

On March 8th, Ash Wednesday, Bishop De Lancey preached in Trinity Church, Geneva.

On March 12th, he preached twice in St. Mark's Church, Penn Yan, and confirmed one person.—Prayers were read by the Rev. O. F. Starkey.

On the 19th, he held an Ordination in St. Peter's Church, Auburn, when Messrs. Abram Newkirk Littlejohn, Spencer Marcus Rice, and George Champlin Foote were admitted to the holy order of Deacons.—Morning prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Seymour, of Skaneateles, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Ayrault, of Auburn. The candidates were presented by Rev. Mr. Phelps, of Moravia. The Rev. Dr. Williams, of Schenectady, preached the Sermon, and assisted with the Rev. Mr. Ayrault, at the Communion administered by the Bishop.

In the afternoon, Prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Phelps, assisted in the Lessons by the Rev. Mr. Littlejohn, and the Bishop preached and confirmed twenty-three persons, (including one in private.)

In the evening, the Rev. Dr. Williams read Prayers assisted by the Rev. Mr. Foote, who read the Lesson, and the Rev. Mr. Littlejohn preached.

CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday, March 26th, Bishop De Lancey visited St. Paul's Church, Waterloo, Seneca Co. Preached twice, and confirmed three persons.

DIOCESE OF MICHIGAN.—We are gratified to learn from an esteemed correspondent, that the affairs of this Diocese are progressing "steadily in the good old paths," while every thing seems to indicate a steady and healthy growth of the Church. "We are," continues our friend, "of one mind, and think but little about any of the isms of the day."

The following are the recent Episcopal acts of the Diocesan. Feb. 15th, Bishop McCoskry confirmed thirteen persons in St. Luke's Church, Ypsilanti. On the 16th, seventeen persons, in St. Andrew's Church, Ann Arbor. On the 17th, one in St. James' Church, Dexter. On the 18th, five, in St. Stephen's Church, Hamburg. On the 20th, three, in St. Paul's Church, Jackson—in all, thirty-nine.

On the same day, and in the same place, the Bishop admitted George Willard to the Holy order of Deacons. Prayers were said by the Rev. Daniel E. Brown, of Illinois, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. Mr. Adams. The Candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Grinnell. Sermon by the Bishop.

Acknowledgements.

The undersigned, Missionary at Fort Smith and Van Buren, gratefully acknowledges the receipt of a box of Prayer Books and Tracts for his Mission, containing 100, 12mo. and 14to. Prayer Books, 1 copy of the Offices of the Church, and a variety of Tracts, through the Librarian of "the Female Prayer Book Society in Pennsylvania," from the Ladies of this Society, and those of the Female Tract Society. This box arrived when its contents were most needed, and already a large portion of them are in useful circulation. The recipients of this liberal donation, in both Parishes, reciprocate the benevolent interest of the Ladies of these societies, for the present, in their gratitude, and prayers that the Divine Head of the Church will bless the efforts of these societies, that in all the waste places of Zion, "the Word of God may have free course and be glorified even as it is with them." At some future time, their contributions to these objects will follow their thanks and prayers.

Importation of European Books.

Geo. S. APPLETON, Publisher and Importer, 145 Chestnut st., Philadelphia, and 16 Little Britain, London, respectfully informs literary and professional gentlemen, that he still continues the branch of his house in London, as established in 1830, and he invites the attention of the friends of literature to the important advantages the establishment affords for the importation of books specially ordered. Among the great variety of publications abroad comparatively few are for sale in this country. A great inconvenience is therefore obviated by this arrangement, as any person may leave his order for any particular work, and by the rapid communication of steamers, the work is at hand in a few weeks.
Professors and students of Theology, Law, and Medicine—architects, mechanics, and all who are unable to procure foreign books in our own country, may, for a small commission on the cost, procure any work published in any part of Europe.
G. S. A. has, in addition to the branch in London, an agent in Leipzig, for the supply of all orders for books published throughout Germany—also in Brussels, Paris, Florence and Madrid; so that he is prepared to execute with great fidelity and promptness, all orders entrusted to his care, from any portion of the Continental Book Market.
The London house is under the immediate superintendence of one of the Mr. Appletons, whose long residence in Europe and an acquaintance with the languages of Germany, France, &c., is a guarantee that all orders they may be favored with will be executed with correctness and on the most favorable terms.
He has also just published "The Mystery of Godliness," by Rev. Samuel L. Southard, A. M., Rector of Calvary Church, New York. 1 vol. 8vo. elegantly printed; price 75 cts.

IMPORTATION OF BOOKS TO ORDER.

FROM EUROPE.

The subscriber with reference to this specialite regularly receives the catalogues, both new and antiquarian, of the Booksellers of England, France, Germany and Belgium, and is provided with the Bibliographical manuals of Brunet, Panzer, Kayser, Querard, Lowndes, Hebenstreit and others.
He also issues monthly his "Bulletin Bibliographique" on liste des ouvrages nouveaux publies en France.
From England, new Books at 27 cts. old Books at 32 cts. per shilling.
From France, new Books at 25 cts. old Books at 30 cts. per franc.
From Germany, new Books at 90 cts. old Books at 105 cts. per thaler.
From Belgium, new Books at 20 cts. old Books at 30 cts. per franc.

Flowers of the Church,

THE VIOLET.*

Viola Odorata.

Who always with thee, by the way-side, met,
First called thee Violet:†
—A name, that many now who utter it,
Forget to think how fit!

Men love to picture thee, in coolest shade,
Of the deep forest-glade;
Or, watching, o'er the brink of lakelet clear,
The sunbeams dancing there.

But fondest lesson dost thou teach me, yet,
O way-side Violet,—
Preserving all thy hues, and sweets, and trust,
'Mid the world's travel dust.

Be mine—not only in calm, safe retreat
Away from trampling feet:
But, on life's road, the lowliest, trustful, true
Like thee, to smile there too!

From the Church Review.

Udike's History of the Church in Narragansett.‡

The early history of the Church in New England is yet to be written. The man of patient and impartial mind, qualified and prepared, rightly and fully to investigate the past, and rescue from oblivion the first struggles of Episcopacy on the soil pressed by Pilgrim feet, has not yet appeared. We have been accustomed to elaborate researches and plentiful reminiscences of another character. The whole civil and political history of New England is surcharged with laudations of the virtue and self-denial, the wisdom and fortitude, the purity and piety of the original settlers. Bancroft, in his popular work on Colonial History, moralizes upon the landing of the Pilgrim fathers at Plymouth, and takes occasion to affirm not only that a grateful posterity has marked the rock which first received their footsteps; but, that the consequences of that day are constantly unfolding themselves as time advances. "It was," says he, "the origin of New England it was the planting of New England institutions. Inquisitive historians have loved to mark every vestige of the Pilgrims; poets of the purest minds have commemorated their virtues; the noblest genius has been called into exercise to display their merits worthily, and to trace the consequences of the daring enterprise."

We will not complain that those who differ from us in religious opinion, have enlisted in their service "poets of the purest minds," and men of "the noblest genius." We will not deny to Puritanism the advantage of zealous historians, and transcendental teachers. It may sometimes excite our surprise, to note the contradictions and inconsistencies, and trouble us to "mark the vestiges" of it, in a modern celebration, where the song and the festival are shared alike by the priest and the pilgrim,—the lover and hater of Rome,—the enslaver of human opinion, and the votary of freedom and Catholic Christianity. But setting aside these strange developments, what has been done to perpetuate the memory of the original settlers in New England,—we would fain see accomplished in behalf of the Church of our affections. Not exactly in the same shape, not in school-books, and tales, and poems, and orations, and over-wrought eulogies,—would we teach our history. But we would see it written with care, and studied by the members of our communion with eagerness and fidelity. Truth must ever carry with it, its own claims to acceptance and respect. The distortion of its lessons, the concealment of what is unpleasant, the suppression of any transactions and occurrences which have materially affected the public weal, will find no favor, save among those who have unconsciously sold themselves to the service of a particular sect or party. The story of religious persecution, has, indeed, many chapters. We would read them all. We would know how that the Aborigines and the Trojans were at the same time fought in war,—how that the Pilgrims after their settlement in this country, soon forgot the professed principles of their system, and resisted, with ill-tempered zeal, the establishment of the Church of England, and the introduction of her devoted missionaries. For this reason it is, that we welcome all contributions to our ecclesiastical history, from the simple parochial record, to the larger Diocesan narrative. They are scattered leaves blown from the Sybil's book, which the future historian of the Church must gather, and arrange, and compress for the instruction of succeeding generations.

The volume placed at the head of this article, owes its origin to a vote of the Convention of the Diocese of Rhode Island. In 1840, on motion of the Rev. Francis Vinton, then Rector of Trinity Church, Newport, a committee was appointed to "draught a History of the Church" in that Diocese, of which the mover was Chairman, and Mr. Udike and the late Prof. Goddard, of Brown University, his associates. In the distribution of the labour, the Church in Narragansett was assigned to Mr. Udike, and "while each member of the Committee," says Mr. Vinton in a Preface to this volume, "gladly set himself to rescue from oblivion the local traditions which were registered, either in the memory of the aged, or in the records of neighbouring parishes; they were both surprised and gratified to learn, that so rich materials were awaiting the author's research, and that he would give to the portion of the work such elaborate and persevering industry." Prof. Goddard, who rendered valuable assistance in his preparation of the volume, died before it had passed through the press. "Had he been spared to this day, none more than he would have rejoiced in its completion, and none would have contributed more liberally, from an ample fortune, to extend its circulation."

The plan of Mr. Udike's book has the merit of originality. After giving, a suitable Introduction, some account of the long controversies and fruitless negotiations relative to the possession and jurisdiction of Narragansett, its erection into an independent Province by the King, and its final reunion with Rhode Island, he proceeds to the principal part of his work; which might be termed—"Extracts from the parochial register of St. Paul's Church, Narragansett, with sketches of political, personal and family history." It is true, other Episcopal Churches in the State are noticed, and their beginning and progress traced with brief, yet becoming fidelity. But the great theme is Narragansett,—its religious character,—its aristocratic families,—its fascinating society,—its gay amusements,—its frequent festivities,—its courteous urbanity; and the centre of attraction in all these,—the man whose life and labours are most brilliant, and who seems to have left the impress of his remarkable mind upon every rood of that ancient region, is the celebrated and learned Dr. Macsparran. From the commencement of his missionary life in 1721, to its termination thirty-seven years after, he was like the Apostle of the Gentiles, "in labours abundant and journeying oft." He travelled beyond the limits of the province where his lot was cast, with a simple devotion to clerical duty and the interests of the Church,—and according to his own account, was the "first Episcopal minister that ever preached at Providence," and the chief agent in laying the foundation of the Church at New London, Connecticut. We find him immediately after his arrival upon his station, in correspondence with Gabriel Bernon, a protestant merchant of an ancient and honorable family of Rochelle, who prudently fled his native city just before the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and took refuge first in England, and afterwards in America. While a descendant of the Huguenots lives in this western world, or a Churchman worships the God of his fathers in the old Providence plantation, the name of Bernon should not be forgotten. It was no scheme formed in the wild spirit of adventure that brought him hither, but it was the "pure purpose of enjoying the privilege of worshipping his God, agreeably to the dictates of his conscience." Though subjected to manifold trials in his new settlement, and unjustly deprived of a large plantation at Oxford, Massachusetts, in the purchase of which he had expended much of the wealth that he brought with him from France, and which he had assured himself would prove a solid investment; he did not intermit his zeal for the cause of religion, nor evince the less solicitude to establish the Episcopal Church in every town where he chanced to reside. He was a vestryman of St. Paul's, Narragansett, before Dr. McSparran was appointed to the charge of that Church, and he seems to have been the prime mover in organizing the first parish in Providence, and procuring the occasional services of the neighbouring missionaries.

Mr. Udike's plan allows him a wide range in the choice of matter, and forbids the idea of any unity or consecutive arrangement in his work. The topic changes with the record of the Missionary, so that we are one moment reading of Puritan intolerance and the imprisonment of Churchmen for refusing to be taxed to support Presbyterian teachers, and the next, smiling at a "natural bone-setter," whirled in a coach, against his will, to the door of a splendid mansion in Broadway, where, to escape the surveillance of learned surgeons, he slyly adjusts a complicated dislocation, and thus surprises at once both the trembling patient and the doting parent. From a succinct history of slavery in the colony, and a sketch of the liberal legislation of Rhode Island, we pass to the state of society consequent upon wealth and leisure, and behold it, as with the vividness of reality, in the rich and graphic description which our author has given of the "amusements, pastimes, festivities, and galas of ancient Narragansett." The mention in the parish record of Mr. John Checkley, Jr., furnishes the occasion for producing interesting reminiscences of his father, a name of high repute in the early annals of the American Church. Although born in Boston, under the droppings of Harvard College, he was sent by his parents to England to complete his classical education at the University of Oxford, and from thence he started upon a tour of observation on the continent. He was an earnest and unflinching adherent to the Church, and after his return to his native country, he published tracts and pamphlets which exposed him to the legalized persecution of the Puritans.* He was contemporary with Dr. Cutler, the converted Rector of Yale College; and he appears to have led a life of literary leisure till, at the advanced age of forty-seven, he determined to devote the residue of his days to the service of the Church in functions of the most sacred character. That he might be clothed with authority, he visited London, but the apprehension and vengeance of his enemies followed him thither and so excited the prejudices of Bishop Gibson, that he declined to ordain him, and he was constrained to return without accomplishing his object. The following extract—not in the usual style of Mr. Udike—because contributed, we presume, by a friend—tells the sequel of his life.

"Nevertheless, the anxious desire to serve God in the Gospel of His Son, slept not in the breast of this unfortunate Churchman. . . . In the year 1739, the Bishop of Exeter, Stephen Weston, a friend of Bishop Sherlock, was found willing to hear this impracticable man, begging at the age of fifty nine, to be allowed to minister in one of the hardest spheres on earth to which a Churchman was ever doomed, and for enough so far as the income of the post was concerned, to keep body and soul possibly in each other's neighbourhood. Bishop Weston actually ordained him, perhaps the oldest candidate in the history of the Christian Church, who was ever admitted to the honors of an office, which was all but enough to kill any ordinary subject of his years in twelve round months. And it is pleasant to reflect, that he probably ordained him with the consent of Bishop Gibson; for he was then alive, and, in fact, did not die till nearly ten years afterwards."

"Well, armed with his sacred credentials, John Checkley at last stood upon his natal soil, prepared to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. He was sent to Providence, in Rhode Island, no doubt to remove him somewhat from the atmosphere of Boston, which would certainly have mustered for his devoted head some good stout thunderclaps. And there he ministered, officiating at intervals at Warwick and Attleborough for fourteen years; till in 1753, in the seventy-third year of his ardent life, God gave him respite and called him home."

"It was much to be desired that we had some authentic memorials of a ministry, began at almost the utmost verge of man's longest ordinary life. It ought to have been a curious and exciting thing to hear one who had been a scholar from his youth a traveller, a wit, and a philosopher, who had been contending half his life, perhaps, to be permitted to be a priest in any parish, however humble, and amid perils almost as thick and dangerous as an apostle's, and who at length clambered up to a Deacon's 'good degree,' with the marks of sixty winters on his head. But almost a century has piled its dust upon a Checkley's grave, and this short record is all, perhaps, which will ever so much as strive to do honor to his name. Peace to thine ashes, untiring servant of Christ and of the Church! The faith which sustained thee teaches us, that ample amends will soon be made for all earth's forgetfulness. One day is with the Lord as a thousand years; and thou shalt be recompensed immortally at the resurrection of the just." (pp. 210, 211.)

Mr. Udike has introduced into the body of his work, copious extracts from two of Dr. McSparran's Sermons, preached on extraordinary occasions. Another discourse of his, entitled, "The Sacred dignity of the Christian Priesthood Vindicated," was published in 1751, and produced a great excitement among the opposers of Episcopacy, and called forth several pamphlets and rejoinders. It was about this time that public feeling was aroused by fears of the spiritual jurisdiction of English Bishops. "The controversy as to the American Episcopate was fresh, and the eloquent and denunciatory pamphlets of Chauncey and Mayhew were part of New England household literature." But the chief object of the Sermon as described by Dr. McSparran himself in his "America Dissected," was to correct certain irregularities which had crept into the worship of his own communion, and "which, when they are coeval with the Church are hard to be reformed." In the autumn of 1754, he and his wife "embarked for England, to visit his friends and native country, and to improve his health, which had become impaired by the severity of the climate and the arduous duties of his missions." Tradition says that he had another object in view, even to be consecrated Bishop, but the strong opposition at home to the reception of an English prelate, together with the sudden and afflictive death of his pious consort led him to return from his sorrowful voyage with a conclusion as sage as it is comforting, "that he had rather dwell in the hearts of his parishioners, than wear all the Bishop's gowns in the world." Before his embarkation for England, his "America Dissected," with a long and quaint title prefixed, had been published in Dublin, "as a caution to unsteady people who might be tempted to leave their native country." It is a literary curiosity.—a keen and caustic description of the principles and manners of the age in which he lived. But we place less reliance upon its statistical and geographical information, because the author wrote from memory. In a paragraph towards the close of the longest letter, he says—"Thus have I, in a very cursory and incorrect manner run over the English plantations, without observing, however, the thousandth part of what deserves notice. I write from memory, though in the style of truth; and flatter myself, from the candor so peculiar to the Cary's, that you will overlook the faults of this indigested letter."

* Our readers may be curious to know what the publications of Mr. Checkley were, which the Puritan authorities judged to be a "false and scandalous libel" against the ministers of the Gospel by law established in the provinces. It was none other than the world-famous work, "Leslie's Short and Easy Method with Deists," together with his "Discourse concerning Episcopacy." Mr. C. was fined £50, and bound over to keep the peace for six months.

‡ History of the Episcopal Church in Narragansett, Rhode Island, including a History of other Episcopal Churches in the State; with an Appendix, containing a reprint of a work now extremely rare, entitled, "America Dissected," by the Rev. J. Macsparran, D. D., with notes containing Genealogical and Biographical accounts of distinguished men, families, etc. By Wilkins Udike. 8vo. pp. 533. New York, Henry M. Onderdonk, 1847.

Dr. McSparran's constitution now began to exhibit symptoms of rapid decay, but he continued to minister to his people till the winter of 1757, when he was suddenly called to render an account of his stewardship. "As he was never," to quote his own words, "a father in any form, he devised his landed estate for the use and support of a resident English Bishop, provided his jurisdiction should include the Narragansett county and provided, further, "he came within seven years after the death of his wife." Of course the conditions were not fulfilled, and the property passed to other heirs. He was buried under the communion table of his Church with appropriate marks of lamentation and respect, and the historian dismisses him with the following just reflections.

"Thus ended the pilgrimage of the most able Divine that was sent over to this country by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. With manly firmness, and with undaunted courage of the Christian soldier, ready to combat and die in the hallowed cause, he triumphed over all the difficulties of this laborious and untried mission.

—Conscience made him firm,
That boon companion, who, her strong breast-plate
Buckled on him, that knows no guilt within,
And bids him on, and fear not."

"Clad in gospel armor, and inspired by a supreme love to God, he succeeded in planting the Church of the Redeemer here, and gathered numerous devoted followers around the altar. A visit to this Church, spared to stand unaltered by modern hands, is fitted to revive in the hearts of all who assemble to worship within its venerable walls, the most interesting recollections and associations. There is the Pulpit, and there the Desk, from which, more than a century ago, this pious Presbyter, and Johnson, Honyman, Seabury, and Bass, declared the sacred oracles of God; and there, too, the altar from which they distributed to their humble communicants the consecrated elements of salvation." (pp. 260-61.)

The Church in Narragansett, sought the appointment of Mr. Jeremiah Leaming, then a catechist at Newport, to succeed Dr. McSparran; but the Society for Propagating the Gospel sent the Rev. Mr. Fayerweather, a New England man, and earlier in life, a Congregational divine, but at that time an Episcopal missionary in Wineyau, South Carolina. He was no less faithful than his predecessor, in recording his clerical acts and noticing occurrences which concerned the welfare of the Church. Mr. Updike, too, continues his faithful family sketches and his miscellaneous researches. The record of a baptism, in which the old Saxon word Gossip is used instead of sponsors, brings out a curious and interesting literary paper prepared by an officer in the U. S. Navy.

"Gossip. This word is frequently found in the Church records. It is used in its old Saxon meaning for sponsors and sureties at baptism. This use of the term gossip, as well as the usage which formerly prevailed at baptisms of giving spoons, is referred to in the following extract from Hone's 'Every Day Book,' vol. i. p. 175:

"This is an opportunity for alluding to the ancient English custom, with sponsors, or visitors at christenings, of presenting spoons, because the figures of the twelve Apostles were chased or carved upon the tops of the handles. Brand cites several authors to testify of the practice. Persons who could afford it, gave the set of twelve, others a smaller number, and a poor person offered the gift of one, with the figure of the saint after whom the child was named, or to whom the child was dedicated, or who was the patron saint of the good natured donor."

"Ben Jonson, in his Bartholomew's Fair, has a character, saying,—and all this for the hope of a couple of Apostle's spoons and a cup to eat caudle in." In the chaste Maid of Cheapside, by Middleton, "Gossip" inquires—"What has he given her? What is it Gossip?" Wherefore the answer of another "Gossip," is—"A faire high standing cup and two great 'postles spoons, one of them gilt." Beaumont and Fletcher, likewise, in the Noble Gentleman, say—

"I'll be a gossip, Bewford.
I have an odd apostle spoon."

"It seems from a Poem by Shipman in 1666, that the usage of giving Apostle spoons at christenings, was at that time on the decline.

"Formerly when they used to trowl Gilt bowls of sack, they gave the bowl
Two spoons at least; an use ill kept,
'Tis well if now our own be left."

"An anecdote is related of Shakspeare and Ben Jonson, which bears upon the usage. Shakspeare was godfather to one of Jonson's children, and after the christening, being in deep study, Jonson cheerfully asked him why he was so melancholy. 'Ben,' said he, 'I have been considering a great while what should be the fittest gift for me to bestow upon my god-child, and I have resolved it at last.' 'I pray thee, what?' said Ben. 'I faith, Ben,' answered Shakspeare, 'I'll give him a dozen good latten spoons, and thou shalt translate them.'

"The word 'latten,' intended as a play upon the word latin, is a name for the iron tinned, of which spoons and similar small articles of household use are sometimes made. Without being aware of the origin, it is still a custom with many persons to present spoons at christenings, though they are not now adorned with imagery." (pp. 347-49.)

The times grew more eventful as the period of the Revolution approached. Mr. Fayerweather and his flock were not exactly of the same mind as to the controversy between the colonies and the mother country. Or at least he could not, consistently with his oath of ordination, omit the prayer for the King and Royal Family, and, therefore, he was compelled to desist from public services, and the Church was closed. He still retained the affections of his people, and occasionally officiated in private dwellings. He died in the summer of 1781, and was buried by the side of his venerated predecessor. The establishment of the independence of the colonies stopped all benefactions from abroad, and hence Mr. F. was the last missionary to the Narragansett Church.

There is another name frequently introduced into Mr. Updike's work, and so interwoven with the ecclesiastical history of Rhode Island, and the life of Dr. McSparran, that it deserves a passing notice at our hands. The Rev. James Honyman was sent over to Newport in 1704, by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and for nearly half a century, he dispensed the bread of life, not only to the flock of his charge, but as opportunity offered, to the scattered sheep in the wilderness. He was an "excellent scholar, a sound divine, and an accomplished gentleman." To entire faithfulness and diligence, he joined conciliating manners, and a large Christian charity. He clearly saw the great disadvantages under which the Church was laboring in the colonies for want of a superintending head; and so early as 1709, he expressed his earnest conviction to the Society, that if a Bishop was sent hither, "these infant settlements would become beautiful nurseries, which now seem to languish for want of a father to oversee and bless them." His own vineyard, however, was well cultivated and yielded plentiful fruits, for in 1732, when applying for a small increase of his stipend to enable him to provide for his family, he thus writes.

"I take the pleasure of telling you this known truth, that betwixt New York and Boston, the distance of three hundred miles, and wherein are many missions, there is not a congregation in the way of the Church of England, that can pretend to compare with mine, or equal it in any respect; nor does my Church consist of members that were of it when I came here, for I have buried them all; nor is there any one person now alive that did then belong to our Church, so that our present appearance is entirely owing to God's blessing upon my endeavors." (p. 455.)

It was in his time that Dean Berkley visited Newport, and attracted the attention of the inhabitants by his "complaisant manner" and his "eloquent and forcible" preaching. But let Mr. Updike tell the story in his own words.

"The connection of Dean Berkley with Trinity Church, calls for a passing notice of his sojourn in Newport, where he arrived by a circumstance purely accidental. He with other gentlemen, his associates, were bound to the Island of Bermuda, with the intention of establishing there a college for the education of the Indian youth of this country, a plan, however, which wholly failed. The captain of the ship in which he sailed could not find the Island of Bermuda, and having given up the search after it, steered northward until they discovered land unknown to them, and which they supposed to be inhabited by savages. On making a signal however, two men came on board from Rock Island, in the character of pilots, who, on inquiry, informed them, the harbour and town of Newport were near. That in the town there was an Episcopal Church, the minister of which was Mr. James Honyman; on which they proceeded for Newport, but an adverse wind caused them to run into the west passage, where the ship came to anchor. The Dean wrote a letter to Mr. Honyman, which the pilots took on shore at Conanicut Island, and called on a Mr. Gardner and a Mr. Martin, two members of Mr. Honyman's Church, informing them that a great dignitary of the Church of England, called Dean, was on board the ship, together with other gentlemen passengers. They handed them the letter from the Dean, which Gardner and Martin brought to Newport in a small boat, with all possible despatch. On their arrival, they found Mr. Honyman was at Church, it being a holy-day on which divine service was held there. They then sent the letter by a servant, who delivered it to Mr. Honyman in his pulpit. He opened it, and read it to the congregation, from the contents of which it appeared the Dean might be expected to land in Newport every moment. The Church was dismissed with the blessing, and Mr. Honyman with the wardens, vestry, Church, and congregation, male and female, repaired immediately to the ferry wharf, where they arrived a little before the Dean, his family and friends." (p. 395.)

Other traditions slightly vary from this, but none in the judgment of the historian are so well connected or credible. The Dean purchased a farm of about one hundred acres in Newport, adjoining Mr. Honyman's, and built him a house for his residence, which he called White Hall, and which yet stands and bears the original name.

"This White Hall estate he gave to Yale College in Connecticut, which still owns the fee. He built his house in a valley, not far from a hill commanding an extensive view of the ocean and country. He preferred the valley to the hill, as he said, for the following reasons—that to enjoy the prospect from the hill, he must visit it only occasionally; that if his constant residence should be on the hill, the view would be so common as to lose all its charms." During his residence at White Hall he wrote his 'Minute Philosopher,' and his celebrated poem so oracular as to the future destinies of America. These were written at a place about half a mile southwardly from his house. There he had his chair and writing apparatus placed in a natural alcove, which he found in the most elevated parts of the Hanging Rocks, (so called,) roofed and only opened to the south, commanding at once a view of Sachuest Beach, the ocean and the circumjacent islands. This hermitage was to him a favorite and solitary retreat. He continued here about two years, perhaps a little longer.

"His preaching was eloquent and forcible and attracted large congregations to Trinity Church. When he was called to a sphere of greater usefulness in his native country, he was not forgetful of a residence which was endeared to him by many pleasing recollections; and which moreover, possessed for him a melancholy interest from the circumstance of containing the ashes of his infant daughters, that had died during his sojourn in Newport." (p. 396.)

In taking leave of Mr. Updike's volume, we cannot but repeat the expression of our gratification that it has been written. With all its want of order, with its variety of narrative and reminiscences, it is a valuable book, and will be used by the future annalist, when he comes to write the more ample history of the Church in New England. It is a noble memorial of the author's industry and devotion to antiquarian researches, as well as a mark of attachment to his Church and country, and to the ancient land of Narragansett. Sometimes he is a little too zealous in citing his advocates of Episcopacy. By way of illustrating her republican tendencies, he mentions as belonging to the Church a long list of prominent patriots of the revolution, and among the number we find the names of Franklin and Jefferson. These distinguished statesmen might have been cold intellectual admirers of the worship of the Church, but we have never seen the evidence that they appreciated her doctrines or possessed any decidedly Christian character. We do not care to see them quoted as supporters of Episcopacy.

Non tali auxilio—nec defensoribus istis Tempus eget."—Virg.

Men whose lives were better than Thomas Jefferson's, and whose intellects were quite as lofty and cultivated, have honored and served the Church by their practice and their pens. We can afford, therefore, to relinquish all claim to his influence in our behalf, and to give him, with his conceits and speculations and materialism, to the undoubted abettors of infidelity. The Washingtons, the Marshalls, the Rutledges, the Henrys, the Lees, the Johnstons, the Jays, and other leading architects in the work of American Independence, we are proud to own as Churchmen in the true sense of the word, and it is not the least honor to their illustrious names, that in watching the increase of Rome upon the ruins of Alba, they watched also the movement of that spotless banner inscribed with the "mystery" of "Christ and His Church."

The Mystery of Godliness.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL L. SOUTHWARD.

My brethren, let not the gospel, as a record of the works of the Redeemer, be misunderstood. So far am I from undertaking to deny the charge, or to explain all mysteries, that, as a minister of Christ, I boldly claim that the facts of the Bible are most wonderful, and the doctrines of the Christian's faith are plainly written for our learning, but, in themselves, mysterious. The Bible comes not as a book asserting nothing which is above our knowledge, or beyond our comprehension; for it would be unworthy of the Deity, and fail to exercise and put in proof, that faith, which is, on our part, the only agent of our reformation, and the mighty instrument of our salvation. The plan of the atonement does not come to us as one which human wit might have discovered, for then our own salvation would have been within our reach, and there had been no need of the counsels of the Godhead, or the amazing condescension of the Saviour, or the unearthly pangs of the Redeemer, or the "mystery" of the atonement. But requiring, as it did, the wisdom, the purity, the power, and benevolence of God, to devise and carry out the plan of our redemption, it is most evident, that a scheme which required for its origin a wisdom so much greater than our own, could not, in all its parts be level to our comprehension; else were the wisdom and the love of God no greater than our own, which yet were insufficient to devise the way in which he could be just and justify the sinner! I hold that by the soundest principles of human logic, as well as in accordance with the sentiments of inspiration, there either must have been a "mystery" in the atonement, or there had been no atonement! And if that holy volume be a fable, it is the noblest work of man, and answers perfectly, in every part, to the best requirements of an enlightened reason; and in the midst of the productions of the universal race of man, it stands alone, in glory—and I will take it, as the best of books, to guide me through the paths of life, to comfort me in death, and fill my mind in the last hours of existence, and before I sink into forgetfulness forever, and the light of intellect goes out in everlasting night, with its imaginary paradise, and its fictitious scenes of future and eternal peace, and rest, and joy.

Then, "without controversy," the "mystery of godliness" is great. We do not pretend that it is not; we even assert that it is. And we come to you, "as ambassadors for Christ," not with the boasted conclusions of our own understanding, not with the noblest achievements of human intellect, not with the gatherings of our experience, but with a revelation from above, in language plain enough for you to read what has been written, and asserting what you cannot understand, but are not able to deny. We come to you, bearing in our unworthy hands the oracles of God, and demanding, as no favour unto us, but on your peril, and as justice unto God, that you believe its truths, in order that you may obey. The facts are mysterious. This volume is a temple, designed by the "Father of lights," and erected by Him who fashioned the earth, and the sun, and the moon, and the stars! Its maker and builder is God; and we claim for it only the perfection and glory which belong to the rest of his works. It is the message of the "mysterious," the inscrutable God; and we cannot accept as your answer, when we call upon you to be saved by the blood of the Saviour, the declaration, which is not disputed, of the mystery of the act of atonement. Away, then, with the mockery of the unbeliever, and the scorn of the scorner; it recoils upon him! It is as rational to require that God should bound his own nature by the nature of man, as to make the plan of atonement like the devices of men. It is as rational to object to the truths of Christianity, because they are wonderful, when they claim to be so, as to object to benevolence because it is kind, when it claims to be charity itself! Ah! the scorner may delight for a while in his scorning—for it is his hour and the power of darkness—but the time is at hand, when the Almighty shall laugh at his calamity, and mock when his fear cometh," and the righteous shall have dominion over him in the morning!" Take heed, then, with what spirit you open the Scriptures, or listen to the ambassadors of Christ and "stewards of His mysteries," when they publish his marvellous word. With no pride of intellect, come, but in humble unquestioning faith; with the spirit which subjects to the test of man's knowledge the revelation from heaven, but that which, assured, from external evidence, of the origin of the Bible, takes all of its statements as true; which believes, though the oracle be sealed; which obeys, no matter what the command; which at least will attempt the injunction, though it were the conflict with devils, or the removing of mountains, or the wresting the stars from the sky! But there is nothing recorded which was not enacted, there is nothing commanded which cannot be done. But you cannot expect to commend it to the minds of ungodly men; and you cannot expect that its wisdom will be always approved by your own. And beware how you profanely compare it with the knowledge of men, how you dare to reject it when its wisdom shall vary from the wisdom of men. Behold, I show you "mystery," a wonderful thing, when I tell you of the incarnation of Jesus, and the redemption by his blood; and yet on your faith in the doctrine, your salvation depends! Behold, I show you a "mystery," for the dead shall be raised incorruptible never to die! And yet, if ye will hope to escape from damnation, and attain to the first resurrection, you must believe in the "mystery of godliness," that Jesus Christ was raised from the dead! "O, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" We but share with the angels their ignorance of his ways, till the time when the light of eternity shall reveal as much as even spirits may know of the mysteries of redeeming love, which are "the deep things of God!"

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—

A year since, an account of an ordination at Nashotah was presented to the readers of the Banner, in which article, the spiritual condition of this Diocese was alluded to. Within that time three of the number then admitted to the Diaconate have been admitted to the order of Priesthood. These were the Rev. Messrs. F. R. Haff, D. Keene, and J. P. T. Ingraham.—On the second Sunday in Lent, Bishop Kemper admitted a fourth member of the same class, the Rev. John Johnstone, M. D. to the Holy Order of the Priesthood. The ordination took place in the chapel of the Nashotah Mission. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. J. L. Breck, the Lessons read by the Rev. W. Adams, both of whom presented the candidate, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. F. W. Hatch of Southport. The subject, that of "the office and abilities of the Priesthood" was listened with ardent attention by a numerous congregation, who afterwards participated in the HOLY COMMUNION administered by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Adams Hatch, and Johnstone.

The Diocese of Wisconsin is one of peculiar interest. Although in its infancy it now numbers twenty-three clergy, all occupying posts of importance to the Church. In Milwaukee there are now three parishes, where rather more than a year since but one existed. Each parish has its church edifice, and such has been the rapid increase of their congregations, that it is in contemplation to organize a fourth parish. The Church services are held at many points, until lately, but seldom visited, except by the travelling preachers of various sects, who have failed to supply that feeling of Religion which the Church has succeeded in placing before their minds. In sections of the country where the Gospel light was but dimly to be discerned in the darkness of superstition and wilful violations of the laws of God, the order and beauty of the Church services have had the effect upon those attending them, to induce in many cases a change in the lives and we trust in the hearts of individuals. In almost every village may be found some members of our HOLY CHURCH, who form in themselves a congregation, and could there be a minister at each such point, the Church would strengthen her borders, the sheep would be preserved in the fold, and the "wilderness" would soon "blossom as the rose."

To Nashotah the Church must look for men to engage in this important field, a field, in which a contest, is to take place between three opponents, viz., the Church of God, the pillar and ground of the truth, as opposed to all superstition and error, the Church of Rome, with its mass of corruptions and errors, its deep and Jesuitical designs, and lastly a spirit of infidelity.—Wisconsin looks to the Institution of the Church at Nashotah for labourers, for those men who will valiantly engage in this contest. I might mention the interesting condition of the Oneidas numbering 200 communicants at Duck Creek, of the vast numbers of Germans, Norwegians, and emigrants from England and Ireland which have crowded into this territory within the past year, and demanding the services of the Church, but am compelled to refrain from so doing by the length of this communication. I would refer you and your readers to the Journal of the Primary Convention of this Diocese for many very interesting accounts relative to the spiritual growth of this Diocese, its soundness in Church doctrine, its adherence to primitive truth and ecclesiastical order; and the interesting position which the Nashotah Mission occupies in the Church at the present time.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:

It is my wish to send you for publication in the Banner, some account of the Missionary operations in Schuykill county in so far as those operations are connected with the village of St. Clair. It was on the 17th day of April, 1847, that the missionary acting by appointment of the advancement Society, and with the sanction of the Bishop held in this village his first service. The effort to establish the Church amongst the mining population of our coal region was acknowledged to be nothing more than an experiment, holding out perhaps a rather encouraging prospect of success. St. Clair seemed to be in many respects a favourable field. The inhabitants are almost without exception engaged in mining, and a larger proportion of them than in most other places are English. The village itself is a new one having risen from out the forest, in the last few years and its population numbering now some 12 or 15 hundred, was rapidly accumulating. To supply the spiritual wants of the hard working people, were three or at most four places of public worship, having a capacity to accommodate 500 persons.—These places of worship were divided amongst the Welsh Presbyterians, and the different sections of the Methodist Society, calling themselves Primitives, Ranters, &c. It was reasonable to suppose that in a large English population some at least would be found attached to the Church of their native land, and some perhaps who although attendants on other services, were so from necessity, rather than from preference. It was under these circumstances that our first service was held on April 17th of last year. The attendance was small, but of course could not be discouragingly so. As time wore on, others came to join us, until finally our little room, (holding about 100) being pretty regularly filled, we came to the conclusion early in the present year to organize a Parish. Accordingly previous notice having been given publicly on Saturday Feb. 5th, a meeting was convened and a church organized with its proper officers. Since that time a charter has been obtained from the Supreme Court, through the kind offices of Edward Shippen, Esq., of Philadelphia, and the Church is now fairly in existence, under the name and title of the "Church of the Apostles."

The vestry consists of ten members, the charter is that recommended by the convention of the Diocese, and the by-laws are substantially those of the church of the Ascension, Philadelphia. It is our intention to erect a church edifice this summer, if possible. One in the English rural style with low stone walls and high pitched roof, the cost not to exceed $2500. A large and well situated piece of ground has been presented to the Church by Mr. Jos. G. Lawton one of the wardens, and whilst it is believed that the greater part of the money needed for the erection of the Church will be furnished by those immediately interested; it is confidently hoped that this effort in behalf of the hitherto neglected miners will call forth the generous and christian sympathy of their fellow churchmen in Philadelphia.

The claim which our mining population has upon the consideration of Pennsylvania churchmen is peculiarly touching. They are the children of our mother Church, and forced away by circumstances from the home of their early religious associations and privileges, have come among us their brethren in a strange land without finding that which might supply its place. Is it strange that they should often wander from the fold in search of pasture?

They are the hardy laborers in the Keystone mines of wealth, the bone and sinew of her industry, the toiling ministers to her fireside comforts. Is it a great thing then that they ask a pitance from the abundance which their labors have supplied, to build them a spiritual house in the great wilderness?

There are some things which are present wants, the supply of which by kind friends would be most acceptable. A communion service, a surplice, &c., these are mentioned because their purchase requires money, and we have need to husband all our means for the building of the church.

The donation lately of a set of valuable books, twenty-five in number, from the Parish Library Association of Philadelphia, is thus acknowledged by a resolution of the Vestry.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this church are due, and are hereby tendered to the ladies of the Bishop White Parish Library Association, for their very generous and acceptable donation of a library for the use of the Parish, and the Vestry cannot let this occasion pass by, without the expression of their confidence in the great claims which this Parish has upon the regard and support of their fellow churchmen throughout the Diocese.

"Resolved, That a copy of the above resolution be sent to the Banner of the Cross for publication."

On Gesticulation in the Pulpit.

MR. EDITOR:

I may misapprehend the meaning of the writer, whose article on the subject of "Gesticulation in the Pulpit," appeared in the last number of the Banner; when I suppose that he means to condemn all gesture in the delivery of a sermon. But his decision "that gesticulation is not entitled to secure any consideration at our hands, because not capable of strengthening argument," &c. &c., leads me to conclude that I am not in error when I so understand him. If this be his view, I must express my very decided dissent: and while cordially condemning all extravagance and affectation in the pulpit, plead for that natural manifestation of feeling by gesture in the delivery of a discourse, which is dignified and appropriate, to the sentiment uttered.—And why?

First, because it is natural. No man who speaks earnestly, unless he speaks artificially, or is a very remarkable exception to his race, speaks without some gesticulation. In solemn discourse his gestures are deliberate and dignified, in impassioned appeals they are more rapid and vehement. But still in all cases of earnest address nature prompts appropriate gesture.

Secondly, Gesticulation is sanctioned by scriptural examples. When Solomon dedicated his glorious temple to God, and was engaged in the most solemn act of prayer, he kneeled "with his hands spread up to heaven," Kings 8, 51 and he also stood with his hands spread forth in like manner, 8, 22. When St. Paul and his fellow apostle plead with those who in their blind admiration would have offered sacrifice, they rent their clothes and ran in among them. They seem not to have reckoned the force of truth so great that the bare enunciation of the folly of idolatry would suffice, but they expressed their indignation by very decided gestures. When St. Paul began his speech before Agrippa "he stretched forth the hand" and answered for himself, and few can read his noble address to the king in which he refers to the "bonds" by which he was then held captive, and describes the awful circumstances of his interrupted journey to Damascus without concluding that he employed many other appropriate gesticulations.

As the example of our Blessed Saviour is appealed to by the writer of the article under consideration, and his discourses considered incompatible with gesticulation, I would call attention to the fact that the use of gesture in one instance at least, is distinctly noticed. Thus in speaking to the assembled throng in the house where he was, it is said, that he "stretched forth his hand towards his disciples and said, behold my mother and my brethren!" When, moreover, he took a young child and set him in the midst of his disputing disciples and said, "verily I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven," repeatedly referring to the same child in the course of his ensuing address, his language seems to demand that we imagine him using appropriate gestures.

And so on the occasion of that memorable rebuke addressed to the Scribes and Pharisees, when their hypocrisy was denounced, and the damnation of hell threatened as a recompense of their iniquity, it appears most unnatural and improbable to suppose an announcement of these fearful things unaccompanied by any bodily action. When too, the different conduct of the Pharisee and Publican is alluded to by the Master, the bowed head and smitten breast of the latter, as well as his humble confession of unworthiness, are noticed with apparent approbation, and thus gesture recognised as appropriate to our expressing strong emotion even in prayers; and if appropriate when speaking to God who needs no such stimulant to sympathy and attention, how much more when men of like passions with ourselves are appealed to by the speaker.

Thirdly, I plead for dignified and appropriate gesture because it does "strengthen argument," &c. The influence of a speaker depends not simply on the truths he utters, but on a conviction of his sincerity and sympathy in uttering them. The same truth spoken coldly and heartlessly will produce anger, which if spoken feelingly and kindly, will cause contrition and sorrow. Gesture is one way of manifesting sympathy and sincerity, just as expression of countenance and tone of voice are other modes of signifying the same, and therefore gesture when appropriate, is calculated to enforce our arguments, and strengthen our appeals.

With nature therefore, and the various scriptural examples quoted, and the testimony of experience on my side, I feel prepared to affirm that "gesticulation is entitled to receive some consideration at our hands," and rightly considered, will help the minister and christian in teaching, warning, exhorting and persuading his hearers.

The chanting in Latin at Burlington College.

MR. EDITOR:—

So just, so dignified, so attic, so seasonable, and so richly deserved are the strictures of your correspondent, "A Layman," touching certain remarks made by the editor of the Christian Witness and correspondent of the Calendar on the chanting in Latin at Burlington College, that I am much inclined to speak out my approbation and offer to him my profound respects. Most sincerely I thank him for the article. It is indeed "a round dozen" well laid on; nor ether, nor chloroform, nor scarcely a good conscience can save our brethren too quick and inconsiderate with their quills, from keen smarting.

I am sorry to see, that the Protestant Churchman has endorsed the captious editorial of the Massachusetts paper by copying it. That however, might have been expected, and some other things.

The eminent person reflected on so ignorantly, usually knows what he is about—and I will take leave to add, that when that remarkable day comes which shall find him idle and no good work for Christ and the Church, in head, or heart, or hand, he may "be left" to reply to some of his rebukers.

To the Latin chanting in the Classical Seminary at Burlington there could plainly be but two objections of much weight, neither of which occurred to our critics. 1. Unless it were a customary and familiar thing, there was danger of its being regarded simply as a musico-literary exercise without the proper devotional feeling. But I would leave this to the judgment of Bp. D. and not distrustfully or captiously call him to account afterwards. And, 2. That it would be likely to furnish "occasion for them who desire occasion" and call forth such article as that in the Witness.

Chanting in Latin is not to my taste,—but in a Latin school, where it is "understood of the people," it is no offence to me if others enjoy the grave and stately diction of that language. No more has the Church consecrated English than Latin.

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1848.

To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 89 south Fifth street, Philadelphia.

NEWSPAPER PROPRIETIES.—The Banner never has been very forward in asserting its own principles, preferring that its practice should declare them. Occasions may occur when it is necessary, in self-defence, to refer to these. In doing so we adopt a less pretending name expressing the outward development of these secret springs of action. There is a close connection between propriety and principle, just as there is between good manners and good morals.

These remarks are called forth by communications which we have received, and which we cannot publish, because, in our esteem, they offend against "the proprieties" which we are resolved to observe in the conduct of this paper. We think it right to state these plainly and explicitly, that correspondents, whose favors we value may be saved the trouble of sending articles which cannot be published. In this statement we neither judge nor condemn those, whose practical views of propriety are different from our own.

The first communication referred to is from "a layman," and contains severe censures against two of the Right Rev. Fathers of the Church, whose views of doctrine and duty are at variance with those of the writer, and, we may add, with our own. Now we think there is a manifest impropriety in "a layman," venturing publicly to rebuke, especially in an anonymous communication, one of the chief Ministers of the Church. Nay more, we esteem it a sin against "propriety" not only, but against the principles of sound churchmanship, for any inferior to judge his superiors in the Church of God. We refer now to those formal judgments which are pronounced and given to the world in print. As the Banner of the Cross professes to maintain the sound principles of the Church, and is conducted by a Presbyter, who has solemnly promised before God and man that he will "reverently obey his Bishop and other chief ministers, who according to the Canons of the Church, may have the charge and government over him;" one of the proprieties laid down, as an inviolable rule, will exclude from this paper all communications which convey irreverent censures, or even contain disrespectful expressions against any "Bishop and other chief ministers."

Our's is not that churchmanship which separates a spiritual Father, because of a difference of opinion and practice which the Church does not authoritatively condemn, from the reverence and submission due to his high office. It is a sad pity that such inconsistency can ever be charged against those whose principles teach them to regard every Bishop of the Church, whether he be called High or Low, or by any of those names which an ungodly day uses, as a successor of the Apostles. We may be wrong, but we express a calm and well considered judgment, when we say that, in our esteem, more real injury has been done to the Church by the practical sins of censoriousness, evil-speaking, and slandering against all orders and degrees of men in Christ's Holy Church, than by any views of doctrine or practice which have ever prevailed.

In two other communications we have a severe attack upon an Editorial and a caustic reply to a correspondent of our "cotemporary" in this city. Propriety forbids our publishing these and similar articles, (several of which we have before quietly put aside,) because the columns of the Banner is not the place to answer either the editorials or communications of the Episcopal Recorder, unless these have some reference to us. For the most part this paper has a different class of readers, and they would be little benefited by any corrections of errors made in our columns. If we desire to convert the Chinese, we would not send missionaries to Africa! And therefore if correspondents wish to put the Recorder right, they ought not to send their articles to the Banner. Besides if there is any thing bad in "a cotemporary," we would prefer our readers not to know it! "Where ignorance is bliss," &c.

And finally the Banner finds it as much as it can do to keep its own editor and correspondents straight, without adding the toil and labor of taking the oversight of its "cotemporary." We desire no controversy with other papers of the Church, we shall endeavour never to provoke this great evil, convinced that more harm than good results from entertaining the public with our private differences.

We hope our kind readers will pardon this prolix, but called-for expression of our sense of Newspaper Proprieties. We felt it due to our correspondents to make them known.

PASSION WEEK.—Next week obtains this solemn name from a blessed Saviour's "Cross and Passion." It was called "the Great Week" because we are led to "consider what great things He has done for us." It was named "the Holy Week" because all Christians used to consecrate its days, memorable each for some sacred event, with solemn services and devout exercises. Let then the Members of that church, which would preserve the Primitive faith and practice, so distinguish this week with more earnest and constant devotion in public and private, that it may still deserve its ancient titles of "Great" and "Holy."

Foreign Intelligence.

"The English Churchman" of March the 16th, (the latest we have received) informs us that Dr. Hampden's consecration was to take place on the third Sunday in Lent. "A united appeal" and "a solemn protest against the intended consecration" were to be presented to the Primate.

We take the following from the (London) Guardian.

The consecration of the Archbishop of Canterbury took place on Friday last, at Bow Church. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Lichfield, and Oxford. The usual proclamation for opponents to appear was made, and none presenting themselves, they were denounced as contumacious. An eye-witness says, that as the Archbishop was passing through the crowd on leaving Bow Church, an individual exclaimed in a low and quiet tone of voice, "God bless the Archbishop of Canterbury." The Archbishop instantly stopped, and turning to the speaker, replied in a calm and deeply impressive manner, "I thank you, I indeed need all your prayers."

It is asserted that his Grace has appointed the consecration of Dr. Hampden to take place on Sunday, the 26th instant, at Lambeth Palace.

The Cambridge Chronicle, in speaking of the new Bishop of Chester, says:—

"Perhaps there is no member of the University who enjoys a higher character for learning and abilities than Dr. Graham; and there is none whose character is more generally and deservedly popular. His talents are unquestionably of the highest order. . . . The gift by which he is most remarkably raised, perhaps, above all his contemporaries in our learned body, is his eloquence, whether in written or extemporary discourses. The quickness and tact with which he seizes the salient points in any discussion, and the felicity and fluency of the language in which he clothes his opinions, promise for him a distinguished place in that higher arena in which he is ere long destined to appear. . . . He is with all a great and deserved favourite. And here, were the occasion other than it is, we should delight to stop. But dealing with circumstances affecting the interests of the Church, and holding the opinions which we do, we feel ourselves reluctantly compelled to qualify our admiration with one drawback. Happily, however, others will think the more highly of him for the course which we disapprove; and they are those with whom power is now lodged—both which assertions are proved by the very appointment we announce. May we then be allowed to say that we cannot but fear that Dr. Graham is likely to give a greater freedom to latitudinarian views in the Church than we approve or think safe? We are led to entertain this apprehension, not from any opinions to which he has given public expression, but from the part which he took when it was the aim of Lord Melbourne's Ministry to open the old Universities to Dissenters. Many years have, however, passed since that occasion, and more correct conceptions as to the Church and Universities may have been formed by Dr. Graham. Trusting that this is the case, we willingly pass over the subject of his conduct with regard to the College Statutes, with the remark that at the time it was unexpected from him, and caused some coldness towards him in the University, and is even thought to have shut him out from the chair of our most prominent divinity professorships, for which his learning and abilities eminently qualified him. We sincerely wish that his career in his new station may be free from all like objection, and full of honour and usefulness."

CLOSING EXERCISES OF ST. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.—We have received the following account of the above exercises from a much esteemed and valued correspondent.

For the Banner of the Cross.

It was my privilege to be present at the recent semi-annual examination of St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College. It extended over a space of five days, beginning each day at 8 A. M. and not closing till the hour of evening prayer, 8 P. M. It was therefore, I need not say, both thorough and extensive. I carefully watched its progress from day to day, for the greater part of the time, and feel now that I cannot withhold the tribute of my fullest attestation both to the abundant qualifications of the several Teachers, and the singular efficiency of the system of instruction which is there pursued. There were classes examined in English Grammar, Arithmetic, Algebra, Plane Trigonometry, Conchology, and the Latin and Greek and French and German languages, besides others in different subjects at which I was not present. In referring to them, I hardly know what to select as most perfect. There was no failure, hardly any hesitation, and yet there was evidently nothing prepared for mere show. It was all sober reality. It was all solid attainment. Most of the examinations indeed—as far as I witnessed, and I judge so of the rest—were short and searching reviews, of the whole course of previous study. The proficiency shown in the several languages, was particularly interesting. Arnold and Ollendorf are making great revolutions in this department of education. A class of girls in Greek, after a few months study, certainly showed as familiar an acquaintance with the Grammar and structure of the language, as was ordinarily attained only in years, by the old plan.

But it was not so much the thorough scholarship evinced, as the remarkable effect of the moral training that most attracted my notice. No where have I ever seen the true idea of a Christian Family more fully developed, than in these two Institutions. In such a relation, viz., that of a family, with its head and members, I conceive are embraced all the duties and the joys of one social nature, both on Earth and in Heaven. Beginning in the earthly home, under the Parental eye, developed more fully in the Church of Christ under the Pastoral relation, it is made perfect only in Heaven—"Our Father's House" and home, forever. For that which the parent is to his child, and the Pastor to his flock, is God to the penitent sinner and the glorified saint. Beautiful and merciful is that arrangement which makes thus the natural relations of life, the signs of those Higher relations which pertain to our spiritual being! The Parental character with its grave authority and its tender affection, meeting us at our first entrance into life; is but the sign and symbol of Him that made us—that ever surrounds us with His power, and encircles us with His love. And it is just as our veneration and love are called forth in the one case, that we are prepared for their due and higher exercise in the other. The child that hath been brought up to be obedient and affectionate to his parents, hath had a good introduction to the fear and love of God.

It is the striking remark of Professor Sewall in a recent work, that "in the education of a child, the religious frame of mind, not the religious knowledge is the effect to be sought for. A child's religion does not consist in quoting texts of scripture, or in making long prayers, but in reverencing, loving and obeying the parents and teachers that God hath placed over them; in worshipping God through them and in them; and seeing Him dimly and faintly beyond them as a mystery and only as a mystery, which gradually clears up into open day, as obedience to His earthly representatives prepares the heart and soul for obeying Himself."

Now I conceive that all the arrangements of these two Institutions are based upon this great principle. There, the first great duty of God's Kingdom, unqualified obedience to lawful authority, is taught—and enforced gently indeed but firmly.—There gratitude is cherished by the known, felt interest and love of those, in whom that authority is vested; and especially of him, whose heart prompted, and whose head planned, and whose hands are ever busy with all the details of those noble Institutions,—the Bishop of the Diocese. To them indeed a father,—it is his constant aim and effort to lead their minds all up to Him their common Father, who claims their deepest reverence and their warmest love; and that such aim and efforts, are, by God's blessing crowned with due success,—I want no better evidence than the knowledge I have in many cases, where the thoughtlessness of youth has given away to Devotion's gentle power, and where even a waywardness, that seemed past correction, has yielded to the persuasive yet powerful influence that was brought there to bear upon it, even of "that still small voice," serene as summer dew, and searching like it into every turn and tendril of the youthful heart, in which the Church and Holy Scripture speak to children." I might go on to speak of many other things which most strike the attention of every thoughtful man, all showing how truly and how fully the idea of a christian family is carried out; and, therefore, how well the pupils are prepared for the duties and the joys of life; but I feel that I have already gone beyond the limits that you might be willing to allow for such an article. Yet, let me refer a moment to that sweet chapel of St. Mary's Hall, the Holy Innocents,—where daily prayers are offered and daily praises sang. Can any one visit that Chapel and partake in the devotions for which it is set apart—and join in the chant

"That with organ's pealing sound
Still swells with cadence sweet and full
In circling surges round and round
'To us O God be merciful.'" and doubt of the effect? But I add no more. You yourself can testify to the truth of more than I have said; and can unite with me in commending St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College to any parent who desires for son or daughter a finished education.

LONDON CHRISTIAN REMEMBRANCER.—Messrs. Appleton & Co., have made arrangements with the Publisher of this Church Review, by which they will be enabled to furnish it hereafter for $4 50 per annum, provided one hundred subscribers be obtained. This is decidedly one of the ablest of the Church Periodicals; all who are familiar with this Review, must acknowledge its high character. The former price of the Christian Remembrancer, was $7 per annum, and we hope that this liberal proposition of the Publisher will at once be met, and sufficient names given to secure its increased circulation here. Communications may be addressed to the Messrs. Appleton & Co., in New York or Philadelphia.

ST. PAUL'S COLLEGE.—We have great pleasure in publishing the following "Card." Such a report is of great injury, and could be corrected. We have not had an opportunity of personal observation of this long established institution, but we have heard from others capable of judging of "its excellence in all respects."

The New York Churchman, thus speaks of this school:

"Under its present Rector, Mr. J. G. Barton, it continues to be conducted in a manner worthy of its established reputation, and with the help of a body of very able and competent teachers who are most ardently devoted to their arduous duties."

CARD.—Learning that a rumor exists that it is purposed to close St. Paul's College, the Rector takes this means of informing the friends of the Institution that such is in nowise his intention—that the rumor is wholly incorrect—and that all arrangements for the continuance of the establishment, are now in operation, in like manner as they have ever been.

J. G. BARTON, Rector.

THE WORKING OF NON-COMMITTAL RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.—We have seldom seen the absurdity of attempting to teach religious truth without giving offence to any peculiar systems so forcibly illustrated as in the following extract. If any are disposed to think it is too ludicrous for a Religious Journal, let them remember that the absurdity grows out of grave and solemn facts. We copy it from that most excellent and dignified religious paper "the Church," published in Canada.

We have been lately asked about the working of "the National School" system in Ireland. Let "Thady Brady" answer for us! Some of our readers may not be aware of the nature of this wonderful system by which, the wolf and the lamb, the leopard with the kid, the calf and the young lion are to be educated together, each retaining his peculiar nature! The method by which this is to be accomplished is as follows. In school hours all the pupils are to be taught selections from religious truth, or inoffensive extracts from the word of God which would not disturb the peculiar doctrines of Churchman, Romanist, or other Sectarian! At an allotted hour, the children of the various systems may be gathered in different rooms, or corners of the same room, and instructed by Rector, Parish Priest or other minister, in the peculiarities of their respective creeds. How to reconcile the discrepancies of these latter instructions with the former teachings is the great difficulty, or in other words, to teach them to agree, and at the same time to differ, hic labor, hoc opus est! What success attends this labor of love "the memorial given below declares. An idea somewhat similar to this is a cherished scheme in this country also. Let those who entertain it, consider seriously this "memorial." There seems a general anxiety that religious teaching should have its place in daily school instruction. In National schools, especially in a country where no national preference is given to any peculiar system, we firmly believe it to be a practical impossibility to teach religious truth, unless it be stripped of its power, and reduced to utter banality. Christian education for the poor can only be provided for in parochial schools. The practical application of this striking illustration bears not merely upon the instruction of children, but upon all christian teaching, and shows the absurdity of trying to convey this important knowledge so that those of various creeds and opposite doctrines, may find no occasion for fault, and no grounds for offence!

To the Editor of the Church.

Dear Sir,—I am induced to enclose you a Tract illustrating the working of the National System of Education for Ireland, in consequence of reading a panegyric in the Journal of Education (No. 2, Page 50), which declares the principles of that system to be "Christian and Catholic." How a System of Education can be called Christian which excludes the Bible, I am at a loss to conceive.

I believe that the effects of the Scripture Lessons, as described in the Tract, are not exaggerated.

But even these may or may not be read in the Schools, so that the system is, in fact, an Infidel one.

I am, Dear Sir,

Your's faithfully,

M. A. PRESBYTER.

The Memorial of THADY BRADY, to the Commissioners of Education.

Humbly Showeth,—That I am, as you know, Thady Brady, who was appointed Master of the National School of Killmeaganny, Co. Clare, having been recommended by the Rev. Eustathius Finnerty, P.P. And as the Protestant Minister, Mr. Pleasall joined in the application for building the School, and induced a few of the Protestant children, whose parents live among us, to come to it—I take equal pains to instruct them. It is on the subject of the Scripture Lessons that I now make bold to address your Honourable Board.

Your Memorialist also prays that your Honours will tell him a safe meaning to give of 'justification,' which you bid me explain,* but which is getting me into scrapes and scoldings on all sides. I do not ask for the true meaning, for I know that, but a meaning that won't give any 'peculiar religious instruction,' for that's what they blamed me for doing in the school hours, when I gave my own explanation of the word. That you may understand my case, I will lay it before you in detail, and relate my grievances in handling these Lessons.

I was teaching one day last month, the First Lesson in the New Testament, and after the boys had read it and closed their books, I began to ask the questions printed at the end of it, and in due course, says I, 'How did the Angel address her?'* (meaning the Blessed Virgin.)—'Hail Mary full of Grace,' answers Tim Flanagan. 'As one peculiarly blessed of God,' says Jack Smith, the water-guard's son, 'amn't I right, and may I go up?'—'You are both right,' says I. 'But which is to go up?' says they. 'Jack Smith is more exact,' says I, and accordingly he took Flanagan's place. Well, the school was not broke up an hour, when Mrs. Flanagan, she's a carmelite, came to ask me if I had put down her grandson for saying 'The Angelical Salutation.' 'Ma'am,' says I, 'I adhered to the strict letter of the Scripture Lessons.' 'Sir,' says she, 'I'll complain of you to the Bishop for punishing my boy for confessing the true faith. And you are a renegade and an apostate from your religion for doing what you have done.' The next week I was teaching with much fear over me on account of Mrs. Flanagan, when in came the Minister, and with him an Evangelical gentleman that opposed the school, whom he thought to win over by showing him how well the children were taught to read the Scriptures. As ill luck would have it, I was hearing the boys the Lesson in which you have marked the word 'repent'† to be 'explained.' So taking your note at page 14 to help me, I said, says I, 'repent means do penance, and that means a great deal; for example, it means peas in the shoes, and a pilgrimage to Lough Derg, and saying a thousand aves and a hundred *pater noster*s, fasting.' I saw the Minister wriggling as I went on explaining 'repent;' and the Evangelical gentleman grinned. And when school was over, the Minister in a high rage set upon me, and rated at me for teaching Popery, as he called it, in school hours. 'Sir,' says I, 'the Board put down the word "to be explained," and I believe in no other meaning.' 'I won't leave my children here,' says he to be corrupted by you, and I'll report you to the Board for giving peculiar instruction before the proper hour for it is come.' 'Sir,' says I, 'it is not peculiar instruction: I am bound to give an explanation, for the Board has marked it for me to explain, and I will do my duty.' May it please your Honourable Board, I have found it a hard and vexatious thing to do that same. After Mrs. Flanagan blew me up, I made a rule that in reading the Lessons the children should not take each other's places when they missed.—But it was not long till, as I was hearing them read the 19th Lesson, I asked them, as you directed me,‡ 'How must we be justified?' 'By my good works,' says Jem Flynn. 'By faith,' says Bob Jones, 'amn't I right?'—'By faith and works,' says Darby Morris, 'amn't I right?' 'By faith without works, amn't I right?' says Miles Johnson. 'O! you're all right,' says I, 'more or less: but no taking places, as I commanded you already.' The boys looked at each other, as if they would determine, by a fight after school, which was right, since I would not decide it for them. And I thought to myself, anyhow, it is mighty little knowledge they'll get out of the Lessons, if I mustn't help them and put them right.—However, as that was one of the days for giving separate religious instruction after school hours, the Protestants went home by themselves, and the Catholics remained to say their catechism, which prevented a fight on that day; and I took the opportunity of telling them that justification means sanctification, and so we are justified by our good works. But five days after, when they came to the 24th Lesson, I asked them 'what does the word "Paradise" mean?'§ 'Limbo,' says Phil Scratch. 'Heaven,' says Tom Whack. What was I to do now? The boys looked angry, and were waiting for me to decide who was right, when in came Father Finnerty, and without more ado, Phil appealed to him. 'You are right,' says his Reverence. Tom's eyes flashed fire, and he muttered something between his teeth, that came out afterwards when the school was breaking up. For he set upon Phil as he went out of the door, and said, 'You unmannerly cur, do you mean that our Saviour went to Purgatory?' 'I do,' says he. 'There's no such place in the Bible,' says Tom. 'There is, you bloody Protestant,' says Phil. 'You lie,' says the angry fellow, 'Paradise is Heaven.'—'It is Limbo,' says Phil, and gave him a punch in the ribs. 'Heaven,' says Tom, and hit him a blow in the eye. A ring was now formed by four or five Protestants and about fifty Catholics, and the shouts were loud on both sides, one bawling for Limbo and the other for Heaven. And I saw the Evangelical gentleman riding by, and he shook his head, as much as to say our system of united instruction was making fine harmony in the country.—He complained of it, however, to the Minister, and so he came up along with him next day, and taxed me with setting the boys fighting. 'Sir,' says I, 'I only asked the question which the Board bid me ask. And I gave no explanation of my own. You were angry with me the other day for explaining a word; and now you're angry because I can't keep the boys from controversy, and all the controversy was brought in by the Board.' 'But look at the lesson of love and charity that's hanging upon the wall,' says he, 'why did you not enforce it?' 'Is it with a ratan?' says I, 'am I to flog them to make them love one another? and as to the lesson of charity that is hung up, its a different lesson they hear at home; and one can't expect all at once that they will give up the old plan, and be persuaded that it is not right to punish a heretic for reviling the true faith.' 'I will not have these Scripture Lessons read any more in the school,' says he, 'they only drag the children into controversy, by the notes and questions they contain.' 'The Board earnestly recommend the use of them, Sir,' says I. 'And if you do not use the Lessons, says the Evangelical gentleman, 'you won't have any Scriptures read in the school.' 'I will take away my children,' says the Minister, 'and send them to the Bible School in the next parish.' This is the state of the case. And I humbly pray your Honourable Board to tell me how I am to explain 'justification,' and 'Abraham's bosom,'† without giving particular religious instruction, and without teaching them what I believe myself to be their true meaning. And

In duty bound both night and day,
Thady Brady will ever pray."

A REPROACH AGAINST OUR ARMY.—We copy the following from "The Catholic Herald" of April 6th. If it be true, it dies the field of "Buena Vista" with a more fearful stain than the blood which it cost to win that remarkable victory.

If it be false, let the foul calumny be refuted at once, and branded as a traitorous slander against our country's victorious soldiers. If this meets the eye of any acquainted with the facts, and we shall endeavor that it shall be thus seen, we call upon them in the name of Truth, Religion and Patriotism, to contradict this statement if it be false. True or untrue, they must be sadly pushed for reasons against the distribution of the Word of God, who would use an argument which has no force but to cast eternal shame and reproach upon a portion of the American Army.

PROTESTANT BIBLE DISTRIBUTION.—It is well known that Protestants showed great zeal in supplying every soldier destined for the Mexican war with a copy of the Bible. The following fact, related in the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, tells what use was made of these Bibles.

"Among the horrible perversions of all that is good, may be classed the destruction of Bibles furnished by the benevolence of the American Bible Society to our army in Mexico. The officers of that society have it in a form that gives less room to doubt than could have been wished, that a large portion of the Bibles furnished to the army under General Taylor was torn up and used for wadding during the battle of Buena Vista. It is also said that one of the general officers on that field profanely exclaimed, on seeing the destruction of Bibles,—'My God, how the gospel spreads in Mexico.'

This is but one of a thousand similar instances serving to show the injudiciousness, yea, the criminality of the Protestant practice of forcing a copy of the Sacred Scriptures on men before they have learned to appreciate their value. However, no matter what becomes of the Bibles, whether they are used for gun-wadding, or wrapping-paper, or cigar-lighting, &c. &c. &c., they all go to swell the number distributed; and thus enable the managers, agents, officers, &c. &c. of the "American Bible Society" to make up an imposing annual report! The amount of good effected is estimated by the number of Bibles distributed (!) Hence these agents and officers will make their appeal somewhat after this fashion: "We have distributed so many Bibles—we have thus done so much good to the souls of men. Is not this a noble Institution? Will you not continue to aid it with your contributions?" And thus, strange to say, they manage to extort from the American people, the enormous sum of two hundred thousand dollars per annum!—Catholic Herald.

SPIRIT OF MISSIONS.—The April number of this interesting Periodical contains an excellent letter from the Rev. Dr. Chapman, in relation to "the early Episcopal clergy of Kentucky." This as an important historical document, we will copy hereafter. We give the following in relation to "Domestic Missions," in which department the contributions for the month, ending March 15th, amount to $1,196.93.

GOOD FRIDAY.—We would remind the friends of the Mission to the Jews, and the Clergy generally, of the annual collection, which, for two or three years past, has been made on this great Fast Day, for God's ancient people. For the state of the Mission in the city of New York, we refer to the report of the missionary for the few months since his appointment, in the March No., page 75.

APPOINTMENTS.—Rev. Newton E. Marble, to Concord, N. H., from March 1, 1848. Rev. Caleb Dow, to Paducah and Smithland, Ky., from February 1, 1848. Rev. G. G. Moore removes from Paris to Covington and Newport, Ky., from February 1, 1848. Rev. C. A. Foster, to Evansville, Ind. Rev. F. R. Haff, to Duck Creek, Wis., the Mission to the Oneida Indians.

RESIGNATION.—Rev. S. Davis, of the Oneida Mission, Duck Creek, Wisconsin, on account of ill health.

The contributions in aid of "Foreign Missions" for the same period amount to $1,866.52.

We ask attention to the following extracts respecting this department.

ATHENS.—Advices have been received from the Rev. Mr. Hill, dated 15th January, in which he says, "We are all well. At our anniversary distribution of rewards at Christmas, we had five hundred and fifty pupils present, and more than the usual numbers of visitors, perhaps one thousand, many of whom were of the highest classes of society, both Greeks and foreigners. Our mission pursues its steady course, and we continue to enjoy the confidence of the people among whom we have been so long laboring."

In reference to the pecuniary prospects of his mission, the letter of Mr. Hill expresses much anxiety. He speaks of the late resolution of the Foreign Committee, withdrawing the credit on his bankers in London, as having "cut him off from all resources at the beginning of the year," and remarks, that he had "actually not a farthing to begin the year with but from borrowed money." "I trust," he adds, "that the Committee will take measures to relieve me as speedily as possible."

The Committee have no other resource than the publication of the following resolution, passed at the meeting, held March 14th:

Resolved, That notice be immediately given to the Church, that the receipts for the Athens Mission are entirely inadequate to its support, and that without the prompt and liberal aid of its friends, it cannot be sustained.

Will the journals of the Church give this an insertion?

AFRICA.—A letter has been received from the Mission at Cape Palmas, dated 15th December last, at which date all were well. Mrs. Payne, who had been long and seriously an invalid, was quite restored to health.

CHURCH IN THE COLONY AT CAPE PALMAS.—The March number contained some interesting statements from the Rev. Mr. Payne, in reference to the encouraging opening for missionary labour among the colonists at Cape Palmas. The Committee are satisfied of the importance of availing themselves of this opportunity, especially with reference to the prospects of educating colonist youths for teachers and missionaries to the native tribes. They hope, at no distant period, to obtain the services of a well qualified colored person to occupy this interesting position.

A very essential part of the plan is the erection of a church edifice in the colony. Already has a beginning been made; materials have been partially collected, and some liberal subscriptions obtained, but further assistance from this country is requisite; the Committee, therefore, solicit from the friends of the Mission in Western Africa, contributions to this special fund—the erection of a Protestant Episcopal Church at Cape Palmas.

CHINA.—Letters from Bishop Boone have been received, dated at Shanghai, 18th November last. Everything connected with the mission appears to be highly encouraging, with the exception of the health of the Bishop.

We copy the following from "The Missionary." The clergy may find comfort in such a statement, as a substantial refutation of the common and fallacious opinion concerning the children of clergymen.

THE SONS OF CLERGYMEN.—Bishop Doane, in his "Impressions of the Church of England," exclaims: "What a book, that might be, which should be called the 'Parsonages of England!' From them, as fountains among palm-trees, what living streams have flowed to purify and to refresh the world! How much of England's greatness and of England's glory—what scholars, what artists, what soldiers, what sailors, what merchants, what statesmen, what philosophers, what patriots, what divines, what saints, have sprung from the Parsonages of England."—It has often been a matter of surprise to us, that such a compilation has never been undertaken, since the materials cannot be very difficult of access. Amongst many others which might be enumerated, Lord Nelson, and Sir Francis Drake, were the sons of clergymen: so were Lord Chancellor Thurlow and Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, Bishops Horne and Heber, Dr. Paley and the Wesleys, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir Astley Cooper, Ben Jonson, Otway the dramatist, Cleveland, the cavalier poet, Addison, Cowper, Goldsmith, Coleridge, and the Tennysons, Sir Philip Francis, Alison, the historian. Nor ought there to be omitted from this catalogue the name of one who, in the amiable relations of a daughter and wife, as well as in the high rank to which she has attained amongst female writers, has exhibited many of those graces and virtues which grow, with silent growth and bloom, in meek and bashful loveliness in hundreds of the quiet "Parsonages of England." Need we append to this description, which so few will fail to recognize, the name of Caroline Bowles, the honoured, but alas! the widowed wife of Robert Southey. These, indeed, are but a few of a host of worthies who might be named; but they, at least, will serve to show how much this country is, perhaps unconsciously, indebted to the domestic influences of the Church, for calling forth and cultivating the budding characteristics of dissimilar minds, which, in the maturity of their vigour, have added so much to our national reputation.—Oxford Herald.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—"Old Mortality" in reply to "B" was received too late for insertion this week.

THE CHURCH REVIEW AND ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTER.—Vol. 1, Number 1, April, 1848. New Haven, Conn. Published by Bassett & Bradley, 117 Chapel st.

The want of a sound and able Church Review has long been felt. Surely our American branch of the Church is not wanting in ability and learning to produce a Review of the right order, and the members of the Church are not deficient in the taste and disposition to sustain such a Periodical! In the publication now before us, we have a disproof of the first reproach, and it will remain for the Church to show by a liberal support of this Review that there is no foundation in the second. The first number gives us promise of a valuable addition to our Church Literature. The articles are able, and the subjects well selected, as the following list will show.

Art. I. Colonial Church Missions of the seventeenth century.
Art. II. The late prophecies of Isaiah.

Art. III. Poetry and the Church.

Art. IV. Updike's History of Narragansett.

Art. V. The Rock of the Church.

Art. VI. Dr. Jarvis's Vindication.

Art. VII. Chancellor Kent.

To which are added "Notices of Books," "Ecclesiastical Register," "Summary of Home Intelligence" (these two especially valuable) "Summary of Foreign Intelligence," "Editorial Address." As the best means of showing the character of this Journal, for which we earnestly bespeak the patronage of the Church, we have copied one of its interesting articles to be found on the first page.

THE WORKS OF THE RIGHT REV. GEORGE HORNE, D. D.—Late Lord Bishop of Norwich, to which are prefixed memoirs of his life, studies and writings. By William Jones, M. A., F. R. S., one of his Lordship's Chaplains, and long his most intimate and confidential friend.

New York: Stanford & Swords, 139 Broadway, 1848.

Of Bishop Horne as a writer, it is not necessary that we should speak. His noble work on the Psalms has made him known and read of all men. There is in all his productions a simplicity connected with rare beauty of thought and expression, to which a most devout and earnest spirit gives life and animation. No work can more advance the best interests of true religion than this of Bishop Horne's. We thank the worthy publishers who have brought it out in a cheap, convenient, and suitable form. And we are sure if this work receives that attention it merits they will be rewarded for their pains.

THE SKETCHES.—Three Tales: I. Walter Lorimer; II. The Emblems of Life; III. The Lost Inheritance. By the Authors of "Amy Herbert," "The Old Man's Home," and "Hawkstone"—New York and Philadelphia, Messrs. Appleton & Co.

The reputation of the authors of these beautiful sketches or stories will secure them at once the attention of the public. They are published in most attractive form and embellished with beautiful and appropriate designs.

We have also received "THE GUARDIAN: A FAMILY MAGAZINE devoted to the cause of Female Education on Christian Principles: edited at the Female Institute, Columbia, Tennessee, by the Rector." This is a highly respectable Journal, and we doubt not will subserve the interests of the sacred cause to which it is pledged. The article in our last on Mr. Wayen's reminiscences was from the London Guardian. We have also received the April number of "THE YOUNG CHURCHMAN'S MISCELLANY" as usual, filled with instruction and entertainment for its proper readers.

We welcome the return of THE LITERARY WORLD, edited by C. H. Hoffman, Esq., which did not come for a time, and was greatly missed. It is an able and most useful paper for all who are desirous of Literary Intelligence, and feel an interest in the transactions of "the Literary World."

Obituary.

With deepest sympathy for those who have been called again to mourn while the tears are scarce dried which fell upon a recent grave, we copy the following touching notice. We commend this true and affecting account of one early called to our young readers. May they be taught by this lesson, addressed to the heart, how dear and precious may be the memory of dutiful and faithful conduct in early life. Thus will they not only be prepared for bliss beyond the grave, but thus also may they leave behind them blessed comfort to cheer the loving hearts made desolate by their removal from earth.

In such a bereavement a Saviour's voice is audible, to the ear of Faith saying—"Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not," and they who within a year have laid two beloved children in their early tombs have solid comfort in this thought, which the Christian poet sweetly expresses as the present confidence of our eternal hope.

'Tis sweet, as year by year we lose
Friends out of sight, in faith to muse
How grows in Paradise our store.

From the Guardian.

DIED.—At Mercer Hall, on Sunday night, Feb. 6th. after an illness of three days, FRANCES JANE OTEY, youngest daughter of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Otey, of the diocese of Tennessee, in the 10th year of her age.

We make the above announcement of the death of a lovely and beloved child with the deepest sorrow:—which, we are sure, will be participated in by our readers, and all others acquainted with the fond parental affections of our revered Diocesan, whose family have again been overwhelmed with inexpressible anguish. Scarcely nine months have elapsed since we were called upon to record the decease of an elder sister, whose memory will long live among us associated with all that is attractive in personal beauty, graceful in manners, gentle in disposition, devoted in every domestic and social affection, and exemplary in the discharge of every christian duty. As her afflicted tutor, the writer of the present notice may be pardoned for this passing tribute to a friend and pupil so highly esteemed, whose talents and assiduity converted the task of instruction into positive pleasure, and whose many engaging qualities made her presence a light to his lecture-room. He will be the more readily excused when it is stated that the sweet and sprightly little girl, whose removal from our circle is now deplored, was in an extraordinary degree the image of that bright and beautiful being, whose death in May last, in the spring-time of her existence,

"Woke the sacred source of sympathetic tears," in the bosoms of her school-mates, and was attended also with an out-pouring of the Holy Spirit upon their hearts so manifest and so beneficial, as to hallow it forever to our memory. Often, when reciting some juvenile lesson in elocution, did Fanny startle us with her look, gesture, tone of voice

("unconscious fascination! undesigned!")

so strikingly like those of her sister as to bring the image of the lost one distinctly before us. There stood a miniature representation of Sarah, in form, features, action; nay in her laugh and her every movement!

Dear little Fanny! Her life was all sunshine. We may say her only sickness was her last. Existence seemed to be to her positive enjoyment. She was all vivacity and joyousness. In whatever she engaged, it was entered upon and pursued with irrepressible ardour and earnestness. She was remarkably fond of music, and always sung at church and at family devotions, being able by the ear alone to sing the whole of the Te Deum with tolerable correctness. Occupying the pew just in front of her usual seat, we yet hear, in fancy, her accustomed tones in prayer and praise! Generally, indeed, her voice was heard through the day at home, singing some hymn or chant; and often she prevented the early dawn, drawing aside the curtains, looking out on the bright stars of heaven, and carolling one of her sweet little songs. In temper she was quick, but placable and forgiving. She was generous almost to a fault, and self-sacrificing for those she loved. She learned with the greatest facility when she chose to apply herself; but her natural vivacity made the confinement of the school-room irksome and often distasteful. She was remarkably affectionate in her disposition; loved her companions much and tenderly; nor could she cherish a feeling of ill-will or dislike to any human being.

We give these rapid sketches of little Fanny with no reference to the interest or profit of the public. We are aware that the story of her life and character might be told of other children by a fond teacher. She was an unsophisticated and confiding child, and we desire to make her obituary simple and unpretending,—like herself.

But there were some circumstances connected with the last hours and final close of her existence which may be deeply interesting and highly profitable to those young companions who lately saw her among them, the emblem of healthy, innocent, and beautiful childhood. Her filial obedience was a signal mark of her character, and it was manifested in a memorable degree amidst those sufferings so distressful to the watching relatives and friends. When the last resort that offered any hope of saving her life was determined upon, her agonized father explained to her that it might preserve her to him, or would speedily carry her to Heaven. She yielded immediate assent—saying, however, "let me go to Heaven!" Shortly after, she seemed to think that she was dead, and with the most affecting simplicity and heart-touching tones of voice inquired "Am I dead now?" For a while the hopes of her relatives were greatly revived: to be followed alas! by the very bitterness of disappointment. Her agonies became so insupportable, that, lifting her hands towards Heaven, she cried out "O! merciful Father!" It was an appeal to that great and good Being who is never appealed to by the pure in heart in vain. The strength of her system broke down;—she very soon became unconscious:—and sank at last into the arms of death—her soul having taken its flight, as we humbly trust, to the bosom of her Saviour and her God!

For the sake of her juvenile schoolmates, we must not fail to record another circumstance. Early in her sickness, she asked her father whether he thought she would get well? The good Bishop, (—with his grief pent up, and not daring to shed a tear, and with the most anxious wish to sustain and comfort the dear child—) would not deceive her. He expressed only his hope that she would recover. She asked, if he thought she would go to Heaven. He told her he trusted she would. She said, with great meekness, she feared she had not been a good girl. He then asked her, if she was sorry that she had ever been bad—she said she was. He then instructed her, that (if she was truly sorry, and asked forgiveness of God, for the sake of Jesus Christ who had died for her.) God would pardon her and take her to Heaven. On two occasions, while prayers were offered for her, she put up her little hands in the attitude of prayer, and with a sweet and trembling voice repeated the words of supplication, with a readiness and an intelligence that excited the attention of all present. She often asked the family to sing; and particularly called for the "Te Deum" her favorite, and attempted to join in it herself. When told that she would die, she called for all the children, and bade them "good-bye" with a voice of plaintiveness that would have melted a heart of stone. She bade farewell to her parents also: at the same time expressing with her beautiful eyes more than can be depicted or described. Her father told her she would soon see her dear sister Sarah and brother Heber. "Yes!" exclaimed the sweet child, "and Mr. Alston and Mrs. P——," referring to two dearly beloved friends of the family who died last summer—the one the late lamented Rector of Calvary Church, Memphis, who expired at Mercer Hall—the other a distinguished lady of this county, no less remarkable for the christian graces of her character than for that elegance and refinement which embellished her hospitable home, and were felt by all who came within their influence. Fanny then sent messages to her absent sisters and brothers, and all her companions, telling them to meet her in Heaven!

And now what have we to add but our prayer that our dear little Fanny's death may be a sermon and an effectual one to all her companions and friends, leading them to seek the only true God and Jesus Christ whom he has sent!

On Monday Feb. 7th, the lifeless remains of our beloved young pupil were borne to the cemetery of St. John's Church, Ashwood. The service was read by the Rev. Jno. A. Harrison, the 187th Hymn sung in accordance with little Fanny's own request—and then she was laid down to rest in peace, and in hope of a joyful resurrection, by the side of her dearly beloved sister Sarah. Lovely in their lives,—in death they are not divided!

"Fair was thy blossom, bonny flower,
Fair as the softest wreaths of spring,
When late I saw thee seek the bower
In peace thy morning hymn to sing.

Thy little foot across the lawn
Scarce from the primrose pressed the dew:
I thought the spirit of the dawn
Before me on the greensward flew!

Even then the shaft was on the wing
Thy spotless soul from earth to sever,
A tear of pity wet the string
That twang'd and sealed thy doom forever.

I saw thee late, the emblem fair
Of beauty, innocence, and truth,
Start tiptoe on the verge of air,
'Twixt childhood and unstable youth.

But now I see thee stretch'd at rest,
On which no earthly dawn shall ope!
Pale as the grave flower on thy breast
Sweet child of love, of joy, and hope.

From thy long sleep so sound and sweet
Thou'lt waken to a glorious morrow:
Meantime, the daisy, emblem meet,
Shall o'er thee shed its tear of sorrow!"

For the Banner of the Cross.

Departed this life at New Orleans on the 20th day of Jan. 1848, at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. M. E. Baxter, Mrs. ELIZABETH PRICE ROSE, consort of James Rose, Esq., of Memphis, and daughter of the late Roderick Taliaferro, Esq., of Lynchburg, Va. For many years previous to her decease, this excellent and lamented lady had been an exemplary member of Calvary church in this city, though at an earlier period of her life, she had attended the ministry of the Methodists, and indeed received her first religious impressions under the preaching of the Rev. M. P. Parks, then the stationed Methodist minister at Lynchburg, but now an assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York. In 1831 however the family removed to Memphis, and a year or two later, we find Mrs. Rose an attendant upon the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Wright,* then a missionary of the Church at this point, and in the course of the same year, she was confirmed by Bishop Otey, and was one of the three or four persons who at that time made up the communion of the parish. It is proper to state in this connexion, that, from the impulse of a strong and inquiring mind, and a conscientious desire to be duly informed upon the Church's claims, Mrs. Rose was led to examine the subject for herself; and the result was a firm conviction that those claims were founded in truth, and a devotion to the system of the Church, which remained unshaken and steadfast to her last periods.

The disease of which she died made its appearance as early as 1833 or 4, and continued with more or less intermission up to the time of her decease, and she was thus admonished by the gradual decay of the vital powers, of the possibility of her being summoned from life at any instant. Her thoughts were therefore very emphatically directed to the realization of the everlasting future, and she was ever found in the attitude of repose, who are vigilantly waiting for their Lord, that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open to him immediately. And at last the summons came. In the hope of experiencing some relief from a change of temperature, she had repaired to New Orleans, and while there, descended into the dark valley, supported and cheered by the inestimable promises of our holy faith, and though absent from her own loved home, yet soothed and consoled by the tender sympathies and kind solicitudes of an affectionate and devoted daughter. In the death of Mrs. Rose, the Church to which she belonged has lost one of its oldest and most valued members, society one of its brightest and most cherished ornaments, her husband a faithful and devoted wife, and her children a loved and honoured parent. Yes, most sweet and hallowed are their associations with her memory, and pleasant will it be to them to think of her as she is portrayed in the following touching extract from a letter of her brother in Virginia, to his surviving sister in this city.

"It is said that He permits His angels to dwell a time upon earth to sweeten and model our rough natures. It seems to me that these sayings were true in the person of our sister. Her death led me in a moment to all the long space back to our childhood, and brought in bright images the pictures of those happy days. You may not recollect them, as I your older brother do. They were bright and happy days, and made so readily by her. How dear and lovely a little sister she was to me, how jovial and gladsome was her sweet temper, how kind, affectionate and lovely her manners. These visions floated for days in my mind, and shut out almost the recollection of her instant home and distant death. We seem never to have been separated, and still to be children. The delusion was a sweet one. I believe when I think of her, this is and will be the first view, and I feel no inclination to disturb it." Rev. D. C. Page

Diocesan Intelligence.

Pennsylvania.—Rees O. Evans as said in the last number of the "Banner" to have been admitted to Deacon's orders by Bishop Potter, should have been Rees C. Evans. Papers which have copied the name as it was erroneously given, will please to make this correction.

The notice of services by the Bishop in St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia, should have stated the number confirmed, to have been thirteen.

Alabama.—The Bishop, on Saturday and Sunday, the 25th and 26th March, visited (in his annual visitation of the Diocese) Jacksonville, Benton Co. On the morning of Saturday the Annunciation, Morning Prayers were said by the Missionary of the place, and the Ante-communion Service and Sermon by the Bishop. Sunday morning the Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion, and in the afternoon of the same day catechised the children and confirmed two persons. In the evening of the same day attended the third service for the colored, and administered the Apostolic Rite of Confirmation to an aged colored person.

New Jersey.—On Septuagesima Sunday, February 20, the Bishop preached, in the morning, in Grace Church, Newark, and in the afternoon in Trinity Church; notice being given, in each case, of the establishment of a Free Mission Church, in the Fifth Ward. In the evening, in a room provided for the purpose, the Rev. Mr. Lowell, (of the diocese of Massachusetts,) read prayers, and the Bishop preached; announcing the appointment of the Rev. Mr. Lowell, as Missionary to that district; to have charge of Christ Church, as a Free Mission Church. The Rev. Messrs. Henderson and Watson were present. Mr. Lowell has been for some years a Missionary in Newfoundland. His labours in Newark, thus far, have been greatly encouraged.

SERVICES OF THE VISITATION.—On Wednesday, March 15, in Trinity Church, Fairview, the Rev. Messrs. Germain and Ver Mehr, read prayers, the children were catechised by the Minister, the Rev. Mr. Hallowell, and the Bishop examined them, and preached. The Rev. Mr. Bradin was present.

On Sunday, March 26, (third in Lent,) in St. Stephen's Church, Churchville, the Rev. Mr. Bradin read evening prayers, the Minister, the Rev. Mr. Hallowell, catechised the children, and the Bishop examined them, preached, and confirmed three persons.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE.—At a Meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New Jersey, held at Newark, March 17, 1848, the Rev. Charles W. Rankin, Deacon, was recommended for Priest's orders; and Edmund B. Tuttle was recommended as a Candidate for Orders.—Missionary.

Western New York.—BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Sunday, March 26th, Bishop DeLancey officiated morning and afternoon, in St. Paul's Church, Waterloo, and confirmed in the afternoon, three persons; Prayers and the Preface being read by the Rev. Mr. Wheeler, the Minister of the parish.

On Sunday, April 2d, Bishop DeLancey officiated in St. Paul's Church, Syracuse. Morning Prayers were read by the Rev. Dr. Gregory, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Davenport. The Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion, the Rev. gentlemen above named, assisting in the distribution of the elements. In the afternoon, the Bishop preached and confirmed three persons; the same Clergyman reading Prayers, and the Rev. Dr. Gregory reading the Confirmation preface.

In the evening, services were held in the Free Chapel (the consecration of which was deferred until the whole expense of the lot and building should be paid.) Prayers were read by Dr. Gregory and Rev. Mr. Davenport. Baptism was administered by Dr. Gregory to an adult, and the Bishop preached and confirmed one person. Full congregations attended these services.

On the 4th, the Bishop preached and confirmed three persons in Zion Church, Rome. Prayers and the confirmation preface were read by the Rev. Almon Gregory, the minister of the parish.—Gos. Mess.

Ohio.—ORDINATION.—On Wednesday, the 22d of March, in All Saints Church, Portsmouth, the Bishop of the Diocese admitted the Rev. Thos. B. Dooley to the holy order of the Priesthood. Morning Prayer was read by the Rector of the parish, the Rev. Erastus Brown, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Jas. B. Britton, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Chillicothe, from 1 Tim. 3: 1; in which the office and duties of the Christian Ministry were set forth with great clearness and force.

On the evening of the same day, the Bishop administered the rite of Confirmation to ten persons, and preached.

The above were but a part of a series of interesting services, in which the Congregation united with great devotion, and thereby manifested their appreciation of the faithful labors of those whom the occasion had brought together.

The Rev. Mr. Dooley left the next day to enter upon his charge of — Church, Pomeroy, Meigs co.

New York.—CONSECRATION.—On Sunday last, the fourth in Lent, the Floating Church of the Holy Comforter, moored at the foot of Dey street, was consecrated to the worship and service of Almighty God by the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Pennsylvania, acting by the request of the Standing Committee of the Diocese. This church was completed and opened for Divine Service about eighteen months since, but was not consecrated, in consequence of the wise and proper determination of the Board of Managers of the Society, by whom it was erected, that this solemnity should not be performed until every dollar of debt on the building should be paid. To accomplish this desirable end, the Managers have been untiring in their exertions, which have now, by the Divine Blessing, been crowned with success, although there is a floating debt due in part to the Missionary, of about thirteen hundred dollars. We trust that they may continue to be encouraged by the sympathy and liberal contributions of their fellow Churchmen, and especially of our wealthy merchants, and that there may be no lack of means for the due support of the ministrations of the Gospel. We are glad to know that the abundant and faithful labors of the Missionary of this Church, the Rev. D. V. M. Johnson, have been very successful, and that he ministers to large and attentive congregations of Seamen and Boatmen. There are three services held every Sunday. The average number of communicants is about twenty. The church, which is an appropriate and beautiful structure, was designed and built by Mr. Upjohn.

Mr. G. T. Fox, formerly a merchant of this city, and brother of the Rev. Charles Fox, now of the diocese of Michigan, was ordained Deacon by the Bishop of Chester on the 20th of February, having taken his degree of A. B. at Cambridge a few weeks previously.—Churchman.

Indiana.—CONSECRATION OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, LAPORTE.—Thursday, the 2d inst., was a day of sincere rejoicing to the worthy minister and zealous members of the Church at Laporte. After a long and ardent struggle, against difficulties which would have discouraged less earnest minds, their efforts to erect a Christian sanctuary have, by God's blessing, been crowned with success. The day appointed for its consecration was unusually cold and inclement, yet a congregation sufficient to fill the building assembled. At the appointed hour Bishop Kemper, in his robes, attended by the minister of the parish and three of the neighboring clergy in surplices, proceeded to the Church, being received at the door by the wardens and vestrymen, and entering, repeated alternately the 24th Psalm, as they walked up the nave.

The church is a plain neat structure, of the Doric order, 28 by 60 feet, with a handsome Portico in front. The arrangement of the interior is Church-like in a good degree. The chancel is spacious, the altar well elevated with panelled front and sides, the top consisting of a handsome marble slab, over which, against the wall, is a plain, gilt cross, the emblem of the Christian Faith. The lecterns are on either side of the altar, and on a line a few feet in advance of it.

The entire cost of the building is $2,500, the whole of which sum has been raised by the congregation without aid from abroad, and without leaving a debt upon the Church, every claim having been satisfied before consecration was asked.

On the following Sunday morning, the Rev. S. W. Manney was instituted into the Rectorship of the Church. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Brown, the Rev. Mr. Halsted reading the Lessons. The address to the incumbent was made by the Bishop. The keys having been in due form presented and received, the other parts of the office assigned to the Institution, were performed by the Bishop, who then delivered an appropriate sermon from St. John 17: 20, 21. The newly-instituted Rector then proceeded to the communion service, the Bishop saying the prayer of consecration, and administering the Eucharist to the clergy present, and the Rector to his congregation, assisted by the Rev. B. Halsted, who delivered the cup.

After a short interval—the Bishop having returned, with the Rev. Mr. Brown, to Michigan City—Evening Prayer was said by the Rector, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. B. Halsted, who also preached.

This is now the second consecrated church in Northern Indiana, (that at Mishawaka being the first,) and the Rev. Mr. Manney the only instituted Rector in the Diocese. The Bishop presented encouraging intelligence from other parts of the Diocese. There are now four churches nearly completed, and which will, D. V., be ready for consecration this spring or during the approaching summer.—Ibid.

Tennessee.—THE BISHOP OF TENNESSEE, Divine Providence permitting, expects to be engaged in a visitation of the churches of the Western district of Tennessee, from the 2d Sunday in April, to 2d Wednesday in May, when the Convention meets.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Enoch Bayley has been received into the diocese of Maryland by letters dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Delaware. P. O. East Newmarket, Dorchester county.

The Rev. Alexander J. Berger has also been received by letters dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Virginia.

The Rev. John J. Kerr has resigned the Rectorship of the Church of the Advent, Philadelphia, and the Rev. Samuel A. Clark, of Plymouth, Mass., has been elected by the Vestry as his successor.

The Rev. W. H. Trapnell has been invited to take charge of St. John's Church, Concord, Delaware county.

The Rev. Samuel T. Carpenter is engaged in Missionary labors at Spring Grove, and adjoining districts in Lancaster county.

Rev. Levi Bull has resigned the charge of St. Mary's, Warwick Township, and accepted a call to Bangor church, Churchtown, which he will supply in connection with St. Thomas', Morgantown.

The Rev. Enos Woodward has resigned the Rectorship of St. Mark's Church, Honey Brook, and accepted a call from St. Mark's, Warwick Township, uniting it to his charge of St. Andrew's, West Vincent.

The Rev. James A. Woodward has received and accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. Mark's, Honey Brook, Chester county.

Dear mother said Caroline, "it is not necessary for Christ-to be sad half their lives, in order to live rightly the rest.

e made you more so. I am sure religion ought to make peocheerful; it gives the young such a prejudice against it to such repulsive faces. I am not speaking of you mother;
I am sure you are one of my strongest arguments in favour iety."

How little do you know, my dear child, of the human heart!
gree with you that it is wrong, at any season, to wear a fording aspect. The Christian's cheerful hope should banish traces of gloom and unhappiness. But a devout frame of nd is the happiest we can maintain. I was once as gay as are, and as thoughtless. I considered all who endeavoured check my exuberant spirits as the enemies of true enjoyment.
s strange that I could deem myself a Christian, and declare I expected little happiness in this world; for, with these rds on my lips, I was examining every source of worldly asure, and my first thought, each morning, was of the trifling s that each day would offer me.

I married with little reflection, and without a single fear
I should not be able to discharge the manifold duties on which was entering. Out of respect to my husband, I now tried to bear more sedate, but often gave way to fits of senseless mirth.

levity, the other marked by awful inconsistency. But the nt of my life drew near. Could I have seen its approach how ould have shrunk back! Yet I now see in that period the nd of mercy more clearly than in all the rest. The death of first-born was the commencement of many trials. I was eved beyond measure, and surprised to find that this was not cene of constant enjoyment. I regarded myself as the object the Creator's peculiar severity, and murmured at what I conered a most unjust dispensation. The tempter had tried to

JOHN, I. 9.

Behold the day is come for the solemn, devout, and grateful memoriation of which I have been endeavouring, my brethn, to prepare your minds and my own.

With what various emotions, with what mingled feelings, th what conflicting sentiments, does the true Christian emplate the awful, the tremendous fact of his religion! On e one hand, our tenderest sympathies are excited for sufferings hout a parallel; on the other, our most lively gratitude is akened for mercies ineffable, inconceivable, and undeserved.
e laud, and magnify, and praise for evermore the glorious me of the Lord God of Hosts, when we reflect, that the sernt's head has been crushed; we afflict our souls, and bow wn our hearts, when we reflect how severely the heel of the man's seed was bruised. We tremble when we think of e everlasting dangers to which we were exposed: but we ry with exceeding great joy in the strength of that salvation which we have been rescued.

This is, indeed, both a time to weep and a time to rejoice; time to break down and a time to build up. It is a day of mentation, and mourning, and woe, and yet a day of deliver-ce; it is a day stained by darkness and the shadow of death, t a day when the darkness becomes as the noon-tide, and ath is deprived of its sting, (Isaiah, lviii. 10.) It is a day of ngeance and a day of redemption; of vengeance against sin, redemption to the humble and contrite sinner.

We are now, my fellow-Christians, to behold our Saviour en from prison and from judgment and stricken for the transession of his people, (Isaiah, liii. 8.) Behold him, like Isaac en he bare the wood for his sacrifice, bending beneath the ight of his cross; behold him forced along the dolorous way, idst the insults of the populace, the sarcastic invectives of e Pharisees, and the ribaldry of the soldiers; behold him, ling up the height of Calvary; behold him, weak, exhausted, d sinking beneath the burden, till Simon of Cyrene is comelled to ease him of a portion of the load.

When they were come to the place of execution, the blinded rsecutors, whose tender mercies were cruel, and who had eu heaping their insults on his precious head, (Matt. xxvii.

free. 34. Mark, xv. 23,) instead of the medicated cup, which usually given to the condemned to support them in their for my and to mitigate their sufferings, offered him vinegar the igled with gall; and when he tasted thereof, he would not ak. Nor when others, less cruel, presented him with the ustomed potion of wine mingled with myrrh, did he reve it. He sought not to alleviate his pangs by its stupifying Acts, for he was prepared to endure the penalty which he straught fit to pay for a guilty world, in its full, awful, and now mitigated rigour.

macVe might almost describe what remains to be told by adopt-Wi the language of the twenty-second psalm, and of the fifty-hav d chapter of Isaiah; passages which the Jews themselves on rpreted as referring to the Messiah, but which, by a fatal judicial blindness, they could not, or would not, apply to of ticeas of the suffering Jesus. We have seen how, like the nowing bulls of Bashan, they beset him; and how they gaped pious him with their mouths, as it had been a ravening and roar-one lion, (Psalm, xxii. 12, 13.) And now dogs compassed him, have assembly of the wicked enclosed him, they pierced his hands and vatic. The cross was stretched upon the ground; the precious Nim was distended thereon. The Roman soldiers, two on no d side, (dogs, as the Gentiles were styled by the Jews,)
The e four large nails through his hands and feet, and rivetted curra in the wood. Then was the cross elevated. It is scarcely charable to repress our indignant feelings, as we see the tortortors, reckless of the sufferer's pangs, regardless of the con-Romve shock it would occasion to his whole frame, carelessly vealed the now erected cross into the cavity dug for its recepwhen. And whose is the heart that does not burn within him fact he hears his Saviour meekly, mercifully exclaim, Father, whipe them, for they know not what they do? No indignation to us his breast, no angry passion disturbed his serenity, no subject tortures, no mental anguish could induce him to forget could Father's work or the welfare of others. While he was wasing out his soul unto death and making it an offering for sin, converlooked not another part of his priestly office, and even was interceded for the transgressors, (Isaiah, liii. 10, 12.)

men t to proceed. Notwithstanding a remonstrance from the til th priests, Pontius Pilate, not unwilling, perhaps, to mortify pounpride and to expose their malice, persisted in his order undetin the superscription above the cross, on which it was or by to specify the crime of the person crucified, the blessed we y should be designated THE KING OF THE JEWS, (John, IX. 21.) Directed by providential circumstances operating than his own evil passions, he proclaimed the Lord Jesus to be none women and disciples who had met our blessed Lord as he was lead out of the city, took courage by degrees, and drew nearer and nearer to the cross, (John, xix. 25, 27;) at the foot of which, surrounded by her female relations and friends, the Virgin Mother of Jesus was standing, a sword now passing through her very soul. There, too, was the faithful son of Zebedee. He was still the affectionate, watchful, and devoted friend. From the dreadful eminence on which he was stretched, Jesus beheld them. The pangs of his body could not obliterate the sympathies of his heart, or the sensibilities of his nature.

As the son of Mary, and as the friend of John, he affords us a touching example of filial affection and devoted friendship; and and shews, that a due regard for the temporal comforts of those, whom, having loved upon earth, we are about to leave for a time, is no profanation of the bed of death. He said unto his mother, Woman, behold thy Son. Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy Mother. How tenderly do these simple words speak to the heart! how sublime their effect! And who does not thank the disciple whom Jesus loved for adding, And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own house.

When the sixth hour, or noon, was come, and the Lamb of God had been hanging three hours on the cross, there was darkness over all the earth until the ninth hour, (Mark, xv. 33.
Luke, xxiii. 34.) And, at the ninth hour, Jesus cried with a loud voice, my God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? (Matt. xxvii. 46. Mark, xv. 34.)

By this loud and bitter cry, he may have intended, in the first place, to convince us that his sufferings were real, and not, as certain heretics in after-times imagined, only in appearance.—
The words imply, not that he was actually forsaken by God, but that he did himself experience pangs like those which the guilty feel, when, in their last hour, they are deprived of all spiritual support and ghostly comfort. And in the next place, he may have wished to solace his disciples, and to confirm their faith, by referring them to that twenty-second Psalm, in which was almost literally foretold what was now taking place. That the words were not only an ejaculation, expressive of the exquisiteness of his tortures, and the truth of his sufferings, but that they also contained a reference to prophecy, appears from his having quoted them, at first, almost in the very words of the Hebrew. But, when some of the by-standers, to whom that language was not familiar, imagined that he was calling for Elias. (that Elias, whose office they believed it was, to comfort the distressed, and to succour the dying,) he repeated them distinctly in the Syro-Chaldaic, or the dialect which was usually spoken in Judea. But still, the heart of this people was fat, they could not see with their eyes, nor hear with their ears, nor understand with their hearts, (Isaiah, vi. 10.) Yet, once more, therefore, though his mouth was now parched with death, and his articulation difficult, he attempted to awaken in them a spiritual discernment of the prophetic character of his ignominious death and cruel sufferings. In the same Psalm there is another passage predictive of the violent death of the Messiah; a death which ever causes the tongue to cleave to the jaws, and the strength to dry up like a pot-herb, (Psalm, xxii. 15.) He exclaimed, therefore, I thirst, (John, xix. 28.) Thus, to the last moment, was he about his Father's business, and labouring for the salvation of souls.

Taking his words literally, they again fulfilled a prophecy, for they gave him gall for his meat, and, in his thirst, they gave him vinegar to drink, (Psalm lxxix. 21.) Some of them having placed upon a reed a sponge dipped in vinegar, put it to his mouth, (Matt, xxvii. 48, 49;) while others, obdurate in spite of all they had witnessed, said, Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to take him down. (Mark, xv. 36.)

When Jesus had received the vinegar, (too weak perhaps, to repel the sponge when pressed against his lips,) he gave up the hopes of making any further impression on their minds, and said, It is finished. (John, xix. 30.)

Yes, the prophecies are fulfilled; the sacrifice is offered; the work of redemption is achieved: it is finished; the atonement has been made; eternal justice is satisfied; God is reconciled to man. It is finished: the kingdom of Satan is subdued; the dominion of grace is established; the conqueror is conquered; the strong one is bound; death is deprived of its sting, the grave of its victory; life and immortality are brought to light.

But the words of Scripture are still upon his lips. (Psalm, xxxi. 5;) words, which remind us of his own declaration: No man taketh my life from me. I have power to lay it down; and I have power to take it again, (John, x. 18.) For, He cried again with a loud voice, and said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit, (Luke, xxiii. 46;) and having thus said, he bowed his head, he dismissed his spirit: he gave up the ghost—he expired! (John xix. 30.)

And is this the passing of a merely human spirit? Is this the dissolution of a mere child of clay? Is this such a deed as is done every day, and hour, and minute? Is this a mere son of Adam who has gone to his rest? If it be so, wherefore these wonders in the heaven above, and these signs in the earth beneath? Wherefore is the veil of God's own Temple riven in twain? Wherefore hath the sun withdrawn his shining? Wherefore doth the earth quake? Wherefore are the rocks rent? Wherefore are the graves opened? Wherefore are the sympathies of all nature thus awakened and aroused?—A voice is heard from the foot of the cross, and it exclaims, Truly this was the Son of God, (Matt. xxvii. 34.)

What thoughts, my brethren, what feelings, what emotions, does the event which we thus solemnise, kindle, and inflame, in the Christian breast! Whether we reflect on the moral or religious influence of the event recorded; whether we consider it, in its effects upon our well-being in this life, or upon our everlasting happiness in the world to come, . . . where, where can we find so comprehensive, so vast, so grand, so complex, and yet so simple an idea of the power, the majesty, and the mercy of God? An event on which the happiness of man, of every man that ever existed in any past, or shall exist in any future age, revolves; by which millions of millions of souls are rescued from the malediction which lay upon them, and have obtained, not only redemption from the malediction, but a free grant from an almighty, and all-merciful God, of an eternity of bliss; an event, from which we derive all of hope that can render life in its darker passages, endurable; all the light which illumines the mind through the vale of tears; which gives to virtue the stamp of faith, and to faith the ante-past of heaven!

And now, my brethren, suppose that we had lived at the period which we have been considering; suppose that we had been witnesses of the sufferings of our Saviour, had seen him torn from his friends, forsaken by all whom he had benefited, delivered into the hands of his enemies, vilified and traduced by suborned evidence, and convicted, though immaculate; suppose we had seen his head crowned with thorns, his eyes suffused with tears, his face defiled with spitting, his back furrowed with the scourge, his hands and his feet pierced, his body broken, and his blood shed; suppose we had seen him thus dragged to an ignominious death, and tortured on the cross! If, amidst all this, we had heard him pray for those who persecuted him; and intercede with his Almighty Father for those who were augmenting the torments which a perverted and venal law had decreed upon him; . . . if, I say, we had beheld these things, and had known the purpose and extent of the great sacrifice, in addition to the actual view which our common feelings must necessarily have taken of it, what would have been our sensa-

"Well I don't believe I ever shall like such a dreary time. I perfectly dread it, and have not enjoyed myself a moment since its commencement. It seems so unnatural, too, at this bright season, for every body to be trying to make themselves miserable. It is really unthankful, and of no kind of use."

"Do not speak so irreverently, Caroline. The Church does require us to be gloomy, but only recommends such a degree of abstinence and seriousness as is most profitable. She does not forbid the full enjoyment of the beauties of nature, nor the young heart to cast aside the bright hopes which blossom in the spring. You will not, perhaps, understand, till you have passed through the Lent of life, the utility of this institution, not only as a memento of Christ's sufferings, but a preparation for our own."

"The Lent of life mother? Pray, what is that? Something disagreeable, I should judge, from the name."

"You speak too lightly of such things my child.—I mean by term those afflictions and trials which prepare many to be crucified with Christ, and rise with him to newness of life. By earnest meditation and prayer, at the time which the Church particularly sets aside for humiliation and repentance, you may be brought to a state of mind which will render unnecessary the severe trials required for my salvation. But God sustaineth me under his rod. When I had learned to trust not in myself, but in every word which proceedeth from his mouth, and could triumph over the allurements of sin and Satan, then the tempter, and faith and hope, like angels, ministered to my fainting soul."

The Christian's cheerful hope should banish all traces of gloom and unhappiness. But a devout frame of mind is the happiest we can maintain. I was once as gay as you are, and as thoughtless. I regarded myself as the object of the Creator's peculiar severity, and murmured at what I considered a most unjust dispensation. The tempter had tried to persuade me to obtain sustenance from that which was not bread. I did not follow my Saviour's example, and rebuke him; for I did not follow to live by every word which proceedeth from the mouth of God. The love that had been bestowed upon my little William now centered in you, my dear Caroline; and I most idolized my husband. With no solid basis for happiness I deemed that my troubles were past. We became ambitious of being distinguished in the world, and soon had our wish. But we worshipped Satan before he gave us the distinction we desired. For he who, instead of striving to obtain an incorruptible crown, makes the vanities of this world the object of all his exertions, does homage to the evil one. The seriousness which my first affliction left on our minds vanished, and we did not even love to speak of our departed child, lest those feelings should be revived. Again we were thoughtless, and forgetful of God. At now another heavy stroke fell upon us.—Our wealth was taken away, and we were reduced to comparative poverty. How wickedly I murmured at the change! My heart grew yet more sore; and, as if in defiance of the Almighty, I determined to look to my husband and child only for happiness. I braced myself with cold philosophy to endure all things, and thought nothing could again make me so miserable.—My stoicism vanished beside the death-bed of your father. There, for the first time, tried, with deep humility of spirit, 'Thy will be done.' Immediately oil was poured into my wounded heart; for the Holy Spirit most had at last prevailed. A heavenly calm succeeded then the fearful commotion which had raged in my breast, and I looked at your helplessness with perfect faith that God would provide for you. The temptation was past, and I was ready to do my Father's will. I compared what I had suffered with the trying agony of my Saviour, and was humbled to the dust. But I sought to be sprinkled with his blood, and was healed from all my sins. Through his merits I trust my former wanderings will be forgiven. Yet memory will recall, at this season, the husband whom I so much idolized, and of course it renders it a period of uncommon sadness. And I often think, too, of the sweet bud, which was not allowed to blossom on earth. You must forgive me, my dear Caroline, if my gloom has made religion distasteful to you, for I assure you it is the only source I know of unalloyed happiness."

"Dear mother," said Caroline, affectionately, "I see how wrong I have been in speaking so lightly of such things. I must indeed think too highly of the pleasures of this world, if the idea is so painful of renouncing them even for a few weeks. Those who are so thoughtless as I am certainly need such reasons more than others; for, while all promises them happiness in this world, they neglect preparation for another. I will try and spend the few weeks which remain of Lent more properly. Forgive me," she added, "that I have forced you to speak of subjects which I know are so trying to your feelings."

Caroline kept her word. She was constant in her attendance on the services of the Church, and gave up many of those occupations which had been before her chief enjoyment. The effect was what might have been anticipated. She was not more irreligious or hard-hearted than most young persons, and had only that aversion to serious things which is natural to an unconverted heart. Her mother's sorrowful confession had deeply impressed a susceptible but impulsive mind. Before Easter arrived, she determined never again to seek her happiness from the world. Attending the deeply moving services of Passion Week, Caroline wondered that she could have ever passed through its solemnities without being arrested in her giddy career. On Good Friday she knelt at the foot of the cross and prayed for forgiveness through the Saviour's blood.

In after life Caroline suffered many afflictions, but they were free from the bitterness which accompanied the trials of her mother. She met them all with a chastened and resigned spirit, for her hopes were anchored above. She had so well improved the Lent of the year that it was the Lent of her life.

Pope Pius IX.

Among the strange things of the present day there is nothing stranger than the resolution of the Pope, of which there seems now to be very little doubt, to declare the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin an article of the faith. With the doctrine itself or the inferences which may be and have been drawn from it, or the effects the change may produce on the doctrines of the Church of Rome, we do not intend to meddle, our business is with the change itself. The doctrine of the immaculate conception then, whatever that may be, is now, in the estimation of Romanists, a pious opinion, which a pious man may properly hold but which it is not necessary for any one to hold in order to his salvation; but after the Pope shall have declared it an article of faith, it will be necessary to the salvation of every human being that he or she should believe it.

Now the doctrine is at this moment true or it is false; and no change can by any possibility take place in that particular. The conception of the Blessed Virgin is an event which occurred more than eighteen centuries ago, and whatever was its character then must be its character forever. What is past cannot be recalled. But was it revealed. We suppose that every Romanist will agree, that to say the least, it was not clearly revealed, or it would never have been lawful, as it certainly was when the last accounts came from Rome, to deny it. It is a fact which could only be known from Revelation. The taint which we inherit from our first ancestor, is itself only known to us through Revelation. Plato and Cicero knew nothing on the subject. The exemption of the Blessed Virgin, if it existed, could only be known from the same source. If it were revealed it was or was not an article of faith! if it was not, it was on account of some peculiar circumstance connected with it. What was that circumstance and how has it been changed?

The answer may be that it was revealed so obscurely that men were excusable in not understanding the Revelation, until the Church expounded it. Why, then, did not St. Peter expound it? Because it was not yet expedient that it should be understood? But how did he know that; by his own judgment or by Revelation? If by the latter, when has that Revelation, we would speak it with reverence, been retracted? Has Pius IX. received a new Revelation? If he has not, how is he wiser than St. Peter, who lived under the influence of the Holy Spirit? But St. Peter acted upon his own judgment; that judgment had the concurrence of St. Paul and all the other Apostles; for none of them taught the doctrine as an article of faith. None of them taught it at all; but the veriest Romanist must admit that it was not taught in the Church as an article of faith; for that which is once of the faith, necessary to salvation, must remain so forever. When Pius IX. then issues his bull declaring the doctrine of the immaculate conception an article of the faith he virtually declares that St. Peter, and all the Apostles, and the whole Primitive Church, and all the General Councils, and all the popes who have preceded him, were either deceivers or deceived.

But the peculiar circumstances of this time have made this pious opinion an article of the faith? This is very hard to believe, and we suspect that nobody will exactly take that position. The doctrine is now nothing more than a pious opinion, simply because the Church has not pronounced upon it, by and by it will be an article of faith, because the Church, through her organ the Pope, will have so pronounced. The change is wrought, not by a change in the truth, which is impossible, or in the circumstances, which is not pretended, but in the evidence. It is the evidence of Pius IX. which changes a disputable opinion into an article of faith. The salvation of all mankind depends upon their believing or disbelieving the dictum of Pius IX. about a matter, of which he has no other means of knowledge than they have. Now if this is true of this doctrine, it is true of any other doctrine. Should Pius IX. or his successors choose to declare the supreme power of the pope in temporal matters an article of faith, there would be the same evidence in favor of that power, that there will be in favor of the doctrine of immaculate conception. It is not pretended that there is ancient evidence enough to constitute either an article of the faith. If one can be rendered necessary to salvation by the evidence of a modern pope, the other can. Now we do not suppose that any modern pope will make the supposed declaration of his temporal supremacy. But it is clear that if he did, it would be of value precisely equal to the declaration of Pius IX. in favor of the doctrine of the immaculate conception. What then is that value? On what is it founded? Is it on a Revelation vouchsafed to the reigning Pope? That we believe is not pretended. Is it on the guidance of the Holy Spirit leading the Pope into all truth? Gregory had as much of that as Pius. Is it on tradition? That passed through Gregory to Pius. We cannot see on what it can be founded.

But we know it is a very fearful power, and we should like to see the evidence of its existence. Some other evidence than the assertion of its possessor. And yet its very nature is to make that assertion the sole evidence of every thing. Thus is the very centre and root of Romanism, about, by the madness of its head, to be exposed in the midst of a "scoffing and perverse generation." What will be the consequences? We hope that one consequence may be that true Catholic Christians will see more clearly the advantages of their position and the enormous evils of Romanism.—Church Times.

Loss of Thirdly.—The Rev. Mr. —, minister of —, had the custom of writing the heads of his discourse on small slips of paper, which he placed on the Bible before him, to be used in succession. One day when he was explaining the second head, he got a little warm, and came down with such a thump upon the Bible with his hand, that the ensuing slip fell over the edge of the pulpit, though unperceived by himself. On reaching the end of the second head, he looked down for the third slip; but, alas! it was not to be found. "Thirdly," he cried, looking round with great anxiety. After a little pause, "Thirdly," again he exclaimed; but still no thirdly appeared. "Thirdly, I say, my brethren!" pursued the bewildered clergyman, but not another word could he utter. At this point, while the congregation were partly sympathizing with his distress, and partly rejoicing at such a decisive instance of the impropriety of using notes in preaching—which has always been an unpopular thing in the Scotch clergy—an old woman rose up and thus addressed the preacher: "If I'm not mistaken, sir, I saw Thirdly flee out at the east window, a quarter of an hour syne." It is impossible for any but a Scotchman to conceive how much this account of the loss of Thirdly was relied upon by that part of the congregation which condemned the use of notes.—Chambers' Scottish Book.

Selected for the Young.

Sir Henry Sydney to his son, Philip Sydney.

(AT SCHOOL AT SHEWSBURY IN 1556, THEN BEING OF THE AGE OF TWELVE YEARS.)

I have received two letters from you, one written in Latin, the other in French, which I take in good part, and will you exercise that practice of learning often; for that will stand you in most stead in that profession of life that you are born to live in. And, since this is my first letter that ever I did write to you, I will not that it be empty of some advices which my natural care of you provoketh me to wish you to follow, as documents to you in this your tender age. Let your first action be the lifting up of your mind to Almighty God by hearty prayer; and feelingly digest the words you speak in prayers, with continual meditation and thinking of Him to whom you pray, and of the matter for which you pray. And use this at an ordinary hour. Whereby the time itself will put you in remembrance to do that which you are accustomed to do in that time. Apply your study to such hours as your discreet master doth assign you, earnestly; and the time, I know, he will so limit as shall be both sufficient for your learning and safe for your health. And mark the sense and matter of what you read, as well as the words. So shall you both enrich your tongue with words, and your wit with matter; and judgment will grow as years groweth in you. Be humble and obedient to your master; for, unless you frame yourself to obey others, yea, and feel in yourself what obedience is, you shall never be able to teach others how to obey you. Be courteous of gesture and affable to all men, with diversity of reverence, according to the dignity of the person. There is no thing that winneth so much with so little cost. Use moderate diet so as, after your meat, you may find your wit fresher and not duller, and your body more lively, and not more heavy. . . . Use, exercise of body, but such, as is without peril of your joints or bones. It will increase your force, and enlarge your breath. Delight to be cleanly, as well in all parts of your body as in your garments. It shall make you grateful in each company; and otherwise loathsome. Give yourself to be merry; for you degenerate from your father, if you find not yourself most able in wit and body to do anything when you be most merry; but let your mirth be ever void of all scurrility and biting words to any man; for a wound given by a word is oftentimes harder to be cured than that which is given with the sword. Be you rather a hearer and bearer away of other men's talk, than a beginner or procurer of speech; otherwise you shall be counted to delight to hear yourself speak. If you hear a wise sentence, or an apt phrase, commit it to your memory with respect to the circumstance when you shall speak it. Let never oath be heard to come out of your mouth, nor word of ribaldry; detest it in others, so shall custom make to yourself a law against it in yourself. Be modest in each assembly; and rather be rebuked of light fellows for maiden-like shamefulness, than of your sad friends for pert boldness. Think upon every word that you will speak, before you utter it; and remember how nature hath rampired up, as it were, the tongue with teeth, lips, yea, and hair without the lips, and all betokening reins or bridges for the loose use of that member. Above all things let no untruth escape, no, not in trifles. The custom of it is naughty; and let it not satisfy you that for a time the hearers take it for a truth, for after it will be known as it is, to your shame; for there cannot be a greater reproach to a gentleman than to be accounted a liar. Study and endeavour yourself to be virtuously occupied. So shall you make such an habit of well-doing in you, that you shall not know how to do evil, though you would. Remember, my son, the noble blood you are descended of, on your mother's side; and think that only by virtuous life and good action you may be an ornament to that illustrious family; and otherwise, through vice and sloth, you shall be counted labes generis—one of the greatest curses that can happen to man. Well, my little Philip, this is enough for me, and too much, I fear for you. But, if I find that this light meal of digestion nourish any thing the weak stomach of your young capacity, I will, as I find the same grow stronger, feed it with tougher food.—Your loving father, so long as you live in the fear of God. To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year. Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 89 South Fifth Street, Philadelphia.

GO FRIDAY, EASTER-EVEN, EASTER-DAY.—What solemn thoughts and glorious hopes do these three names call up in the believing mind! Death. Burial, Life Eternal! The Ever-living submitting to mortality, the Lord of life descending to the grave, the Conqueror of death bursting from the sealed sepulchre, and from this desolate place springing forth as the "first fruits" of a glorious harvest of Life and Immortality!

The selections in another portion of our paper will, we trust, afford appropriate matter for thought, and secure the interest and attention of our readers. We make no apology for introducing the familiar words of Keble, though we ask our readers' pardon for giving only a portion of his noble verses on each day. The extracts from Dr. Hook's admirable lectures on "the Last Days of our Lord's Ministry" will, we are sure, be acceptable and profitable. This should be made a more general book for the Holy Week. No better can be found. Simple, concise and clear, as all the writings of Dr. Hook are, it abounds with profitable instructions, just reflections, and sound learning. The notes are peculiarly valuable.

The extract from "Melville" is stirring and animating like all his discourses. With all his faults of style we must confess few sermons have more effect upon the mind than those of this distinguished writer. If the mind is dull and torpid, take up one of these discourses and read it aloud, and if that does not arouse you, then, reader, you had better retire! Let none however attempt imitation of his style. For what may sound very well in Melville will be very different in a second-hand copyist. These extracts will, we hope, serve to impress the great facts, which now claim our thoughts, more deeply upon the mind and heart; and excite right feeling as well as proper thought concerning our suffering, glorified Saviour, quickening our faith in that profession of the Creed which teaches us to say of Him: HE SUFFERED AND WAS BURIED: AND THE THIRD DAY HE ROSE AGAIN ACCORDING TO THE SCRIPTURES.

After our selections were in print we received the following piece, which if our readers peruse with the pleasure it has afforded us, they will unite with us in thanking our unknown correspondent.

We hope that this may be only the first of many like favors.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The Evening before Good-Friday.

The evening sun has gone to rest,
While all along the glowing west
Are spread around him gloriously
Bright clouds of purple and of gold,
Shewinah of God's Church of old,
The brightness of His Majesty—

But ne'er again on Aaron's rite,
Shall beam that mystic presence bright,
The glory of the Deity,
For, e'er that sun shall sink again
The Temple's vail shall rend in twain,
The end of Jewish mystery.

Silent and hush'd is all around;
Not e'en the breeze sends forth a sound
As on it hies so peacefully;
Softly it stoops to kiss the flood,
Or breathe upon the opening bud
Then dies away all silently.

The Paschal moon, with thoughtful eye,
From out yon blue and quiet sky,
Is looking down as pensively
As on this eve, long years ago,

With mournful look she gazed upon
The Garden of Gethsemane,

Where knelt apart in fervent prayer,
With none to soothe or comfort there
With tenderness or sympathy,
'The Man of sorrows' sore distressed,
With sins of countless souls oppressed,
The Saviour in His agony.

Alone to pass through that dark hour,
Alone to strive with Satan's power,
Hard struggling for the victory,
No kindred spirit o'er him bent,
Save one the Father kindly sent
To strengthen His humanity.

Oh! mystery surpassing thought;
The Eternal Son from Heaven brought
To earth in deep humility,
Enduring pangs man ne'er can know,
Succor'd by angels in His wo,
In their mysterious ministry.

Oh Jesu! Saviour crucified!
Keep me forever by Thy side
In safety and security
That when these scenes of earth are gone,
This feeble mortal may put on A glorious immortality.

Holy Week, A. D. 1848.

THE EPISCOPAL FEMALE TRACT SOCIETY.—We have received a communication with the signature "Omnibus Justitia," in reference to the article of "Sacerdos" criticising a Tract published by this most excellent and useful Society. Our unknown friend, the author, must excuse us for not inserting this communication, on the following grounds. We do not think it proper to interpose the venerable names of "the dead" as a shield against any attacks made upon "the living." Indeed we think there is manifest impropriety in connecting any names with an anonymous tract. We know nothing of the history of this tract, or even of its contents, beyond the information furnished by "Sacerdos," whose views of it are fully and explicitly endorsed in the article we decline.

The respected "Society," whose publication was the subject of criticism, has too strong a hold upon the affection and gratitude of the church to need any defence. The faithful and efficient services rendered to the Truth are its best testimonials. Surely an individual's criticism of one publication could not have the effect of diminishing the general confidence which this charitable Institution has secured and deserved. Such an effect was not the intention of "Sacerdos" according to his express declarations. Nor would the columns of the Banner be open for such an injurious use. But we must all be willing to tolerate free discussion. All who edit or publish either books, tracts, or newspapers, must submit to that ordeal which only reveals the purity of truth while it discovers the base alloy of error.

We have on a former occasion asserted our high estimation of the charitable labors of this excellent society, which as well as two other societies, sisters in usefulness and beneficence, are sustained by the ladies of our city! Their praise, we trust, is written where the censures of the world cannot impair it. The approval they seek is that of Him whose "judgments are true and righteous altogether." And surely the gracious smile of Heaven will beam on those who give their time and means and care to such blessed charities. A reference to another column will show that the Female Tract Society is not without substantial proofs of present regard. The Treasurer acknowledges the receipt of $100 from an Individual.

Foreign Items.

For the following we are indebted to "the Churchman."

In the House of Lords, in reply to some queries of Lord Stanley, upon the subject of the increase of the Episcopate, the Marquis of Landsdowne said, that the Government still entertained their intention of augmenting the number of bishoprics. In the course of the discussion which ensued, Lord Monteaigle deprecated any such increase, and eulogized the working clergy at the expense of the Bishops, who were warmly defended by the Bishop of Oxford.

It seems that the Stall in Durham Cathedral, vacant by the translation of Dr. Sumner to the Archbishopial See, is not to be filled.

The London University College has received from an unknown source, the munificent donation of £5000. The only condition of the gift is that it be called "The Andrewes Fund."

The receipts of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, during the year 1847, amounted to £85,068, 7s. 3d. Of this sum £40,253, 3s. 3d., belong to funds for new and special purposes.

The Rev. James O'Sullivan, late a Parish Priest of the Diocese of Kerry, and John Fitzgerald, Esq., with several other respectable persons, renounced the errors of popery on the 5th ult., in St. Thomas's Church, Dublin.

Lord Shrewsbury has despatched to Rome the Rev. Mr. Connelly,—formerly of the American Church, whose wife has retired to a nunnery,—to meet, by documentary evidence, the various statements and quibbles by which the fact of indifference, if not connivance at agrarian outrage, and 'landlordicide' on the part of certain Irish Popish dignitaries is sought to be palliated.

The Jesuits have been expelled from Naples, at the demand of the people.

It is stated in a letter from Rome, that proposals are now under consideration by the Pope, for abolishing the celibacy of the Clergy.

New Statutes for the Irish Provincial Colleges have been prepared, and are on their way to Rome. It is expected that these new Statutes will give the utmost satisfaction to the Pope; and a new rescript, practically at variance with the former, is looked for.

The following is from the Christian Witness:

A TOUCHING SCENE.—The foreign correspondent of the New York Commercial mentions having attended in St. Paul's Church, London, the anniversary meeting of the Charity children, remarking feelingly upon the humanizing beauty of such a spectacle. In that vast building, he says, some ten thousand children, male and female, from fifty parishes, were assembled, each parish divided off by a rail, and all the scholars dressed in the uniform of the school to which they belonged. The seats ranged to a great elevation, seventeen feet from the floor. On the ground floor, from the choir to the extreme end, the spectators were seated, the elevation of each seat being sufficient to afford all an opportunity of seeing.

The preparation for this festival within the Church required some weeks, during which there was no public service. A few minutes before 12 o'clock, the 'vicar choral' took his seat in a box elevated about forty feet from the floor. Here he could be seen by the organist and the choir, and by all the children. The choir of St. Paul's was assisted by that of Westminster Abbey, and when the choruses were sung by ten thousand voices, as one, it was one of the most delightful sounds that could fall upon the ear.

There were present at this interesting festival many high dignitaries, both of Church and state, and no person possessing a spark of philanthropy could have left the sanctuary without being gratified. We may well believe that these ten thousand children have been saved from vice and trained for Heaven through the means of Christian charity. When they shall have grown up to full maturity, each one of them will gladly acknowledge the blessing they shall have received, and they will be ready individually, to say to their benefactors in the words of Rowe:

'Think not, the good,
The gentle deeds of mercy thou hast done,
Shall die forgotten all; the poor, the prisoner,
The fatherless, the friendless, and the widow,
Who daily own the bounty of thy hand,
Shall cry to heaven, and pull a blessing on thee.'

We commend the following interesting article to the attention of all who feel interested in the growth of the Church, and the increase of our Holy Sanctuaries. The new House of Prayer to be consecrated on Easter Monday is in a situation where it was much needed, and where there is a wide field of usefulness. "We wish it good luck in the name of the Lord."

For the Banner of the Cross.

Church of the Messiah, Port Richmond.

We feel confident that the readers of your paper will be gratified in observing in another column a notice of the consecration of this church on Easter Monday.

When we reflect that on the 28th of June last, the corner stone of this edifice was laid by the Bishop of the Diocese, and that now, in a period of less than 9 months, it is ready for Consecration, and that too free from debt, we cannot but hope that this is an earnest of what will be accomplished by its instrumentality, and take courage for the future, believing that this Temple will resound with the faithful exhibition of the Gospel, and as the first offer of a risen Saviour will be here proclaimed on the Festival of our Lord's Resurrection, so, through all future time, this same Jesus will be here heralded as the King of Kings and Lord of Lords.

The efforts of the Vestry, which are worthy of all praise in this undertaking, have been crowned with complete success; and as we thank God for having blessed us in the commencement, so would we urge upon the friends of the Church to implore the Great Head of the Vineyard to continue to us the light of His countenance. We trust that in this Sanctuary, where, to the "Poor" the Gospel will be emphatically preached, and its Sacraments duly administered, many souls may be born again, and multitudes learn, that "the ways of religion are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths, are paths of peace."

Great ignorance as regards spiritual things prevails to an alarming extent throughout this district. The population being composed principally of foreigners, appear to have but little fear of God before their eyes; for absenting themselves upon the slightest pretext, from the worship of His Temple, have yet to be taught, that one day in the Courts of the Lord's House, is better than a thousand spent in pleasure and in sin. The building is in the old English style of Gothic Architecture, yet plain and substantial in all its parts, with due deference to strict economy, and will accommodate near 700 persons. The Sunday School affords ground for much encouragement, and is steadily increasing. Although the Church is represented as free from debt, there is still one object claiming demands upon those interested.

For this purpose a collection will be taken up on the day of Consecration, when we hope our friends will remember the exhortation of the Apostle "Let all things be done decently and in order." Allusion is here made to the paving around the building which, to a Church in this location, is absolutely necessary, and it is proposed that this shall be defrayed from the amount received on Easter Monday.

We would invite all those interested to be present upon this occasion, and as, upon the previous day, they will have commemorated, not only the love of a crucified Redeemer, but also a conquering Saviour, so at this time, they will evince their gratitude by repairing to this House of the Lord, and uniting in prayer that the blessing of God the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, may ever rest upon this Sanctuary of Prayer and Praise.

L.

ARGUMENT AGAINST PRELACY.—The following will show on what foundations arguments against the Church are often based. We copy it from "the Richmond Christian Advocate," one of the most respectable papers published by the Methodists. No such profanation ever occurred in Grace Church, nor is there the slightest foundation for the slander! The solemn rite of confirmation was administered by the Bishop of this Diocese on the day specified. The paper which first published the statement in this city has fully contradicted it on the best authority. It is to be hoped others will be equally honest.

What think you of the pious enthusiasm of Grace Church, New York, in engaging an Italian Opera company to chaunt the Marseillaise,—the song of the French Republic, as a part of its Sunday Morning Service! Well, it is a fact, or one of the city papers speaks falsely. Now there's a specimen of apostolic Order and Succession for you, my true friend. What misdeeds are sometimes committed under the name of religion!

SALE FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE CHURCH OF THE REDEMPTION.—We cheerfully comply with the request of those interested in this good work to call the attention of our readers to this charitable effort. A sale of Fancy Articles will be opened in the Chinese Museum on the 25th of April, and continue during the week. We have already expressed our deep sense of the importance of this missionary enterprise, and of its claims upon the sympathy and liberality of the members of the church. The faithful and indefatigable Missionary deserves this encouragement, while the spiritual destitution of the field in which he labors *demand*s it. The Church, and a very simple and beautiful one it is, now nearly completed, requires additional resources to finish it. Let not the blessed work be stayed, but let all who have the means gladly contribute to complete a new Temple for the praise and worship of the Almighty, a new Sanctuary wherein erring, sinful, dying man may be pointed to THE WAY AND THE TRUTH AND THE LIFE.

Articles for the above sale are to be sent to the Museum early on Tuesday morning, (25th inst.)

St. Mark's Church.

The corner-stone of St. Mark's Church will be laid by the Right Reverend Bishop Potter, on St. Mark's day (25th inst.) at 1 o'clock, P. M.

The Rev'd Clergy of the city have been invited to assemble at the residence on N. W. cor. of Schuylkill 7th and Locust sts., where all others who may be then in the city and would desire to unite in the service are invited to meet.

NEWSPAPER CHANGE.—"The Western Episcopalian" formerly published at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, has been translated to Gambier, and although somewhat diminished in size, has increased its title and become "The Western Episcopalian and Gambier Observer."

As the principles and views of every new paper are matter of general interest to the Church, we give the following extracts from the introductory address of the unknown Editors.

OUR PAPER.

"Is it to be a party paper? Will it be radical or conservative? moderate or violent? Circumstances lead us to conclude, that some readers of our first number may be disposed to ask these questions. Nothing would be easier than to answer them according to our own sense of these terms. But such words, as party, conservative, and radical, have become so vague and ambiguous, that were we to reply in simple negatives and affirmatives, we should be only mocking the querist by enveloping ourselves in one mist after another, instead of shedding light on our real position."

The following is "the light" shed upon this "real position," perhaps on account of the dulness of our vision, it is not a very clear light. Nor doth it "make manifest" a very certain opinion.

"Is ours to be a party paper?" If by this designation is meant a paper to be used in exciting contention and provoking alienation among brethren, who hold the fundamental doctrines of Protestantism, while they differ upon minor points:—we answer promptly, No. We deprecate such a spirit at all times, and especially at the present crisis." * * *

Again:—

"But further: if by the question—is this to be a party paper, is meant, will it advocate the cause of the Church as a mere party, intent on maintaining its party unity and its numerical strength, at all hazards; even if need be by tacitly compromising with doctrinal corruptions!—we can assure our readers, that we mean to edit no such paper."

The following exhibits a not very definite "position" towards "our non-Episcopal brethren."

"Party spirit is only one of the more expanded forms of human selfishness. Of course it belongs exclusively to no one denomination. And we have, unfortunately, daily proofs of this, in the disposition manifested by some of our non-Episcopal brethren, to magnify our present difficulties, and discourse discouragingly, respecting the probable destiny of our Church. Notes of real sympathy from evangelical christians of any name are not to be disdained. They are grateful and cheering. But when they speak of us in terms so deeply desponding as to indicate, that it would be well for us to give up our Church, as a doomed vessel, and take passage with them, we very promptly decline the offer. And if ever in our editorial course, we should manifest any of that party spirit, which we so decidedly condemn, it will most likely be, when provoked by such doleful lamentations over our hopeless condition. Nor will it be under the exaggerating influence of party feeling, but in the honest and sober conviction of our judgment, that we shall be disposed to invite such condoling brethren to come in with us and aid us in freeing from temporary embarrassments, the noblest, most scriptural, and most primitive ecclesiastical ship that sails in the broad stream of time! It is to the defection of a portion of her officers and crew, and not to any essential faults in her main structure, that we ascribe her present difficulties. But for her preservation and prosperity we look to a higher and purer source, than the spirit of party. And in seeking to promote her welfare by exposing errors within her limits, we shall not ask, what will other denominations think? or what may be thought by some of our own members? but what will the Lord think of us? and how will he deal with us? if we compromise his truth or tolerate by our silence, errors, destructive to souls bought with his blood."

The following exhibits a more decided position towards Episcopal brethren.

"But, finally: if by a party paper is meant one that will decidedly and earnestly advocate the views of evangelical churchmen, whether called high or low, in opposition to the errors of the Oxford school; this will certainly be a party paper. Individuals may object to the term party, as an offensive designation,—but if by that plain English word be meant a number of persons who sympathize and co-operate in promoting or opposing a certain set of opinions and principles, it would be a mere quibble about words to deny that there are at this time, two great parties in the Church,—the one composed of those who unite with the Evangelical Knowledge Society; or if they do not actually join in it, sympathize with the principles which it has put forth;—the other, of such as more or less openly advocate Tractarian errors, with a large number of ultra-churchmen or undefinables, who, while they do not professedly adopt the Oxford novelties, are nevertheless determined that they shall be tolerated; and to that end coalesce with Tractarians in a party, which generally acts as a unit. Now, in this view of the real state of parties, we certainly expect to publish a party paper; and at this point we expect to be both conservative and radical.—Conservative in our efforts to defend and preserve the Church: and radical in our exertions to uproot all erroneous and strange doctrines. And although we do not wish to be violent, we expect to be often 'earnest' in contending 'for the faith.'"

We must leave to our readers the task of reconciling these various beams of light which this new Journal sheds upon its "real position."

It will be seen from the following that although "the Western Episcopalian" differs from the Bishop of New Jersey "in relation to church matters," it agrees with him in relation to the study of Greek and Latin!

"The following excellent remarks are from the pen of the President of Burlington College. There are views in relation to Church matters, in which we might differ from that Rt. Rev. Prelate. But, in the following, we most fully coincide, and adopt them, for ourselves in reference to Kenyon College.

Δ.

"We hold the study of the ancient languages of Greece and Rome essential to the height, exactitude, and fullness of the real scholar," &c. &c. &c.

We conclude with the following item.

"Our last number contained, as our readers will remember, the valedictory of the former editor, and the prospectus of the present volume, the first number of which we issue to-day. The Episcopal Recorder in noticing the editor's retirement, without any reference to the proposed transfer of the paper to Gambier, kindly offers to become the official organ of the Diocese of Ohio; and to supply our subscribers with as many copies of the Recorder as may be needed. We remember that a similar proposition was made by the same paper, when about two years ago, the Episcopalian was removed to Mount Vernon. For these repeated offers we feel bound to make suitable acknowledgements.—And yet, notwithstanding the somewhat fearful risk of failure, to which, according to the intimation of the Recorder, we are exposed from our want of experience in matters of this sort; we must respectfully decline its obliging offer."

To CORRESPONDENTS.—A second notice of the Consecration at Glassborough, which came after the excellent one from "B," will also appear. It is too good to be lost.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Died, March 20th, in Seaford, Del., EDWARD W. Taylor, M. D., in the twenty-fifth year of his age.

The deceased was a son of George Taylor, Esq., of Washington, D. C. Several years since he settled in this place to follow his profession, and met with good success. As a physician and a gentleman he stood high in the estimation of the community, and gathered around him many devoted friends. His mind was far above mediocrity, and was well stored with scientific and other knowledge. He leaves behind him a widow and only son to mourn, with his numerous friends, their early and irreparable loss. He died as the righteous dieth, and was "gathered to his fathers, having the testimony of a good conscience; in the communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, and in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope." Renouncing all merit in himself, he relied solely on the blessed Saviour for salvation. After a slow and lingering illness, which he bore with Christian patience and fortitude, he sweetly fell asleep in Jesus, thus teaching us that we "should not sorrow as those without hope."

For the Banner of the Cross.

To the Parishioners of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia.

In calling your attention to the proposal which was submitted to your notice in the last number of the Banner of the Cross, it is not my purpose to enter the lists with the much respected gentleman who has assumed the signature of B.; I only desire to congratulate our congregation, that this innovation is proposed boldly, and can therefore be met and summarily disposed of. And my main purpose is to ask you at once to bring this question to an issue. Let it be decided forthwith. Let it not be lulled temporarily to rest, to be revived periodically, disturbing your peace and awakening dreadful anticipations of a Gothic invasion.

"Would you tear down St. Peter's Church?" is the brief and simple question proposed to you. Let your answer be, indignantly, promptly and sternly, No. And indeed, it needed no seer to tell us that eyes would flash and bosoms throb quicker at so shocking a proposal. And let not your confidence be won too easily, when he who brings forward this scheme, tells you that he shares in your deep attachment to those venerated courts. Demand the proofs of that attachment, and you will not find it I think in the tone of the article to which I allude. Why, the very stones of those sacred aisles seemed yesterday to start from their repose, and cry imploringly to the galleries to save them from such friendship.

The reasons for wishing to rebuild St. Peter's, may be briefly touched upon. Be it remembered that I pretend not fully to discuss them.

I. The present building is thought unworthy of Him who is worshipped there—of the truths taught, and of those who worship there. We are told too, that the rules of Church architecture are grievously violated.

Let it be conceded that no great taste was exhibited by your forefathers in planning our church. Is it therefore to be esteemed unworthy of Him, in whose eyes, we were yesterday told, nothing is mean which is offered Him with a right heart. This edifice was the offering of your ancestors, and we may fervently trust that Almighty God has not deemed it unworthy but that "Thousands were born for glory there."

That any place on earth is unworthy of the truths of our blessed religion, I think, needs no answer; but that your much loved St. Peter's is unworthy of the congregation who worship there, seems to me a doctrine fraught full of pride and presumption. It goes to keeping up the unhappy delusion which exists in men's minds, that the rich need more gorgeous places of prayer than the poor—nay, it goes to confirm the idea, which has already been so fatal to the spread of our branch of the Church, viz., that the Protestant Episcopal Church is better adapted to the wants of the high than the low. Oh! let us not give substance and color to this idea, and so hinder the increase of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Now, 'Church Architecture,' so called—what is it? I say, a thing of mere fancy. All analogy drawn from the ancient Jewish Temple is fallacious, and cannot be maintained by sound argument on Gospel principles. To refute sophistry on this point would be tedious and I think unnecessary. The New Testament is full of texts which show that the temple which corresponds under the new dispensation, to that magnificent structure under the old, is in the hearts of all true believers. The many edifices which we rear for the worship of God—now so clearly made known to us—are not analogous to the one only temple of ancient days, the witness to the world of a God unknown to the nations around.

That good taste should govern us in building houses of prayer, no one disputes; but that a true, a healthy christian taste is now possessing the world, some of us may be permitted to doubt. Nay, I say there is great danger in admitting that our Church undervalues no external agency of power to reach the heart or reason through the senses. This would lead us backward in the stream of time, insensibly perhaps, but I think surely, to all the dispelled illusions of darker ages. The consequences might not prove momentous in our day; but let us not encumber the faith of our children with rubbish which was swept away forever by the great Reformation.

II. The internal arrangements of St. Peter's are at length discovered to be faulty.

That drowsiness should prevail in the galleries, I really do not think has yet been accounted for on the sound principles of Free-will Offerings.

MR. EDITOR:

I hope you will not consider me obtrusive in sending you a few of the desultory thoughts that occurred to my mind in reading the Psalter for the 23d day of the month. There are no portions of Holy Writ upon which I meditate with more delight than the predictions in regard to the reign of the Messiah, in which His Divine and human nature, His character and attributes, His dignity, His humiliation and exaltation are so vividly portrayed, and so accurately described, that they appear more like historical records than prophecies. Some preachers are censured for diverting the minds of their congregations from a consideration of their daily duties, from self-examination, the purification of their hearts, and the rectification of their tempers, by their dissertations upon the unfulfilled prophecies. The 110th Psalm contains an unfulfilled prophecy to which every clergyman may profitably direct and rivet the attention of his audience; as it is in the power of every member of the Church to contribute, in some way, to the fulfilment of this prophecy, which is contained in the 3d verse, viz: "In the day of thy power, shall the people offer thee free-will offerings with an holy worship." All those who are engaged in providing funds for missionaries, or the erection of Churches, &c. &c., will bear their testimony that this is an unfulfilled prophecy. The petitions for contributions are considered onerous ecclesiastical exactions, and the collectors regarded with the same invidious eye as the civil tax gatherers. Many who call themselves God's people, do not prove their right to the title, by presenting free-will offerings; and until they do, they need not deceive themselves by thinking their exercises in the sanctuary are an holy or acceptable worship. The mystery which invests the character of Melchizedec always excited a peculiar interest in my mind, which prevented me from being wearied with the interminable conjectures and discussions to which I have listened, in regard to his genealogy and priesthood. Those who profess to belong to the Church militant, may imitate his hospitality in bringing bread and wine to refresh Abraham and his followers, after the battle, by providing for the wants of the missionaries who are engaged in the warfare against our spiritual enemies, the world, the flesh, and the devil. The father of the faithful voluntarily offered a tythe of the spoil to the Priest of the Most High God. "This was a custom among many nations long before the law of tythes was given to the Israelites." Will Christians allow themselves to be surpassed by Jews and Heathens, in this respect?

I am one of those who anxiously watch the "signs of the times," and anticipate a rich harvest of free-will offerings, from those who are engaged in holy worship in our Churches, during this solemn season of Lent. I hope all those who enjoy the inestimable privilege of attending divine service, will exert all their energies to provide the means of similar pleasure and improvement to others. It is impossible to unite, without formality and hypocrisy, in many parts of our service, which breathe a missionary spirit, if we remain inert? How dare we mock God by offering the petitions, "hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come," and make no exertions, and practise no self-denial, to send forth heralds to proclaim the glad tidings of the Gospel, and to extend the kingdom of Christ? It will avail nothing for people to assume mock-humility, and plead their insignificance as an apology for doing nothing. It is incalculable what an extensive influence may be exerted by one humble zealous Christian. Clergymen should arouse their hearers to a sense of their responsibility, and the same Almighty power which "turned the hard rock into a standing water, and the flint stone into a springing well," can soften the most indurated hearts, so that streams of benevolence will gush forth to fertilize our spiritual deserts, which will "blossom like a rose," and thus accomplish another unfulfilled prophecy. How depressing it is to read of the senseless worship offered to their idols by the blind heathen, Psalm 115; but may we not equally mourn over the virtual, but unsuspected idolatry of professing Christians who hug and worship their gold, and will not part with their luxuries to save the souls of their perishing fellow creatures?

I shall never forget the satirical tone and sarcastic manner of Bishop White when he assumed the language of the profane in their ridicule of regular attendants at Church, who disgrace their profession by their inconsistencies. He remarked that they could not be surprised if the irreligious laughed at them and said Ah! those are the Church-going people! I hope Episcopalians will wipe off this stigma, and adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things; and that evidences of their zeal may soon appear in the completion of the Church of St. James the Less, which has already effected so much through its schools; that the voice of thanksgiving may soon ascend from the Church of the Redemption; that Calvary Church, and the Floating Chapel may give a spiritual aspect to the shores of the Delaware; that sailors who have heard the wonders of redemption, may assist the missionaries in converting the nations by their Christian walk among the heathen. I hope the societies already established by the Church, may be adequately supported. These PALPABLE arguments will convince others that we belong to the true Church, more than ponderous tomes of controversy. These proofs of orthodoxy and vital piety, if united to courteous and conciliating manners, will satisfy me. I do not feel authorized to unchurch other denominations, but cannot conscientiously extend the right hand of fellowship to any selfish and monopolising professor. May all those who are meditating in our temples upon the sacrifice of the Son of God, during this holy season, be "fruitful in every good work," and receive the angelic commendation bestowed upon Cornelius." Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God.

St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia.

The subject of the proposed re-building of St. Peter's Church, having lately attracted attention in the congregation, and physical laws. But let us concede that the church might be better ventilated, and that the pews for the Sunday School might be better arranged—and what remains? Why "a large portion of the congregation must always kneel with their backs turned to the holy table." Now, my fellow-Christians, if I dare use the name, this plea for change I implore you to resist to the uttermost. Let us not so traduce our forefathers, let us not so libel ourselves as to declare that we have just now discovered that the communion table is worthy of that sort of reverence which demands that we should pray towards it, and not look only to the God whose throne is above all heavens. This is the sort of superstition which I fear for our children. This ceremony can be clearly traced to the Romish church, when the real substance of the Saviour is supposed to lie upon their altar. But having disclaimed their doctrine, why should we retain so useless, so pernicious a practice? In some minds this peculiar reverence for the East is cultivated as a point to which their worship should be directed; thus perpetuating, so far as they can, a false astronomy as well as a false creed. This point has not been presented to you, but it forms a most weighty one in the nice calculations of the new church architecture; perhaps I should say of the revived church architecture, as I am fully aware that this too is a Roman bequest. We are told that the doctrines of the Gospel should be symbolised in stone; that Religious truth should thus be made visible. My friends, the New Testament tells us no such thing: We are there taught that we should strive to impress the truths of the Gospel "not on tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart," to make religious truth visible, not in the dome and the turret, but in the life and practice.

I have thus only touched upon the objections to our present building. The rather irreverent jest called forth by the church host does not, I think, tell in this matter, and I fancy we have effectually guarded against any further mistakes of the worthy Society of Friends—the drab-coated men of Pennsylvania. True, Christ church has been altered; but were no voices raised then to plead for old associations,—are there no regrets still unassuaged for what is now swept away forever? and is it, at the most, such a change as is proposed to you? We all know that Trinity church was demolished only because it was unsafe. Moreover, though it rain precedents, I trust there is independence enough in your midst to withstand their influence.

On Saturday last, the correspondent of the Banner intimated a doubt as to our Rector's views on this subject—to-day he can be in no such uncertainty. Now I premise that no one of you can surpass me in affection for our excellent Pastor. I honour and respect him for his manliness, zeal and energy in efforts to advance whatever seems to him likely to win souls to religion. It is such manliness, such zeal and such energy alone which can command success in any undertaking, and they most befit the high office of a teacher of the Gospel. But in a question like this, I count the voice of the Rector, as but the voice of one, and—differing respectfully but decidedly from B.—I protest against yielding implicitly to his wishes in this and similar points—nor indeed has he claimed such acquiescence. I do not think he will—I go further, and venture to say, that he will agree with me in what I am about to suggest.

B. has quoted for his purpose the Church of the Holy Communion in New York. I thank him for that word. I say if the congregation of St. Peter's can raise $30,000 for erecting a new church, let them build in the outskirts of our city three free churches such as that of the Holy Communion. Let them thus "give their best unto God." Let the poor find through your liberality places where they can hear the word of God and receive his sacraments without money and without price. With such sacrifices God will be well pleased. The silver and the gold are indeed his, give them back to him thus, and not in the idle waste which would destroy our present house of prayer, to give us Nave and Porch and Symbols and Orientation.—What answer can you give to the poor of our city, or to the missionary half starving in the west, when they shall cry unto you 'give us help, give us help.' Surely you must blush even before the bar of this world, to have to say, 'we are making improvements in our Church architecture.' I say again, build free churches, emulate Christ church in this particular if not in the other.

We are told that the Cathedrals of the old world are monuments of a living faith. I cannot think so, when I read of purchased indulgences, of priestly craft and regal sinners which reared their walls. But even they are free to the poor as well as to the rich.

But I may be told that you will not so readily give your money for erecting other places of worship, as for building a new one here. Then let it rust and perish in your coffers.—Raise not up with it a monument to show all future ages what you might have done: better to hug this superfluity to your bosoms now, than to tell the poor of years to come that you wanted only the disposition, not the power to aid them.

But I have said more than I at first intended. I urge you finally to bring this matter to the test of a vote from all who are authorized to have a voice in its decision. And when the time comes to express your wishes, I feel that superadded to all argumentation on this subject, your hearts warm and thrilling will be your strongest monitors. They will plead with deepest earnestness for those ancient walls—ancient to us of this new world, if not ancient to the nations who count their duration by centuries. They will plead for those hallowed seats to which your fathers' infant feet were lead. They will plead for the places where you yourselves worshipped God long ago with the forms of those who now lie entombed by your side. And compared with holy influences like these, what unto us are the symbols of stone, the arches of oak, or the glories of painting?

But if change must come, let it come first to us. In this busy land of ours, so bustling and so restless, it may be that the lapse of years will soon bring strangers' children within those hallowed precincts. Our offspring, it may be, shall offer their orisons to God by the banks of the Oregon or the shores of the Pacific. Let us stay the spoiler's hand till then.

OLD MORTALITY.

Hon. John Sergeant

having been now acted upon by the vestry,—and as it is understood that the vestry desire that their action in the matter should be fully known to the congregation, we publish their proceedings upon the point referred to.

At a vestry meeting held on the 13th inst., to distribute the late collection, and to take action upon the repairs of the Church: Mr. H. Binney, Jr., offered the following Preamble and Resolution:—

Whereas, it is the duty of those who are charged with the administration of the temporal concerns of a Christian Church, to provide such arrangements within the Building, as shall most conduce to the reverential, solemn and orderly performance of religious worship therein;

And whereas, the present arrangements of St. Peter's Church are in many respects defective, as not sufficiently tending to promote solemnity in the services or reverence in the congregation; some of these defects being the following, viz:

1. The relative positions of the altar, reading desk, pulpit and pews, by which a large portion of the congregation must kneel with their backs turned to the Holy Table, and listen to the word of God, when read or preached, with their backs turned to the officiating minister, and in many cases on the floor, and in all in the galleries, must look into each others faces as they sit or stand, and interfere with each other's feet in kneeling.

2. The inconvenient positions assigned to the Sunday Schools, rendering attendance at the services irksome to the scholars, and oppressive to the teachers.

3. The situation and arrangement of the Galleries, to which all the objections existing to the pews on the floor, are much more strongly applicable; besides many other points of defective arrangement not now needing detail.

And whereas, (in the words of the consecration office) it is "agreeable to reason and to our sense of the natural decency of things," that "houses erected for the public worship of God, should be such as "to fill men's minds with greater reverence for His Glorious Majesty;"

And whereas, St. Peter's Church does not produce that effect, in the degree which a building of different architectural order and design, and arranged upon a different and better plan, would accomplish;

And whereas, it is believed by this vestry, that a wish exists on the part of members of the congregation, to devote a portion of their substance to God's honour, in the erection upon the site of the present Church of a building of better style of Church architecture, and of more convenient and fitting arrangements for the due celebration of religious worship;

And whereas, this vestry approves the end thus sought to be attained, and is willing to encourage the effort for its attainment, but is unable in the present state of its corporate resources to enter upon an undertaking of such magnitude; therefore

RESOLVED, That when subscriptions for the above object shall, within a year from the present time, be tendered to the vestry, satisfactory in their character, and in amount not less than $30,000, this vestry will take down the present building, and replace it by another, whose architecture and arrangements shall combine better to fulfil the true design of a Christian Temple.

And the vote of the vestry being taken, the Resolution was negated.

And at an adjourned meeting of the vestry, held on the 18th inst., the following Resolution was offered by Mr. F. G. Smith: Resolved, That it is inexpedient to make any material alteration in the interior of the Church,

Which Resolution was adopted by the vestry.

MR. EDITOR:—

The time was, when the erection of a building for the service of Almighty God, the freewill offering of an individual, was not so uncommon as to deserve especial notice; but in our days of weaker faith, and (with all our self-congratulations) of smaller benevolence, such good works ought to be recorded, to enforce on others the precept, "go and do thou likewise."

It is for this reason, as well as for the interesting nature of the services themselves, that I have been induced to send you a short account of the recent visitation of the Bishop of New Jersey, to Glassborough, in Gloucester co., for the purpose of consecrating the new church. The old church building has long been almost unfit for worship. The congregation deprived of the services of a minister, had many of them fallen away and joined themselves to some of the neighboring denominations, but when all seemed gloomy, God put it into the heart of one, to be a "repairer of the breach, the restorer of paths to dwell in." And the new St. Thomas church, is a noble specimen of what individual effort directed by good taste, can accomplish. A bright earnest of better days for the hitherto neglected outposts of the Church.

The 10th of April, being the appointed day, the procession formed at the house of Mr. Whitney. There were present with the Bishop, the Rev. Messrs. Harrold, Frost and Boggs, of New Jersey, and the Rev. Dr. Colhoun of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. A more beautiful object has seldom met the eye, than that church presented to us as we approached it. It is built after a design by Mr. Notman of your city, in the early English style, of unhewn stone, of a deep red colour, a perfect model for a rural church. The entrance porch is under the tower, which heavy and square, "lifts its firm front to heaven," seeming to defy the ravages of time. The porch is lighted by a narrow pointed window on either side with painted glass, relieved at the point, by a trefoil of stained light, (my ignorance of architectural terms prevents the use of the technical words.) As we moved up the broad path leading to the tower, a crowd of persons unable to find room within, gave life to the scene, and seemed to welcome the minister of God to the house about to become sacred forever. We proceeded up the aisle repeating the appointed psalm; and the Bishop being seated in his chair, the instrument of donation was presented to him by Thomas M. Whitney, Esq., and read aloud by the Rev. Mr. Harrold. The Bishop then proceeded with the service for the consecration, the sentence of consecration being read by the Rev. Mr. Frost.

The building being thus set apart for the service of Almighty God, the Father, Son and Holy Ghost; the Rev. Mr. Boggs commenced Morning prayer; and never did the beauty of the evening sentence so strike me as on this occasion, when the special presence of God was thus announced, as for the first time in the house just delivered up unto Him. "The Lord is in His Holy Temple, let all the earth keep silence before Him." After the second lesson, as directed by the rubric, a child was brought forward to be baptized by the Bishop; a touching incident, giving as it were completeness to the whole service; which thus exhibited to the eyes of many strangers present, the sacredness of the Church in its consecration to God; and yet use for man in the two holy sacraments then administered; the means of the beginning and the continuance of the gifts of God's holy spirit to man. The sermon was preached by the Bishop; "What mean ye by this service?" and was a plain and clear answer to the question as applied to the service for the day. The Bishop then proceeded with the communion service, and dismissed the congregation with the appointed prayer and benediction.

One thing worthy of notice was the close attention with which the crowded congregation, followed the whole services, most of them undoubtedly new, they err much, who say that their prayers are tedious, or above the people. Let but the minister know that he considers them of importance by the reverence of his deportment; let him lead the praises and prayers of his people, let him pray with them not for them; let the house of prayer, be in some degree fitted to impress them with a sense of the presence of God, of his majesty and holiness, and there need be no fear of weariness on the part of the people.

The services concluded, we had time to examine the interior of the church. It will seat about two hundred persons—I wish my architectural knowledge were sufficient to enable me to do justice to its beauty and simplicity before your readers. An admirable point was the absence of pews, commodious benches supplying their place. The two features which struck me the most as giving character to the interior, were the open window through the tower, and the chancel over the porch; in the upper story of the tower, appears to be a small room, lighted by a large window of stained glass, directly in front; an arched opening into the body of the church, from this room admits the light, and at the same time produces a beautiful perspective effect. The chancel is a projection from the rear, separated from the nave by an arch; it is lighted on each side by a narrow lancet shaped window; the depth from the arch to the rear chancel wall may be about four feet, but from the arch on each side the ceiling projects octagonally into the nave, thus giving a large space. Prayers are read, and the sermon preached from a lectern outside the rail on the one side the arch of the chancel; in the opposite corresponding corner stands the font. This arrangement is for simplicity and convenience to be much commended. In prayer the minister kneels at the side chancel rail; thus neither turning his back on the people, nor yet seeming to address his prayers to them. The communion service and books, all well suited to the beauty of the church, were the gifts of two individuals. The font from its beauty deserves a particular notice. It was brought from Italy, expressly for this church. It consists of pedestal, column and basin, all of verde antique, beautifully wrought; four doves of the same material rest on its brink. In short a more beautiful and more suitably furnished church, it has seldom fallen to my lot to see. The whole service was of touching interest; and we may surely think, was not unaccompanied with the blessing of God.

Rev. Mr. Boggs

Christ Church, Madison, Indiana.

In directing the attention of my brethren in the ministry and the members of the Church, to the results of my fourth year's labours as a missionary at this station, where a congregation could undoubtedly be collected, if the means could be raised to erect a church-edifice, I would respectfully request them to read the following remarks from the report of "the Committee on the State of the Church" for the Diocese of Indiana which was made to the Gen. Convention of 1841, and published in the journal of the proceedings of the session.

"At Madison" says the report of the Committee, "where was the next Church organized in this Diocese, with more encouraging prospects, and which soon numbered 22 Communicants, we are constrained to acknowledge an instance of almost total failure, and that from want of union, from the frequent change of ministers, and from other adverse causes. Its church-edifice built and consecrated, has been sold for debt, and its members scattered. Here, to succeed to any good purpose, there was to be a new beginning, laying a new foundation in unity and brotherly love."

Such is the report of the Committee on the result of the effort to plant the true vine in the city of Madison.

Some time after this report was made in 1841 or '42 the Rev. Mr. Hixcox came to Madison, and officiated as the minister of the parish, but he only continued here about a year, and then he removed to New Albany, where he became the missionary of the station, and there on the 3d May 1844, to use the language of the Domestic Secretary, "he exchanged the hardness of a good soldier in the Church below, for the victor's crown of joy above." But, this gentleman did not succeed in doing anything for the future welfare of this parish, though there can be no question, that he ardently and earnestly laboured to effect this object.

I trust then that the following report will show that a "new beginning" has been laid and that something has been accomplished for the future benefit of the parish during my term of office. And I hope that the time may come when a church-edifice will be erected on the lot recently purchased by funds collected by my efforts and exertions. And then may God grant that it may be filled with zealous churchmen pious worshippers, who shall, under the faithful preaching of the gospel and the influence of Divine grace be prepared for immortality and heaven and fitted to enjoy the glory that shall be revealed when death is swallowed up in victory.

REPORT OF THE MISSIONARY AT MADISON INDIANA.

The statistics of the parish for the year ending the 31st of March 1848, are as follows:

Families, 12; adults 35, children 40.

Baptisms, 4 infants, funerals 2.

Communicants: reported 26, added 2; removed 2; present number 26.

Confirmations; 3 persons were confirmed by the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper D. D., the provisional Bishop of the Diocese, at his last visitation of the parish, on Whit-sunday the 23rd of May, 1847. When the Bishop was much gratified by seeing 24 persons present themselves as communicants of the Church, to receive the sacramental emblems of the Saviour's body and blood and to profess themselves "very members incorporate in the mystical body of Christ which is the blessed company of all faithful people."

The Holy Communion has been administered during the last year 15 times, to 238 persons, making an average of 16 persons present at each commemoration of the sacrifice of the Death of Christ.

Remarks.—The services of the Church have been regularly performed during the past year, in the inconvenient "upper room" in Madison, and they have been until the commencement of the winter season generally well attended and sometimes, the room has been filled. And if means could now be raised to erect a church-edifice, the congregation would undoubtedly increase, and the church would become, in all probability, permanently established. And then, in the course of a few years, the parish would be able to contribute funds to assist the missionary society in extending the influence of the church, by sending the ministers of Christ to preach the gospel and administer the sacraments of the church, to those who are now in the region of the distant west, where the grain is ready for the sickle of the reaper and the people are waiting to welcome the heralds of salvation.

But though the present condition of this parish is feeble and the congregation small, yet I trust that a new era will soon dawn upon the church in this city, and that she will arise from the dust and flourish as a branch of the true vine which the right hand of the Lord hath planted.

And the commencement of this new era is, the purchase of an eligible lot large enough to afford ample room for a church-edifice, when the necessary funds can be obtained, and I hope the vestry may succeed in obtaining the funds necessary for the purpose, at no very distant period, for the interest and prosperity of the church demand, that a good church-edifice should be erected with as little delay as possible.

This lot is situated on the corner of Second and Walnut streets and being 50 by 84, it is therefore large enough to admit of the erection of a building 40 by 65 or 70, and still leave an alley of 10 feet on the south side of the church.

The lot was purchased under peculiarly favourable circumstances, for the sum of $600, which amount was received from the following sources after various efforts made by me to collect funds for this purpose, since December 1846., viz:

Cash collected by me in the parish of All Saints, Portsmouth, O.	$70 00
do in Cincinnati	90 00
do in Madison and other places.	105 00
	$295 00
Cash received from the Ladies in June 1846,	$75 00
Cash paid by the members of the Church and Vestry,	160 00
Cash collected by a special effort in Madison,	100 00
Total.	$600. 00

But in addition to the funds collected by me for the purchase of the lot, obtained various subscriptions to be paid in land in materials &c. to the amount of $1000, which it is hoped may be ultimately collected, and applied to the erection of a church-edifice.

And I now take occasion to acknowledge, as I do with pleasure and gratitude, our great obligations to the Ladies of the "Society" of the church of the Ascension, N. Y. for the gift of a box of fancy articles of the value of $70 or $80, which was forwarded from New York to this city to be sold for the benefit of the church, but unfortunately the box was broken open on the way and robbed of the whole of its contents, the estimated value of the balance left, amounting only to about $15.

But, my thanks are due a second time, and they are here cheerfully and gratefully tendered to the Ladies of the same society, for forwarding 2 more boxes of fancy articles in February last, which came safe to hand—the contents of which will be sold for the benefit of the church, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made.

Respectfully submitted.

Western New York.—BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—

On Wednesday April 5th, in the afternoon, Bishop DeLancey preached in the Methodist Chapel at Hampton, and confirmed four persons.

On April 6th, the Bishop officiated in St. Peter's Church, Oriskany. In the afternoon of the same day, services were held in the Presbyterian House of worship in Whites town. The Bishop preached and confirmed two persons.

On the 7th, the Bishop visited St. Steven's Church, New Hartford, in the afternoon, preached and confirmed nine persons. On Sunday the 9th, the Bishop visited Grace Church, Utica. The Bishop read the Ante Communion service, and confirmed nineteen persons. One person was confirmed on the previous day, in private. In the afternoon, in Trinity Church the Bishop confirmed sixteen persons, and preached the sermon on the occasion.

BISHOP DELANCEY IN THIS CITY. UTICA.—In another part of our present number will be found an account of the Bishop's recent services in this city and its vicinity. A slight occurrence, in the order of Providence, compelled us to remain at home, on Sunday last, greatly regretting our loss of the enjoyment of mingling with our beloved Diocesan, our brethren and friends, in the solemnities of this peculiarly beautiful and interesting day.

Much as the Bishop's visits here have always gratified our congregations, we never have known so full an expression of interest and gratification as on the present occasion, and he probably has never made a stronger impression in favour of the Church and himself. The morning congregation was closely crowded, and in the afternoon, as Grace Church was closed the assemblage at Trinity was overflowing, for we are assured that many went away for want of seats, and the vestibule was quite filled. It was highly pleasing we believe to all, to see the two congregations thus uniting in their attendance upon their Diocesan. These "two Bands" are under the same bonds of the Church, and will always derive enjoyment in thus evincing their affection for the unity of the Faith.—Gos. Mess.

New York.—Services by the Bishop of Pennsylvania.—Acting by the request of the Standing Committee of the Diocese.

Fourth Sunday in Lent, P. M., in St. Luke's, Brooklyn, preached and confirmed eighteen persons.

Evening, in Emmanuel Church, Brooklyn, preached and confirmed twenty-five.

Fifth Sunday in Lent, A. M. in Grace Church, New York, preached and confirmed thirty persons.

P. M., in St. Bartholomew's, New York, preached and confirmed seventy-five persons.

Evening, in the Church of the Epiphany, preached and confirmed thirty-two persons.

Ecclesiological Society.—A stated meeting of the "New York Ecclesiological Society," was held at St. Paul's Sunday school room, on Monday evening, April 3d, 1848.

A report was presented from the Committee which was adopted.

Original papers were read by Mr. Frank Wills, the Architect, and by Mr. R. Ralston Cox.

The Rev. Dr. McVickar, the Rev. Dr. Haight, and Mr. Robert Ralston, of Mount Peace, were elected Vice Presidents. The Bishop of Maryland was elected a Patron of the Society.

On motion of Rev. Dr. McVickar it was resolved, that the Committee take action, as soon as possible, upon the establishment of a Library, and that a suitable place be provided, where the books may be kept under the care of the Treasurer; secondly that they make known to the Church, that they are ready to give such information as they can, to any who may wish advice respecting Church building or Church arrangements; and thirdly that they take immediate measures for publishing the "Ecclesiologist," according to the design of the statement adopted at the primary meeting.

The Committee reported the election of thirty-one members, in the recess of the Society, according to Law Fourth.

"THE NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGIST."—To be published by the New York Ecclesiological Society, under the editorship of its Committee.

The Society proposes to issue a Periodical every two months under the above name—its Committee being the Editors. Its chief object will be to extend through our branch of the Church a greater knowledge in matters appertaining to the Divine Service, such as Church Architecture, Church Arrangement, Church Music, Church Decoration, and so forth.

The principal portion of the work will be devoted to Original papers upon the above subjects, though for the present it is proposed that a part of that division should consist in a reprint of some of the most practical articles in the back numbers of the English Ecclesiologist. Beside this, a portion will be devoted to short reviews of any works bearing on the general subject—another to the notices of new Churches; and the last portion will consist in notices, and answers to correspondents.

The subscription will be $2 per annum, payable in advance, and as soon as two hundred subscribers shall have been obtained, the Society will begin the publication. The names of subscribers may be sent to the Treasurer of the Society, W. A. McVickar, Esq., No. 8 Columbia College, New York.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. F. R. Hanson has been received into the Diocese by Letters Dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bp. of Alabama, and has been invited to the charge of St. Paul's Parish, Calvert Co. P. O. Prince Frederick.—Md.

The Rev. Alexander J. Berger has received and accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. Thomas's Church, Hancock, Washington Co.—Md.

Rev. J. W. Sill of Hannibal, Missouri, has accepted an unanimous invitation to the rectorship of Christ Church Holly Springs, Mississippi, and will enter upon his duties on the fifth Sunday in Lent.

From Chambers' Journal.

History of a Deserted Sailor.

On the morning of Saturday, the 5th of May, upwards of a century ago, a ship belonging to the Dutch squadron came in sight of Ascension Island. Anchoring at some distance off shore, she put off a boat, which, under the efforts of an active crew, came rapidly for the island. The boat contained, beside the crew, an individual heavily manacled, and a guard. The prisoner, seated at the stern between the two soldiers who guarded him, sat with his head buried in his hands; but gave no further sign of emotion until he was disturbed from his position by the sound of the boat grinding on the white shore of Ascension; when, with an agonized look at his comrades, and at the vessel, he silently rose and in company with his guard, left the boat, and stepped to the beach of his prison. A sailor's chest, some bedding, and sundry other articles, were taken from the boat; the prisoner's chains were removed in silence, and the crew and guard re-embarked, leaving him alone on the beach; and nothing moved by his now frantic entreaties to them to return and take him with them, they pulled hard to the ship, apparently anxious to take leave of a scene so painful. Arriving on board, the anchor was presently heaved, all sail set and the vessel stood out to sea, leaving the unhappy man sunk on the sand in the most abject despair. Before noon, she was out of sight; and in every direction nothing was visible but the blue and desolate waters rising up their heads to the sky. The nature of the crime which he was visited by this dreadful punishment we are not permitted to divulge; but that it was of great heinousness, may be gathered from his own confessions. Some mercy mingled with the sentence, as was manifest in the numerous little articles which were left for him on the shore. Among these was a limited supply of provisions, consisting of a little rice, onions, peas, and salt. He had also a cask of water, two buckets, an old frying pan, and a fowling piece, but no ammunition. Some paper, a Bible, a few clothes, and some unimportant sundries completed the list of his possessions.

The island itself was of a nature so savage and repulsive, as well calculated to impress with horror and despair the stoutest heart condemned to so vast a dungeon. Being of volcanic origin, its surface was strewn with broken rocks, ashes, and pumice; here and there a little red soil, scorched and sterile, peeped from between masses of rock upon which the traces of fire yet existed. Its shores on one side were frightful to approach: horrid precipices of black lava seemed to fringe the island with burning, and threaten intrusion with death, while at their base were deep chasms, eaten out by the insatiable wave. Further on, the wildest confusion of rocks, whose jagged summits added to the desolation of the spot, was occasionally relieved by small patches of a glittering, naked beach, white like snow, composed of fragile coral, and frailer shells ground to dust against the iron walls of the island. The other side of the island was more hospitable, possessing a less frowning coast, a good bay, and a narrow sea-shore. Inland a few acres of plain stretched away between the gloomy-looking hills: but even these were either wholly barren, or scantily covered with a weak growth of innoxious plants, such as grass, ferns, purslain, a few thistles, and convolvulus. Not a shrub was there on the whole island; and the only spot refreshing to the eye, wearied with so long a glance at desolation, was a tall mountain called the Green Mountain, whose verdant sides gave the promise, which they did not fulfil in reality, of supplying something that might support the outcast during his stay there. The spot was, on the whole, somewhat like a vast cinder, spotted here and there indeed with green, but otherwise as dry and burnt as if it had just been vomited from the depths of some vast volcano. Yet the place was the habium- tion of a legion of wild goats, and populous nations of rats and these over-scattered it; and one or two tribes of melancholy Lects awoke with its morning sun, and went to sleep at an to day hour in the afternoon. Its shores fierce-looking though terly were, were more lively: flocks of "boobies" strutted along glittering sands, in all the impertinent independence conse- tant upon unacquaintance with mankind; a vast turtle or two, lon- or seven hundred pounders, now and then, crawled from the to he waters, and after taking a short walk for the benefit of their th, crawled in again, walking over possibly hundreds of en- named crabs on their way back; and the waters themselves were and tier still, for they abounded in eels, old wives, and rock-cod. Day, extreme length of the island was a little more than seven mo- its, its extreme breadth about six, and its general form was nati- of t- uch were the miserable and most unpromising circumstances mer which this unhappy man was left to take his chance of per- utterly, or the more remote one of being discovered and ued by some passing vessel. As his journal, which he pos- larly kept from the first day of his landing, has been preser- we are able to proceed with the rest of the history. After in- vering in some measure from the shock of being left alone, A- after watching with an aching heart the ship's snowy top- sink beneath the waves of the horizon, he addressed himself to his first labor, which was the construction of a tent. The spot he selected for its site was sufficiently gloomy, for it was be- neath one of the dismal overhanging black rocks of which men- tion has been made; but it assisted to cover his tent from the weather, and it was close to the beach upon which he, and all he possessed, had been left. By the close of the first long and weary day, a temporary tent was raised, into which he brought his chest, bedding, and all his other chattels; and here, heavy and sick of heart, he spent the first night. Rising early the following morning, after partaking of his lonely meal, he set forth to explore the island. It was the sabbath, and around was more than the stillness of that sacred day—it was the silence of the grave. No "church-going bell," no faint notes of a village hymn, no quiet tumult of a departing congregation, came to the outcast's ear—the wind was asleep, the waters were at peace; but in his heart there was no peace, and he himself was alone amid surrounding quietude. He searched in vain for some green thing which might promise him food; he then returned to his tent, and, to beguile the dull hours, set about some alterations in its arrangements; he also covered it with a tarpaulin, which he fastened down with stones, thus securing himself from rain. Towards evening, the solitude of the beach was broken by bust- ling flocks of boobies; on approaching them, he found them so tame as to permit him easily to seize several, which he afterwards killed, skinned, and salted, laying them in the sun to dry. His eyes were ceaselessly directed to the horizon; but, viewed from whatever eminence, it revealed nothing but the same hopeless, unbroken blue line. Hoping it might catch the notice of some distant vessel which might escape his eyes while searching for food he made a white flag with a portion of his linen; and fastening it to his almost useless fowling-piece, he planted it in the most conspicuous position he could descry. Sauntering afterwards along the beach, he had the good fortune to overtake a fine turtle, which he killed by beating it on the head: and this supplied him with provision for a little time. As the terrors of his lonely situation grew upon him, he began to fear lest the threaten- ing, overhanging rock under which he had placed his tent, should suddenly fall and overwhelm him: he therefore removed his dwelling to a less alarming position. He was by this time in a very miserable and disconsolate state of mind: often, after a long day's fruitless search for water and food, returning home with torn feet and an aching heart, he would pray, with one of old, that he might die. But he would by no means be accessory to his own death, as, in the constancy of hope, he still looked to his signal being seen, and himself delivered out of "that terrible place." Conceiving it singular that he had met as yet with no beasts upon the island, he searched carefully for footmarks on the beach and inland, but without success; the unbroken sur- face declared to him, again and again, that he was alone. The contents of his water-cask also daily reminded him that, unless he shortly succeeded in finding water, the most terrible fate awaited him. On one of his excursions he met with a little purslain, which he boiled with the boobies, and thus made a tolerably palatable dish for one in his condition. The few other herbs which that niggard desert afforded he was afraid to eat, nor were they sufficiently inviting to induce him to make the attempt. Every day saw him now anxious and care-worn leave his tent, bucket in hand, seeking for water; and every day saw him return in the evening almost fainting, and with an empty vessel. His supplies of food also grew short; boobies became scarce—turtle were not seen. He then used to boil a little rice in a little water, of which he made most of his meals. Many, many times, and with a gaze made intense by the struggle in his mind be- tween hope and despair, where his eyes bent upon the lonely waters, but no ship appeared. It was fortunate that as yet, his bodily health continued good. Thus were his days spent at this time: in the morning, the spring of hope poured its assuaging waters over his soul, and he set forth fully expecting success of some sort; in the evening, those waters were cut off, and he beguiled some of the tedium of the night by reading until his eyes were weary, and then, as a diversion, he would set to mending his clothes. Finding no promise of native esculents, he thought to increase his stock by planting a few of those he had with him. He therefore set some onions and peas in a patch of soil near his tent. Finding a number of nests of sea-fowl, many contain- ing eggs, he plundered them, and made his principal food of their contents. He was for some time much at a loss for a light at night; at length he hit upon the expedient of melting down some of the turtles' fat: and thus, with a saucer for his lamp, and a bit of rag for the wick, he had a tolerable light, which he used to keep burning all night. Thus passed a fort- night of his life in this great prison.

All his search for water had proved unavailing, and he was under the painful necessity of daily diminishing his stock, with- out the means or the prospect of being able to replenish it. He explored the island in a new direction, looking narrowly into every cranny of the rock, and searching every spot covered with a little fresher-looking herbage than the rest: but no bubbling waters appeared. Bethinking him, then, of his fishing-tackle, he repaired to the rocks to try his fortune in a fresh direction; he spent several hours in this employment in vain, which was somewhat remarkable, as the waters were unusually prolific of fish. Meanwhile a sad accident had occurred. Turning home- wards, what was his surprise to behold a dense volume of smoke rising up to the skies in the direction of his tent! Deeply alarmed, and dreading the worst, he flew with the utmost speed to the spot: he found the presage too true; his tent was on fire! Hastily snatching up his buckets, he ran to the sea; and thus, by considerable efforts, he was enabled to quench the consuming element. It appears that the origin of the fire was attributable to his having carelessly left his tinder-box, with some lighted tinder in it, upon his quilt. By this calamity he lost a shirt, a handkerchief, and a part of his quilt; and his Bible was much singed. Yet he felt thankful to God for what he had saved. He then knelt down, and earnestly intreated God to "give him the patience of holy Job" under his accumulating sufferings. The spirit of his journal at this time is one which betokens a degree of humble acceptance of his punishment severe as it was, and of patient submission to the Supreme will. Thus the month of May passed away—his provisions diminishing, his barrel of water failing, his hopes growing fainter, and the future full of the gloom- iest anticipations, in consequence of the rapidly-increasing heat of the weather.

On the 1st of June, there is this touching entry in the journal:—"It would be needless to write how often my eyes are cast upon the sea to look for shipping; and every little atom in the sky I take for a sail; then I look till my eyes dazzle, and im- mediately the object disappears. When I was put on shore, the captain told me it was the time of year for shipping to pass this way, which makes me look out the more diligently." At the end of the first week in this month, he had but two quarts of water left in his cask, and this was so muddy, as only to be drinkable after straining through a handkerchief. He then thought of digging for water. After digging to the depth of seven feet he found not so much as a trace of moisture, and he desisted from his labor with feelings easier conceived than described. At this time deep considerations of his apparently approaching death filled his mind, and he spent many hours in prayer and in solemn meditations upon a future state. On the morning of the 10th of June, faint and sick with thirst, he drank his last portion of water to the very dregs, and in the strength of it he went out on a fresh search for some of this precious fluid. After hours tedious walking under a burning sun, he at length became so weary and faint, as to be unable to proceed any further, and he lay down wishing he might die. His situation was that of the fainting Hagar in the wilderness, and his deliverance was to prove as signal. Rising at length from the earth, he walked slowly over the rock towards his tent, as he thought to die. But not so: his eye was led to a hollow place in a rock, toward which he eagerly sprang. Who can paint his joy, or describe his gra- titude, on finding that it contained a little silver rill of water, pure cool, and fresh! The poor fellow cast himself on the earth, and drank most immoderately of the delicious fluid. In the intoxi- cation of his joy he sat down by its side, and drank again and again of its life-giving draught. The treasures of the whole earth were poor and mean in comparison with that tiny stream- let. Evening was closing in, and taking care to mark well its position, he returned to his tent with a step more elastic than he had yet known, and a heart brimful of gratitude and joy. Thus one source of his deepest anxiety was, for the time at least, di- minished. He was now able to use the water freely; but whether from previous excessive over-fatigue, or as the consequence of a long disappointed hope, cannot be said, but it is evident that now symptoms of delirium began to appear, and of these he was him- self conscious. Strange fancies filled his mind at times, which disappeared at other times. At this period there occurs the fol- lowing remark in his journal:—"It makes me very melancholy to think that I have no hopes of getting off this unhappy island."

July opened upon this miserable man with all the intense heat of the season in that latitude. In one of his water-seeking expeditions, he saw, for the first time, large flocks of goats, to the amount of several hundreds. He vainly endeavored to pursue them; but they proved far too swift for his decaying strength, and bounded away, leaving him in his desolation. Great flocks of sea-fowl were often visible in the strand, in such numbers, that, when they took wing at his approach, they appeared like a dense cloud, which, coming between him and the sun, completely intercepted the light. Once he found a brush on the shore, and early in August he discovered other traces of the visits of previous voyagers, finding in a rock—which, at a distance, looked something like a rude cottage—some old nails, and pieces of broken glass bottles, and also a piece of a broken oar. He now called to mind his early attempt at horticulture, and set out for the spot where he had planted his peas and onions, near to the place where he had first pitched his tent. He saw from a little distance, to his joy, that some green plants appeared on the spot, and on drawing near, he found that a few had sprung up; but as if the withering hand was upon him in all things, the rest had been utterly devoured by vermin. For the period of three months there had not fallen a half hour's rain on the island. At this period of his history, with his miseries increasing upon him he thus writes:—"My heart is so full, that my pen cannot utter it. I now and then find a little water, which the goats have left me. I always scoop it up to the last drop, and use it very sparingly." On one of his visits to his old tent, while inside it, he was much alarmed at hearing a great noise, as if a "hundred coppersmiths were at work." His alarm continued until he resolved to search for the cause of this commotion, and ascending a hill, he discovered its origin in the chattering of a vast flock of birds, which whirled into the air as soon as they perceived him. This little discovery greatly relieved his mind, which, under the horrors of his situation, was become much enfeebled. He measured the contents of his water-cask, and found he had but six gallons left. He drank by measure, and eked out his allowance as much as he could, abstaining from boiling his food. The entries in his journal preserve a melancholy monotony—"Went out to search for water, but in vain," is the only memorandum for many days. How earnestly he now lifted up his prayers and his eyes to the heavens may well be imagined! But that saying was true of them which had its primary reference to another race, "The heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron." "I looked up," he writes, "to the heavens all round me, to see if the sky was overcast, that I might have some hopes of rain; but all to my sorrow, was very clear." He was now frequently out until evening looking for water, and many times was far from home, as the shades of night approached. On one of these occasions, the sun having set, he was compelled to sleep away from his cave: having lain down, his slumbers were soon disturbed by new tormentors; such a prodigious number of rats surrounded him as put him in considerable jeopardy of being devoured alive. He took good care after this to return to his cave before dark. Despair was now rapidly seizing his mind, resisted only by a few feeble struggles of expiring hope: he had now "given up all hopes of finding any water," and wandered on the strand lost in distraction. Here he espied a turtle, which he succeeded in killing, and he slaked his burning thirst with the greatest avidity in the creature's blood. At a later period, he found some relief in drinking the fluid contents of the eggs of the sea-fowl; but both proved ill substitutes for water, and he was seized with an illness, which he ardently hoped might end his sufferings. His head swelled, and became dizzy, and was frequently delirious: he could no longer walk, and could only crawl from place to place. He often crawled up to a turtle, which, with his razor,

Take the sum and substance of these three rules in short. Let the end you aim at be always good. Be vigorous in making use of the proper means for the compassing such an end. And in doing this be always very circumspect. If you still proceed after this manner, you will certainly obtain the great end which you propose to yourself in the life to come; and, if you are short of some things which you desire in this world

The extreme age of the venerated Primate, beyond the fourscore years, of which the Psalmist speaks so sadly, was a constant preparation for the tidings of his decease: and this was made more anxious by recent information, that he had suffered severely, though then somewhat relieved, from the influenza, which has proved so fatal among persons of advanced years in England; and especially with those of elevated rank and station.

was no surprise, therefore, to learn, with the first breath which announced the arrival of the long looked for Britannia, that the Archbishop was dead! The following mail came freighted with its painful confirmation, from the hand of one, only less near him than those who were the nearest. It was dated on Friday morning, 11th February, at a quarter before six o'clock. In an hour of sorrow and bereavement, when I have been considering to whom ought to be sent earliest information of such sad loss, it has occurred to my mind, that this morning is the anniversary of his death. It is due, therefore, to your affectionate heart, to communicate, to you in these few mournful lines, that it pleased Almighty God to take to His own great mercy, and to His long and earnestly desired rest, our beloved and revered Archbishop, at a few minutes past two, this morning." "His countenance bears upon it now the same expression of deep sadness which marked it in life."

PUTTING ON THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.—If we behold ourselves, and consider our own nakedness, we shall find that by nature we are nothing else but the children of wrath. Who can call that clean that is conceived of unclean seed? David saith: "Behold, I am conceived in sin;" "my sins have gone before my head;" "there is no health in my flesh;" "None can live that is justified in thy sight;" "Who can understand his faults? Cleanse me from my secret faults." Job saith: Verbar omnia opera mea: "I stood in fear of all my works, knowing that thou wilt not judge me innocent?" Again: "The stars are unclean in his sight: how much more man, a worm, even the son of man, which is but a worm!" In like manner saith Esay: "We have all been as an unclean thing; and our righteousness is as filthy clouts." Our virtue, our holiness, our fasting, our prayers are filthy, when they come to his sight. We cannot say our heart is clean. We cannot say we have not sinned. "God hath shut up all in unbelief, that he may have mercy upon all." "That is born of the flesh is flesh." The Spirit fighteth against the flesh, and the flesh against the Spirit. "Open shame belongeth to us and to our fathers." Cursed is he that abideth not in all things that are written in the book of the law." And "whosoever offendeth in one is guilty of all" the commandments. When the miserable and wretched soul boasteth itself, saying, "I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing," the Spirit of God maketh answer: "Thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." Thou hast nothing to put upon thee to cover thy shame. "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried by the fire, that thou mayest be made rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that thy filthy nakedness be not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eye-salve, that thou mayest see." The same Spirit in the apostle giveth this counsel, that we put on us Jesus Christ. Let him cover us with his body and with his blood, as with a garment: his blood hath cleansed us from all our sins. He is "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world." "He is become unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." —Bp. Jewel.

"We have often occasion to point out what a difference there is in the standards by which God and men judge the relative worth or importance of things. Sins of the mind, for instance, are ordinarily thought less of than sins of the flesh; pride incurs but slight reproof, whilst sensuality is heavily denounced. Yet the proud perhaps offers more direct insult to God, and more invades his prerogative, than the sensual; and thus his offence may be the more hateful of the two in the sight of the Creator, whilst it receives comparatively, no blame from the creature. Accordingly, there is nothing of which God speaks with greater loathing than of pride: the proud man is represented as the object of his special aversion. "God resisteth the proud." So that whilst with ourselves he puts a difference between sins, he inverts our decision and assigns the greater atrociousness, where we assign the less. Take again, covetousness and drunkenness; these sins are either thought by men, nor represented in scripture, as of equal enormity. But which do men think the worse? The covetous man escapes with scarce a censure; the drunkard is the object of scorn and reprobation.

But this is the verdict ratified by the Bible? Nay, whilst the drunkard is unreservedly told that his sin shall exclude him from the kingdom of heaven, the covetous man is identified with the idolater. No one who knows what idolatry is, and how God denounces the worshipper of images, will hesitate to admit that such a representation places covetousness at the very top of things offensive to our Maker. How careful, then, ought we to be as to what standards we adopt, when we would estimate the relative guiltiness of sins! If we must distinguish between sin—though it were perhaps safer to confine ourselves to the truth that all sin is infinitely heinous—let us take good heed that we always go for our rule to the Divine word, and not to human opinion."

MELVILLE.

The Prayer of Habakkuk.

It is said of Dr. Franklin, that, during his long residence in Paris, being invited to a party of the nobility, where most of the court and courtiers were present, he produced a great sensation by one of his bold movements, and gained great applause for his ingenuity.

According to the customs of that age and country, the nobles, after the usual ceremonies of the evening were over, sat down to a free promiscuous conversation. Christianity was then the great topic. The church was always ridiculed, and the Bible was treated with unsparing severity.

Growing warmer and warmer in their sarcastic remarks, one great lord commanded, for a moment, universal attention, by asserting in a round voice, that the Bible was not only a piece of arrant deception, but totally devoid of literary merit. Although the entire party of Frenchmen nodded a hearty assent to the sentence, Franklin gave no signs of approval. Being at that time a court favourite, his companions could not bear a tacit reproof from a man of his weight of influence. They all appealed to him for his opinion. Franklin in one of his peculiar ways, replied, that he was hardly prepared to give them a suitable answer, as his mind had been running on the merits of a new book of rare excellency, which he had just happened to fall in with at one of the book-stores: and as they had pleased to make allusion to the literary character of the Bible, perhaps it might interest them to compare with that old volume the merits of his new prize. If so he would read them a short section. All were eager to have the Doctor read them a portion of his rare book. In a very grave and sincere manner, he took an old book from his coat pocket, and with a propriety of utterance read to them a poem.

The poem had its effect. The admiring listeners pronounced it the best they had ever heard or read. "That is pretty," said one. "That is sublimity," said another. "It has not its superior in the world," was the unanimous opinion. They all wished to know the name of the work, and whether that was a specimen of its contents.

"Certainly gentlemen," said the Doctor, smiling at his triumph, "my book is full of such passages. It is no other than your good-for-nothing Bible, and I have read you the prayer of the prophet Habakkuk."

Let every reader learn wisdom from this incident, and learn to appreciate the unequalled sublimities of the Bible.—Presbyterian.

THE DIAMONDS OF THE EPHOD.—Dama was a jeweller at Ascalon distinguished by many virtues. One day the elders came to him to purchase precious stones, to ornament that part of the costume of the high priest which the Bible designates under the name of the Ephod. They explained the object of their visit, and offered him a reasonable price for the diamonds they desired. Dama replied that he could not let them see any stones at that moment, and requested them to call again. Desirous of terminating their choice without delay, and fancying that the reply of the jeweler was only a pretext to increase the value of his merchandise, the elders insisted on closing the business immediately.

As some fine stones were absolutely necessary, and as Dama possessed those of the requisite quality, they doubled and trebled the price which they had first offered; but as Dama persisted in his refusal, and resisted their solicitations, they went away in very bad humour.

Some hours afterward he placed before them the requisite diamonds, for which they again tendered the price they had last offered; but he said, "I'll only accept the price which you first proposed to me this morning, for that is all the stones are worth." "Why, then, did you not close with us forthwith?" asked they in astonishment.

"When you came my father had the key of the chest wherein the diamonds were enclosed, and as the old man was then asleep I should have been obliged to awaken him, to satisfy your demand. At his age, a short hour of sleep does him a great deal of good; and for all the gold in the world I would not be wanting in respect to my father, or deprive him of a single enjoyment." The elders, affected by these feeling words, spread their hands on the head of Dama and said, "Thou shalt be blessed by Him who has said 'Honor thy father and thy mother,' and thy children shall one day pay thee the same respect and love thou hast displayed to the author of thy being"—*Moral and Rel. TO A YOUNG LADY,

FROM HER OLD UNCLE.

Visual Beauty.

I've often thought—in heavenly bliss
To find such happiness as this,
Sublime and holy, though it be Less than divine felicity,—
The pure and hallowed charms to view
That bloom in morning life, in you.

In youth I've watched the budding flower,
In manhood, worshipped in its bower,
Have loved it in a daughter's face,
And gray, acknowledge yet its grace.
Intently have I gazed on such,
Perhaps in absent mood too much;
While fancy breathed,—"Thou'lt see again
This portraiture in the heavenly train;
The lovely form, the beaming eye,
Will rise anew, will never die:
Be it th' inspiring glow must fade
Beneath of mortal years the shade,
Return it will, revive, expand,
As bright, as beautiful, as bland;
And, mid the glories then that shine,
Though human, live with things divine;
The visual cement, giv'n
Earth's lofty excellence to join
With kindred good in heav'n.

Most true the thought: Behold in these
The elements of power to please,
To inspire, to rule, to elevate,— Proportion, grace, expression bright,
Instinctive entering, through the sight,
The heart to soften, to elate,
To gentle, awe, awaken, bless,
Charge it to know its loftiness,
A better good than self confess,

And find, amid earth's sordid lot,
Noblest delight with self forgot:—
For, if the gem is made for light,
And light is for the gem,
Each, from the diadem
Of colour-interwoven day,
Selecting sure its kindred ray;
Are not the blending line and hue
Created for the eye that's true,
Is not the eye for them?
The eye, too, is the spirit's gate,
The portal for the types that wait
Communion there most intimate.
Eye apprehends, spirit obeys,
Without, within, high instinct sways.

What wonder this? Search where you will,
Opens a mystic union still.
See architecture, born of rules
Developed in the ancient schools,
When genius caught from nature, warm,
The rudiments of graceful form,
Command her wondrous piles of art,
Though reared but through the eye,
Convey impression to the heart
Erupt with majesty:
So fair the skill, so proper, true,
Still overwhelms, delights, the view;
And ages since have all confess'd
'Tis nature's self, by genius dress'd,
Nature, with outward, quick control,
Pervading all the inmost soul.
See painting:—should the pencil trace
Creation's varied glowing face,
Or group excellent forms of life,
In joyous play, majestic strife,
Or bliss portray, or calm repose,
Action or rest, delight or woes:—
Recent the mellow shades, or old,
The harmony so just,
So living the revelation told,
So more than life the impress, air,
Culled from realities most fair,
The heart avows its trust;
Within is echoed from without
A voice that ne'er can be forgot.

Distort, the inbreathed power of sense
True faith deflects, mars with pretence;
Doctrine by fancy overborne
Is shallow, insecure, forlorn.
But,—intellect, unbound, unblent,
And duty to th' Omnipotent,
Acting on or their guard,—
Flows safely, from creation wide,
Of visual elegance the tide,
Of visual grandeur, in their pride:
Nor safe alone, but mighty, free,
And healthful in its potency,
Exuberant of reward.

What wonder then? The mystery
All nature speaks; so must it be.
Long as eternity shall roll,
Still will delight th' unwearied soul
On features and on forms to dwell
That here had pleased the eye so well.
Th' ennobling sensibility,
Terrestrial though its birth,
Consistent with the world on high,
Will prove its riper worth.

Since earth's adornments all dissolve
While ages, ay, while years revolve,
The proudest fanes, the loftiest domes,
Prostrated like the frailest homes,—
Since blending hues and harmony,
Nature's reflex sublime
Of loveliness or majesty,
Worn by regardless time,
Crumbling or fading, ruined lie,—
Where seek we aught of things so pure
That past the ages will endure,
Except in lofty sentient grace,
Except in living mould and face,
Now living, and again to live
When they th' undying spark receive,
And "incorruptible" revive?
Depart and perish, then,
Although with sentiment attired,
Ye proudest works of men!
God's work comes forth again,
With sentiment alive, inspired.

In paradise made "very good,"
The living, breathing glow,
When rose complete creation's morn;
Creation new will show
His perfect image, to adorn
The fairer Paradise of God.

Examine then thy candid breast,
Frank be its oracle confess'd,
Till to thyself 'tis known:—
The stamp of graces pure and fair,
Denotes it hallowed beauty there,
Graces that God will own,
And bid the out-and-inward glow
Together and for ever flow?

PRESENT RESULTS.—The termination of the solemn season, wherein the members of the church have been called to a more earnest and constant use of all the means of grace, suggests a few practical remarks. These will also be an appropriate introduction to the articles which follow.

A certain portion of those "who profess and call themselves Christians" are particularly charged with that grievous misapprehension of the most solemn ordinances of the gospel, which is satisfied with their use alone, as if there was virtue in the opus operatum, or mere performance of the work. Now our limited observation has impressed upon our minds the grave conviction that this is a common, if not general, practical sin even among those who protest loudly against this theoretical error. In other words too many Christians content themselves with a liberal use of means, regarding too little the ends which should thus be produced. The Christianity of our day, prolific in profession and controversy, and abundant in means, is often barren in present results. We are more ready to show our faith by our words, than by our works. The Religion which binds the hearts of men together in the gospel should manifest itself in those present results, whereby this world is blessed and rendered purer, happier, more holy, and thus more like the blissful world to which earth, under the influence of Christianity, is the threshold. The results of which we speak are the issues of Christian charity—Love to God and love to man. This love, if a reality and not a name, seeks to advance the glory of God and the good of man, by deeds as well as by thoughts and words.

It is the feeling which prompts men, not merely to say to their Father in Heaven, "Hallowed be thy name," but impels them to build Churches, and to supply means by which all the plans may be furthered wherein God's holy name is honored. It is the feeling which urges men, not merely to think kindly and to speak well of their neighbors—"be ye warmed and filled," but which moves them to "give those things which are needful," and to do all in their power to supply the bodily and spiritual necessities of others. These should be the present results of that love which is "life's only sign."

We know that such results are even now manifest, we know that much is also doing for the glory of God and the good of man. But still there is a deficiency among us of a noble minded and free-hearted charity, a charity which moves Christians to give not merely a pittance of their substance, but a due proportion. How seldom does Christian charity now attain the standard which "the offertory" cites for our instruction, "Behold Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor." Christian men may now obtain the reputation of being "charitable" without giving a tithe of their substance to religious uses! We appeal to their own sense of right to decide, whether in this view our Christianity is not sadly deficient in present results?

Let our Diocesan and General Institutions of beneficence answer; let the condition of our clergy, stamped in too many cases with want and poverty, answer; let the character of God's Holy Temples, often insulted to their high and holy use, answer; yea let the many deep and moving cries of spiritual destitution in this broad land, answer! And let Christians duly heed these accusing, condemning voices.

There is a peculiar fitness in such questions at the present time. We have just passed through the season, so rich in constraining motives and gracious means, which, if profitably used, should be prolific in present results. We should not be satisfied unless these means have had an effect upon our hearts, fostering our growth during this, the soul's spring time, in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Have these blessed influences also strengthened in us the purposes and feelings which will make us more zealous in those blessed works by which alone, according to St. James, we show our Faith?

We have been led to a near and moving vision of "the sacrifice" so willingly offered by a Saviour for a world's salvation. Are we more ready now to make sacrifices for the same great end? Are we more willing to give of our poor substance, to advance the great and glorious scheme of mercy for which He gave His precious blood? If not, our fasting, mourning, praying beside His cross and sepulchre, our views of His "agony and bloody sweat" have been in vain, for they have failed to produce those present results which should be the issue of these awful solemnities.

We find, amid all discouragements, thoughts of blessed cheer, suited to our Easter commemoration, in the fact that this week's paper is, appropriately more filled than usual with the present results of which we have been speaking. Although these happy records have much of local interest, we hope our readers will excuse our giving this week so large a space to these grateful proofs of Christian zeal and devotion.

THE LAYING OF THE CORNER-STONE OF ST. MARK'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

This interesting ceremony took place according to notice, on St. Mark's day. At 1 o'clock the procession moved from the house of George Zantzing, Esq., headed by the Wardens and Vestrymen, and followed by the Bishop in his robes, and the clergy in surplices. The following Clergymen were present, Rev. Drs. Ducachet, Clay, Morgan, and the Rev. Messrs. Calhoun, Talbot, Prior, J. M. Douglass, Rodney, Montgomery, Yarnall, Diehl, McCurdy, Howe, Bonner, Smith, Gardner, C. West Thompson, T. J. Davis, and Ogilby, of Pennsylvania, Rev. Mr. Billopp of Delaware, Rev. J. C. Fales of Maine, and Rev. Mr. Frost of New Jersey and Van Bokkelen of Maryland.

The day was peculiarly propitious, and the services were most impressive. At the proper place in the usual office for "the laying of a corner-stone," the Bishop delivered an address which was heard with deep attention by the numerous auditory. An effective choir chanted the hymn and the gloria in excelsis, and sang a portion of the 96th psalm, in a manner which added much to the solemnity of the services. After the exercises were concluded the Clergy and many of the Laity were most hospitably entertained in the house of Mr. Zantzing.

The following documents were placed in the corner-stone secured in a copper box.

A copy of the Holy Scriptures, Book of Common Prayer, Journal of the Proceedings of the sixty-third Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, Thirty-sixth Annual Report of the Trustees of the Advancement Society, Banner of the Cross, of 22d inst., New York Churchman of same date, English Churchman, of 16th ult., Sword's Almanac for A. D. 1848, and also the following memoranda engrossed on parchment:—"In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen. This corner stone of St. Mark's Church, was laid on St. Mark's Day, A. D., 1848, by the Right Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D., Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. John Notman, Architect. James Cox, and S. Wilmer Cannell, Church Wardens. John R. Wilmer, William Musgrave, Henry Reed, Wm. J. Watson, Richard R. Montgomery, James A. Farnum, Geo. Zantzing, and George Helmuth, Vestrymen. His Excellency Francis R. Shunk, Governor of the State of Pennsylvania. Jas. K. Polk, President, and George M. Dallas, Vice President, of the United States. 'Other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.'"

The Church to be erected upon the corner-stone, thus auspiciously laid, is to be, if the design is carried out, a noble and church-like structure, proclaiming eloquently its high and holy use. It will be an ornament to the city, and do honor to the Architect, reflecting credit at the same time upon the zeal and liberality of those who have thus consecrated a portion of their substance to the glory of God. As much has been said about this edifice we give the following accurate description, for which we are indebted to the Architect.

For the Banner of the Cross.

St. Mark's Church.

This church edifice is to be built of brown freestone of the most pleasing tone of color, in the decorated style of Gothic Architecture that prevailed in the last quarter of the thirteenth and first of the fourteenth centuries, a period in which it may be said to have attained the highest point of graceful proportion and luxuriant beauty. The churches of this period are distinguished for their fine proportion and beauty of interior effect, and the elegance of the windows, being richly foliated in the head or arch. This peculiar style is valued by the scientific Architect for its powers of adaptation, to sacred edifices of every size and cost—from a parish church of the simplest, least expensive class, to the most gorgeous cathedral. The design of St. Mark's Church, has had the most favorable commendation from the best authorities to whose judgment the drawings were submitted; it is yet to be seen how it will be carried out.

[We expect the best results from the talent of the Architect.—ED. BAN.]

The length of the church is east and west, and is 150 feet, in all, over the buttresses. The tower is on the south side, near the west end, attached to the aisle wall, projecting all its size, and makes the breadth at this point, 91 feet. The tower is nearly on the line of houses on Locust street, standing in the middle of the square, advanced from the church, it becomes the most important feature in the street view, and will be treated accordingly. Its whole beautiful outline, from base to finial, seen at a glance—all of stone, this will be not a common object in our streets. The plan is thus made to suit the site—the tower is in the position of the south porch, for which its first stage is to be used. Through it is the principal entrance by a deeply recessed and richly moulded door-way, ornamented with foliated shafts in the jambs. The windows of the aisles and clerestory, on the flank, are of two lights, or parts divided by mullions of stone, which is foliated in the arch showing different patterns, the windows have moulded worked stone jambs.

The church comprises a chancel, a nave and aisles—an organ or choir aisle, with a convenient vestry. The interior is 138 feet in length, 56 feet wide, and 54 feet high. The chancel is 38 feet deep, 23 feet 6 inches wide, and will be built, to show the interior, of cut stone. The floor is to be paved with encaustic tiles, and rises as it recedes from church towards the east end in four steps to the altar. The window over the altar is of five lights, and will be glazed with painted glass of subject design. The nave is 28 feet wide, and 100 feet long. The north and south aisles are each 14 feet wide by 100 in length. The division is in seven bays on each side, the piers and arches to be of cut stone, supporting the clerestory, with bracket shafts between each window for the roof timbers. The roof will be open timbered, framed of oak, with hammer and collar beams moulded, the whole construction being visible. The chancel will have a polygonal ceiling of oak, divided into panels. The organ aisle is in continuation of the north aisle, with an arch open to the chancel. An open screen of oak will mark the division of church and chancel. The seats will all be of oak and will be open, of suitable design. The windows are to be glazed in quarries set in lead, having borders of colored glass. The windows of the west end are not the least important. The great window is of four lights, and those of the aisles have three lights each. From their position to the street, they will be richly worked—a small porch entrance is under the large window, and another door on the north side opposite that, through the tower. The vestry and chancel have each their entrance door. The tower is square built, with buttresses to the height of 80 feet from the base. It is then resolved into an octagon spire 90 feet high, broached on the angles, with three tier of spire lights alternating. The belfry has coupled windows on each face. The spire is terminated with finial and cross. The gables are to be decorated at the apex, with handsome ornamental crosses, and a neat crest tile is carried on the ridges of the roof. The church will contain seats for 1000 worshippers and many of the seats will be free.

We are much indebted to the kind correspondent who has furnished the following interesting account.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Consecration of the Church of the Messiah, Port Richmond.

This new mission church was consecrated to the service of Almighty God, by the Right Reverend Bishop Potter, on Easter Monday, 21th inst. The morning was most beautiful. The services began at 11 o'clock. The sentence of consecration was read by the Rector, Rev. Mr. Hazlehurst. After the edifice was consecrated to God, morning prayer was begun by Rev. Mr. Maxwell, of Emanuel Church, Kensington, with the (doubly) impressive sentence, "The Lord is in his holy temple." He was assisted by Rev. Mr. Spackman, of St. Mark's Church, Frankford, Rev. Mr. Howe, of St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia, reading the ante-communion service, and the Bishop the Gospel and Epistle. The Bishop preached the sermon. There were present of the clergy, in addition to the above, Rev. Messrs. Colhoun, J. M. Douglass, Fowles, Gardiner, Goddard, Hall, Harris, Miller, Quinan, Randall, Stratton, W. Suddards, Van Pelt and Vaughan, (of Philadelphia,) Bourne, (of Holmesburgh,) Diehl, (of Whitmarsh,) Rodney, (of Germantown,) and Wiltberger, (of Yardleyville.)

The church is both beautiful, convenient and cheap. It is in the style of the early English order of Gothic architecture, which prevailed at the commencement of the thirteenth century, a style which well unites elegant simplicity with economy. It is built in the form of the Latin cross and possesses a chancel—with communion-table in the rear, a font, (presented to the church) in front, and a reading desk and pulpit on the sides—a nave, transepts and a nave-porch. The walls are substantially built of brown freestone, from Trenton, the cornices, copings &c., usually imitated in wood, being of stone. The pews with out doors, and all the ornaments are in perfect keeping the windows are glazed in lead with colored borders, and the large front window, (presented to the church) is elegantly painted, the main entrance being by the beautiful rural porch on the right side. The harmony and simplicity of colors the low walls and neat windows, the high, open roof, well finished, and above all, the enlarged and imposing effect of the transepts, where they join the nave, make the interior one of the neatest specimens we possess. The exterior is hardly inferior, with its transepts and porch, and its little belfry of stone corbelled out from and surmounting the extreme gable of the nave, containing a bell of fine tone. And by the simple expedient of having the basement under the transepts only, and not under the body of the church, that feature of the building entirely concealed from view, and yet a fine room, holding 35 persons, is obtained, (with a vestry and bible class room up er the chancel) without any violation of the unity of the building. The church itself seats 605 persons and can be made to accommodate more with ease, it is 60 feet high to the cap of the belfry, and the interior is 90 feet along the nave and chancel, and 64 feet along the transepts. And the accommodation for so many people, with perfect attention to the truth and beauty of the building, and with due regard to durability, has been attained at the total expense of $5,800 for the building, or, including the furnishing of the church, a furnace, the bell, &c., $6,200. The architect is John Notman, John Gibson painted the window, and the builder and contractor, with whom the vestry is entirely pleased, and whom they warmly recommend to others, is Hiram Miller.

A few words more in reference to the parish itself. It was not earlier than October, 1846, that a few members of our church had their attention directed to the growing borough of Port Richmond, as a place comparatively destitute of religious privileges, and one to which the beautiful services of our noble church ought to be extended. For once Episcopalians were in advance of others. A parish was organized on the 27th of that month, and a large Sunday school gathered and regular services held by Rev. J. G. Maxwell, Rector of the neighboring parish Emanuel, Kensington, who had been active in first suggesting the design, and to whom the thanks of the church are justly due. The Vestry elected the present Rector and commenced their appeal to the public in February, 1847, which was so generously met that they were able, on June 28th, to lay the corner stone, (with the usual ceremonies and an admirable address from the Bishop) in a central position on Huntingdon street, (that is to be) on ground presented by B. S. Janney, M. D. The contract was made on August 31st, and the work was actively pushed by the builder and building committee, that divine service was held in the basement on Christmas, and in the church on Easter-day, (the bell ringing its first notes in honor of the Redeemer's resurrection) and the church consecrated in less than eight months from its commencement. It is consecrated too, (thanks to the liberality of its friends and the energy and activity of the Vestry, in fact, their firm determination that it should be so) free from debt, and thus the parish, one of the poor, is enabled to enter life untrammelled. The church was admitted at the last convention, and at the coming one will be enabled to report a good work done.

The Church to which the following description relates, was opened last Sunday. When the indefatigable and faithful missionary, of whose successful labors this Church edifice is a substantial evidence, began his work at this place, there were very few who were in any way connected with the Church, and the field appeared most discouraging. The present result is a convincing proof of what may be done by faithfulness and perseverance.

St. Paul's Church, Doylestown.

This building, now ready for worship, is of the early English style. The front is rough tooled ashler work, with the jambs of the door, windows, arches, and hood mould, cut fine, the tone of a beautiful mellow tint, with a slight cast of yellow. Dimensions, 60 feet by 37, outside. The depression of the lot from the street, admits of a fine basement above ground, while on the end next the street, you enter the Church with only a step and platform. The walls are rubble work, pointed outside, and inside stripped and lathed; the plastering of ashler work, of a light drab color. The roof is covered with slate. The ceiling represents an open timber roof, with carved braces, sustained by corbels on the side walls, all of which are stained dark oak. There are on the Church floor, 62 pews without doors, which will furnish sittings for about three hundred persons. There is an end gallery for the Organ and Choir, lighted by a triple window in front, filled with stained glass of a diamond form. There are five small lancet windows on each side of the Church filled with ground glass, which in excluding all glare, will diffuse a soft and agreeable light throughout the building.

The Chancel is 19 feet wide, with small projections on either side, one of which is occupied as a vestry, the other forming a screen to the stairway descending to the basement. These screens are ornamented with trefoil arches and cornice; the gallery in front is finished with similar arches, and supported by small columns and cornice under, all of which are colored dark oak. The Pulpit, Reading-desk, Communion Table, Baptismal Font, are of neat design, and made of black walnut. The rails of the Chancel are to be of cast iron, of a beautiful design, got up for the Church of the Advent, Philadelphia. Architect, John E. Carver. PHIL.

New Jersey is not to be omitted when speaking of present results. A much valued correspondent has made provision against such omission. This notice is especially appropriate, as it furnishes an unusual result in our day, a sanctuary built for the glory of God by an individual.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Consecration of St. Thomas' Church, Glassborough, Gloucester County, New Jersey.

The consecration of this fine little church to the service of Almighty God, by the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of New Jersey, on Monday last, one of the loveliest days, by the way, the sun never rose upon, was from beginning to end a solemnly beautiful scene, and one never to be forgotten, I am quite sure, by any one, man, woman, or child, who was privileged to be there. As a more minute description of this modest little temple than I feel myself qualified to give, will probably find its way into the Banner before long, I will simply say that it is, in point of style, pure old English Gothic, having almost no other ornament than extreme simplicity. Its fine Porch, Nave, and Chancel, are so exactly proportioned, and suited to each other in every respect, as to make the whole ensemble perfectly symmetrical and Church-like, within and without. It is disfigured by neither basement nor gallery, and every thing about it, may be truly said to be in most perfect keeping with the due celebration of the services for which it was built. Though quite small, the whole structure, without seeming at all heavy, is exceedingly massive and strong, and has, altogether, an air of quiet dignity and chaste beauty about it, which goes to the heart. If religious expression can entitle it to such high praise, it has a far better claim to be styled "a petrification of Christianity," than certain far more costly and pretending monuments of Christian liberality and zeal, which have been put up not quite a thousand years ago, within a thousand miles of Philadelphia. I hope this is being general enough not to give offence.

The Church in New Jersey owes this beautiful little gem of a country temple, to the open-hearted liberality of the Messrs. Whitneys, of Glassborough, the intelligent and enterprising proprietors of the extensive and well known glass works in that place. Its Nave will comfortably seat about 150 people, though on the day of its consecration, full 250 persons managed to crowd in. One of the Messrs. Whitneys informed me, that the whole cost of the edifice as it now stands, is about $3000; and the cordial thanks of Churchmen are due to these gentlemen for exemplifying that such a Church can be built for such a sum, thereby practically teaching those who may hereafter follow their good example, how well, and readily, good taste and strict economy in such matters, may be made to go hand in hand. They even say that such a building might be put up for less almost any where else.

At 11 o'clock, A. M., the Bishop in his robes, followed by a number of the Clergy in their surplices, was received by the Wardens at the outer door of the Porch, and the Consecration Service began; the Rev. Mr. Harrold, reading the document of Donation, and the Rev. Mr. Frost, of Burlington College, the Sentence of Consecration. The Morning Prayer was offered up, and the Bishop preached from a Lectern placed outside, and to the left of the Church. The subject of his admirable discourse was, that the doctrine of the Divine Presence in temples made with hands (which, by the way, he ably and beautifully unfolded), is, in itself, a stringent argument for cultivating that holiness of heart, without which, no sacrifice, or service offered to God, can be acceptable. He then concluded with some extempore remarks, which were, in a most touching and masterly manner, interwoven with certain local allusions, which, the one or two hasty and sidelong glances I compelled myself to snatch at the almost breathless and statue-like forms which filled the Nave, showed me had reached the hearts and sympathies of all who were by. As for myself, I felt that it was good for me to be there. The Bishop then returned within the screen to consecrate the Holy Eucharist, which he administered to about 30 communicants.

As if every thing had conspired to render this auspicious day still more lovely, a singularly bright and beautiful child was brought to the Font to be baptized by the Bishop, after the second lesson. The exuberant and contagious glad-heartedness which this little fellow displayed, and his evident reluctance to quit the arms and company of his new and Right Rev. acquaintance, and also, the magnificent effect of the rich stream of light which poured in through the open lattice to the left of the Chancel, upon the Communion service, and spread Altar in the back ground, just after the Invocation Prayer had been pronounced, as if to remind us all in a symbol, that He who is Light had "come to the feast;" were life-pictures, which, for their moral expression and beauty, I have never seen, nor expect to see surpassed. Such little incidents as these, may indeed seem tame and spiritless, in print, but they will be as far off as possible from being thought so, by any who were by last Monday to behold and feel them. It was not one thing, but many, which made this charming day at Glassborough, altogether, one of the freshest and happiest I have ever enjoyed. It was not the peculiar solemnity of the services alone, and apart from every thing else; nor the silent eloquence of the modest little temple in which I was; nor the surpassing loveliness of the day; nor the little touching incidents I have just described,—but all these together—each of them in its way and place, lending a charm of its own to enrich and heighten the enchantment of the whole scene, that made it so.

The Benediction over, I think I beheld more glistening and dancing eyes; more bright and happy faces; more hearty squeezing of hands, and heard more speeches and ejaculations of congratulation and pleasure, than I ever before saw crowded into the same time and space, in the whole course of my life;—and I need scarcely add, that the gladdest heart, the busiest tongue and right hand present, were the personal property of the good Bishop himself. The heart of the strong man seemed all at once transformed into that of a little child; and the repeated tokens he left upon the lips of the charming little acquaintance he had made at the Font, were acts well worthy to close such a day. I now began to think that my own heart had been feasted enough for one day. But in this I was mistaken. A silver Communion Service of exquisite workmanship, and of an unusually chaste and elegant pattern, attracted me to the Altar. It had rather mysteriously appeared there. One of the Messrs. Whitneys, who stood by my side, informed me that he had seen it that morning upon entering the Church for the first time, but that he had no doubt it had been placed there by the Bishop. At the moment, I scarcely knew which to admire most, the speaking beauty of the gift itself, or the characteristic delicacy with which it was offered.

Now, Mr. Editor, if any of your readers are getting impatient, and want to know why I have written such an unusually long article about such a common-place thing as the consecration of a little country Church, I will tell them. My answer is, that such a Church, in such a place as Glassborough, is no common-place thing at all; but a thing in its way, perfectly unique. As such, it therefore demands something more of us, than mere common-place sympathy and notice. The very fact of its erection, is an earnest that the footprints in which the Messrs. Whitneys have so nobly led, will, by the Divine blessing, one day become a broad and well-beaten path; and that the charming little temple they have now given to the Most High, will at no very distant day, become the parent of many others, no less chaste, church-like, and beautiful than itself. The moral influence, too, which it cannot but exert upon the country for miles around, will doubtless, be great. Some who do not all at once appreciate its soft, warm, solemn, gray look, will come to feel by-and-by, that there is something or other about it, which makes it good for them to be there. I will venture the prediction, that this same little gray church, notwithstanding its utter poverty in the popular and lively article of white paint, will, in the course of time, achieve just such a practical triumph. As long as man is what he is, there will be that within him, to which such structures must speak. Nor is it at all necessary that every one should be able to analyze such impressions; it is enough for all practical purposes that they are, to a greater or less extent, universally felt.

And now, may the solemn assurance of their Chief Pastor by the grace of God, sink deeply into the hearts of all who heard him on Monday last, the 29th day in Lent,—that with Him, who now filled the beautiful temple they were in, all worship and sacrifice not offered up with holiness of heart, are a mockery, and an abomination. I will now conclude this article by saying, and that most warmly and cordially, that the Consecration of St. Thomas' Church, Glassborough, will not be very readily forgotten by

We have at length the issue of Dr. Hampden's case, and we sincerely hope its further discussion will be at an end.

CONSECRATION OF DR. HAMPDEN.—On Sunday morning the Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden, D.D., was consecrated at Lambeth Palace, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, under circumstances which will scarcely fail to be recorded in the history of our Church.

It has always been usual at Consecrations taking place within the province of Canterbury, for the bishops of London and Winchester to assist the Archbishop in that interesting and imposing ceremony: but these Right Rev. Prelates having been amongst those who protested against the appointment of Dr. Hampden, absented themselves from the proceedings, and the duty of assisting the Archbishop devolved on the Bishop of Llandaff, the Bishop of Norwich, and the Bishop of Worcester.

The Archbishop, who has been staying for some days past with his brother (the Bishop of Winchester) at Farnham Castle, came to town on Saturday afternoon, and having remained at the town mansion during the night, arrived at Lambeth Palace before eleven o'clock.

From an early hour in the morning large numbers of persons flocked in all directions towards the Palace anxious to be present at a ceremony, the previous circumstances connected with which have so long agitated the public mind. The arrangements entered into by the Most Rev. Primate were, however, of such a nature, that no persons were admitted except those who had obtained His Grace's permission, so that the small chapel in which the proceedings took place, was not inconveniently crowded, and the ceremony proceeded unmarked by any of those exhibitions and interruptions which characterized the Confirmation proceedings at the parish Church of St. Mary-le-bow, on Tuesday, the 11th of January.

The usual preliminary arrangements having been performed, Shortly after eleven o'clock the procession entered the chapel, and was composed of His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury (who was ushered in by John Barber, Esq., the Apparitor General of the Province), the Lord Bishop of Norwich, the Lord Bishop of Worcester, the Lord Bishop of Llandaff, the Rev. Lord Saye and Sele (Residentary Canon of Hereford), the Vicar-General (Dr. Burnaby), the Registrar-General (Francis Hart Dyke, Esq.), Dr. R. Phillimore, Dr. Bayford, Dr. Twiss the Proctor for the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Hereford, the Rev. Messrs. Vores, E. Cox, Hawkshaw, Dr. Gilly, of Durham, and several Clergymen, for the most part friends of the new Bishop.

Dr. Hampden, accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Hinds (nominated as Dr. Hampden's successor in the Regius Professorship of Divinity) and attended by his Chaplains, the Rev. H. Cox, B. D., and the Rev. G. Clarke, M. A., then entered the chapel, followed by John Burder, Esq. of Parliament-street, the Bishop of Hereford's secretary, and having taken his place in the stall assigned to him, the morning prayers were read by the Rev. Dr. Thurlow; the lessons being read by the Rev. Mr. Clarke.

Morning Prayer being ended, His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury began the Communion Service. The Bishop of Worcester read for the epistle the appointed portion of the 20th chapter of the Acts of the apostles, and the Bishop of Norwich read that portion of the Gospel, the 21st chapter of St. John. The Nicene Creed having been read by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Rev. Dr. Hinds, Chaplain to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, ascended the pulpit, and delivered a discourse which excited the most marked attention. The Rev. Dr. selected for his text a portion of the 20th verse of the 28th chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel—"Lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

At the conclusion of the discourse, the consecration was proceeded with.

The protest was unheeded by the Archbishop, and the Consecration took place.

Under the new arrangement for the holding of seats by Bishops in the House of Lords, it may be stated that on account of recent elevations Dr. Hampden will be entitled to a seat forthwith, but Dr. Graham, the new Bishop of Chester, will not enjoy that privilege until a vacancy occurs in a Diocese other than Canterbury, York, London, Manchester, or Durham.

It is expected that Bishop Hampden will be installed in the Cathedral Church of his Diocese early in April.—Eng. Churchman.

The Acadia brings little news in the way of Church Intelligence. We regret to learn the death of one of the most distinguished Prelates of the Scottish Church, the Right. Rev. Michael Russell, D. C. L., L. L. D., Bishop of Glasgow and Galloway. He expired suddenly at his residence near Leith, on the evening of the Fourth Sunday in Lent, after having preached and administered the Holy Communion in the morning, and said Evening Prayer. He was distinguished for his great literary attainments as well as for his faithfulness and success in the Episcopal office.

Bishop Ives: became a Romanist

We are pained to learn, by a letter from Edenton, N. C., that Bishop Ives was visited with a severe attack of illness at that place "under the effect of which he still lies, without a prospect of being able to fulfil his appointments for some time to come." By his direction we give notice that the appointments for the visitation subsequent to April 17th are recalled on account of the Bishop's inability to meet them.

FLOATING CHURCH MISSION.—An interesting article in reference to sailors, will be found among communications. We take this occasion to say that more funds are required before the Floating Church can be commenced. The Association have determined not to begin until they have the means in hand to end their building. The friends of this noble charity are earnestly solicited to send in further contributions to the Treasurer, Wm. C. Kent, Esq., 146 north 3d st.

AGENT AT JACKSON, TENNESSEE.—William H. Stephens, Esq., has kindly consented to act as Agent for the "Banner" at Jackson, Haywood co. Tennessee.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"Western" is received and shall appear in order.

A communication from B. James Jr. in reply to "Old Mortality" on the subject of rebuilding St. Peter's Church, will be given in our next.

As this is the time when new vestries are elected we publish the following admirable summary of their duties.

Rights and Duties of a Vestry.

In "A Digest of the Canon Law of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States," appended to the Rev. Mr. Odenheimer's Essay on Canon Law, we find the following abstract of the rights and duties of this office, as they are defined in that Code.

1. The vestry may sign the testimonials of a person applying to be admitted a candidate.
2. To give certificate to a candidate for priest's orders, that the parish will receive him as their minister.
3. To make provision for defraying the expenses of the bishop in an episcopal visitation to the parish.
4. To give to the bishop at his visitation such information of the state of the congregation as his notice requires.
5. To declare to the bishop, (or if none, to the Standing Committee,) the prescribed notice of the election of a minister into the parish.
6. To ask for the institution of a presbyter, their minister.
7. On proof before the bishop, (or if no bishop, other lawful tribunal,) of the neglect of the minister to perform the services, and his refusal to consent to any other minister performing them;—to open the church doors to any regular minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church.
8. To concur in the dissolution of the pastoral connection of irregularly instituted or settled minister.
9. To make application to the bishop, (if none, to the Standing Committee) in case of irreconcilable controversy with the minister, and to comply with the recommendation of the bishop in the case.
10. In the vacancy of a parish, or absence of the minister, to receive satisfactory evidences of ministerial authority of any person who is to officiate.
11. To receive notice from the bishop pronouncing sentence of degradation on a clergyman of the diocese.
12. To receive from a minister of another diocese the certificate of his regular standing, before he can be received as a stated officiating minister.

We have been requested to publish the following.

To the Friends of the Church.

This is to recommend the application of the Rev. Mr. Reed in behalf of the newly organized parish of St. Paul's Church, South Trenton. The case here presented is one of great interest. South Trenton is rapidly filling up with a vigorous manufacturing population. The gentlemen who own and conduct the establishment there are men of great energy, enterprise and liberality. Such a beginning is already made, as with a very small amount of aid, will insure the most complete success. Seldom is there an opportunity to secure so important a result at so small a cost. There is another peculiar feature in the case. The Rev. Mr. Reed, who has made the beginning at South Trenton, has done so without the slightest expectation of benefit from his own labours. His duty calls him in another direction. His heart's desire is that the enterprise which he has begun with such assurance of the blessing, may be made certain before he leaves it. The Rev. Mr. Starr enters warmly into the work, and will promote it, as far as possible, by aid and influence. I most earnestly commend Mr. Reed and his application to the favorable regard of all who love the Church.

Report of the Ladies Association of All Saints Parish Moyamensing.

The Ladies, Association of All Saint's Parish, Moyamensing, present to the friends of the church their fifth Annual Report. The association after struggling with many reverses have now been enabled by the blessing of God to accomplish the object for which in the original instance they came together. This object was the erection of a plain Gothic church edifice for the district of Moyamensing, where the Gospel should be preached, and the Holy Sacraments administered according to the rites of the Protestant Episcopal Church. On January 27th of this year, near the fifth anniversary of the formation of this Society, the church of ALL SAINTS, MOYAMENSING, was consecrated, free of debt on the building, to the service of Almighty God, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter.

On looking back upon the efforts of the last five years, the Association find, not matter for self-gratulation, but a continued theme for gratitude to the Divine Head of the church, that he has thus permitted his feeble creatures to be instrumental in any degree in promoting His glory by the extension of His Gospel to their fellow creatures.

The Association have nothing to report but that the work has been done. God has smiled upon the effort, and the church, for which they have been toiling, as a society, long and prayerfully, has arisen in its strength. Long may God watch over it, and throughout generations to come, may it resound with the praise of blessed Jesus through whom we have been redeemed and by whom alone we can enter God's house not made with hands eternal in the Heavens.

Subscriptions for the following work may be left at the office of the Banner of the Cross.

The New York Ecclesiologist, to be published by the New York Ecclesiological Society, under the Editorship of their Committee.—The Society propose to issue a periodical every two months, under the above name, their Committee being the Editors. Its chief object will be to extend through our branch of the Church a greater knowledge in matters appertaining to the Divine Service, such as Church Architecture, Church Arrangement, Church Music, Church Decoration, &c.

The principal portion of the work will be devoted to original papers on the above subjects, though for the present it is proposed that a part of that division should consist in a reprint of some of the most practical articles in the back numbers of the English Ecclesiologist; besides this a portion will be devoted to short reviews of any works bearing on the general subject, another to the notices of new Churches, and the last portion will consist in notices and answers to correspondents.

It is by means of a periodical of this character that the Society wish to supply a want, for some time past felt in our Church, and they hope that in this laudable, they may add holy object, they will receive encouragement and support.

The subscription will be $2.00 per annum; and as soon as two hundred subscribers shall have been obtained, the Society will begin the publication.

The names of subscribers may be sent to the Treasurer of the Society, W. A. McVickar, Esq., No. 8, Columbia College, New York.

Afterwards a Romanist, with Dr. Forbes
A Reverend Brother has favored us with the following item of English Church news, conveyed to him in a private letter recently received, from which we learn:—

That the Rev. Henry Caswall, formerly a Presbyterian of the American Church, (who by a private act of Parliament, a few years ago, became qualified to hold a living in the English Church,) has recently been promoted to be Vicar of Figbeldean, (county of Wilts,) in the Diocese of Salisbury. Mr. Caswall had for several years, been curate of that parish. The living is in the gift of the Bishop of Salisbury, who, immediately upon the death of the late Vicar, conferred it upon Mr. C. The Parishioners unanimously joined in a petition in his behalf, which reached the Bishop the day after the appointment was made.

The numerous friends of Mr. Caswall on this side of the water, will rejoice in such evidence of the high estimation in which he is held by his Bishop, and by the people among whom he ministers.—Gos. Mess.

In these days of easily provoked excitement, there are many besides the worthy lady mentioned below, whose alarms are raised and feelings disturbed, by equally as unimportant circumstances.—Gos. Mess.

A good Episcopalian lady, who had heard much of Dr. Wm. Crosswell's Puseyism, determined to go and see and hear for herself. Having executed her purpose, she came away filled with amazement. She declared that not half had been told her. "Would you believe it," said she, "the inscription over the desk was, 'Go to Rome.'" She was not familiar with German text. It was "Lo, I come."—Boston Post.

The Pulpit, No. 2.

GESTURE.

Although gesticulation, as it was attempted to show in an article on that subject, be highly unbecoming the sacred desk, nevertheless, gesture may, when modest and applicable, be admitted as a means of avoiding that apparent want of animation, which a long continued sameness of position is apt to produce. But even here great caution is necessary. The pulpit, it must be borne in mind, is a place strictly sui generis. It is not to be compared with the bar, or the stage, or any other place of resort for the display of public eloquence, more than the house of God is to be put on a level with a court house or a theatre. It is sacred to the purposes for which it was built, and to the service of that Being to which it has been consecrated. Gesture, then, if employed, should be strictly in accordance with the place in which it is used, and with the sacred nature of the subject to which it is applied. Should these truths, so evident to all, incur surprise at their being made, the only excuse to be offered in extenuation is, that they seem to have lost their efficacy from disuse, and as a consequence to have been superseded by pretension in the garb of sanctity and decorum to the detriment of goodness and simplicity. We say pretension, because, it is to be feared, that many from a want of that self-possession essential to elegance, thus by "overstepping the modesty of nature," miss the mark they expect to hit.

In having recourse to gesture, care should be taken, as said above, that it be modest and applicable, and this is more likely to be the case, when to impart knowledge and expound truth is aimed at, rather than to produce an effect; for truth is of intrinsic weight, and sinks silently, but deeply, into the well of our thoughts and affections, while mere effect but troubles the still waters of the soul for a little, and then is disregarded and forgotten. Besides there is in every attempt (successful or not) to produce effect, an implied want of honesty of purpose; which ill becomes a teacher of truth. It is a much easier matter to touch the feelings, awaken sympathy, and excite the imagination than to confound error by proof of argument, and to turn the heedless to reflection by winning their hearts. Nor is it every one that stops to examine himself sufficiently in relation to the course he may pursue with the congregation to which he is called. The regular performance of his routine of duty, in a particular habit of manner, adopted without reason, pursued without consideration, is too apt to be suffered by an incumbent to grow into such excess, that any thing deviating from it seems faulty and even bad, although in itself simple and excellent. It is thus many a worthy man has rendered himself less forcible than he would have been, had he established a cautious investigation of his own adaptation of a means to an end. Our gestures are to apt even in private life to be mere mannerisms and in public much more so, especially when they are employed to avoid stiffness, for then they are, as of course, utterly meaningless. If gesture be used at all, it should be of such a character, as to speak to the eye in language consonant with that of the voice, and always in abeyance. As an adjuvant, when persuasion need its assistance, it may occasionally be called upon to lend its unobtrusive aid, and only occasionally.

Many very excellent men of much fervor and piety have been known to adopt an energy of action in the pulpit of which they were by no means conscious at the time. Such gesture is of all, the least objectionable, because it is unpremeditated; and although a fault, (and when peculiar and awkward a grievous one) may pass without exciting disgust. It must nevertheless be remembered, that much gesture can never be appropriate; it militates against that sanctity and devotional feeling which is at least supposed to exist reciprocally between pastor and congregation. As all preaching is of necessity more or less didactic, it is hard to conceive of any gesture that can be employed suitable to the inculcation of precept, or the elucidation of truth. Thoughts well expressed speak for themselves; if they do not, can gesture do it better? If truth be conveyed in apt terms, selected by learning and thought but fail to impress the heart, can a wave of the hand do so? But lest it be thought we are advocating a position in the pulpit allied to that of an automaton, we would with all deference observe, that with us there is a manner to be observed in the pulpit, very significant, appropriate, and characteristic—a manner that has little or nothing to do with gesture. In other words, (and perhaps it would be a more homely way of expressing our views upon this point) the pulpit has its manners as well as the court. If in the latter a total absence from all affectation and coarseness of voice and gesture, together with a language at once concise, correct and appropriate be essential qualifications; how much more are such required of him who for a time presides in that court in which we meet to worship the King of Kings.

Sailor Missionaries.

As it is necessary, often to repeat those things which should be remembered, I venture again to intrude the subject of seamen upon the attention of your readers. Having in a slight, and unfinished sketch (for much remains to be said) given an outline of what sailors are doing to injure the cause, and retard the spread of Christianity; before the picture is filled up, it will be refreshing, occasionally to turn aside, and see also, that there is some good to be found in the midst of all this evil. Especially, as it will at once be apparent, that if from such feeble beginnings, and with such imperfect appliances, sailor missionaries are found, actually spreading the Gospel among the heathen, great and immediate success, must attend combined and energetic assistance by the Church. The very fact that seamen are such notorious evil-doers, proves them to be useful agents, if once those qualities, which, when perverted, carry em headlong to mischief, could be guided by the influences religion into proper channels. The sailor is, in all things, man of action. Cool, brave, enterprising, restless, and enthusiastic, from the very nature of his calling, he is as noble a specimen of what a man should be when a Christian, as he is fearful proof of what Satan can do with his captives when fast and in his fetters. Nor is it any weak illustration of the subtlety and wisdom of this evil spirit, that he should have so long succeeded in keeping hid from the view of Christendom, the nefarious use he was making of this forsaken, hardly treated, most forgotten, but highly deserving class of men. Once convert a sailor to the faith, (and he is not by nature, or pursuit, more inaccessible than other men) and not only will he be himself steadfast and true, but labor earnestly to persuade and strengthen his brethren. There is seldom with him, any of that shame to confess Christ before men, which often is found even among truly pious persons, whose lives are passed in more tired and quieter pursuits. Dealing habitually with danger, and beholding the terrors of the storm-lashed and raging deep, he becomes indifferent to his feeble fellow man, and regards a ship or a sneer as little as a lee shore or a hurricane. Acquainted with human nature in all its forms and phases, he knows how to assail its weak points, and with but little aid of learning or talent, will often reach the mind and heart of his companions, where one more gifted by nature and education, but with less knowledge of men, would expend his eloquence on empty air. I do not hesitate to affirm that there never was a religious sailor on board of a ship, or in foreign lands, who did not shed around him a wholesome influence, while many of them have been "burning and shining lights." Here follow the facts in corroboration of the preceding remarks. They are headed (and truly) "Good Tidings from the Pacific." "The Captain of a whale ship thus writes to the Seamen's Chaplain Honolulu, Island of Oahu."

"We are all well on board of the —, and are by the blessing of God's infinite mercy, still progressing in the cause of our Infinite Master. We have had evening meetings constantly since leaving Honolulu. * * * There are many on board who are very attentive to the meetings, and I have reason to think, that there are six who have obtained the "one thing needful." * * * Capt. B. embraced the gospel which he now so zealously disseminates, during the present voyage. * * * Of the second officer of the same ship, and we trust more of the seamen, it may now be said, as well as of their Captain, 'Behold he prayeth.'"

"Stewart's Island, February 20th, 1847.

"We are now lying at an island where there are some forty white men living, but not all in one settlement,—not over ten in a place, but they have nearly all been on board at our religious meetings, although they live over ten miles from the ship. Last Sabbath we had an English schooner lying close by us, and a great number of the crew attended Divine Service on board. We have had nearly all the navies, thirty or forty in number, attend our meeting every evening: they are nearly missionaries, as they call themselves. * * * The natives of New Zealand who reside on Stewart's Island, are fast becoming Christianized: they are very strict in their observance of the Sabbath, and will not even go into their gardens to get potatoes to boil on that day, but always prepare enough on Saturday to last till Monday, and should they fall short they go without. All the white residents here were formerly sailors, either seal-men or whalers. There are no rum shops, nor do they ever have any, unless some vessels sell it to them. I must acknowledge that many of them in behavior, are far superior to the majority of people in any other place I ever visited, and they are much interested in religion; they seemed much pleased with our meetings, and always attended whenever the weather would permit, though so distant; they all said they wished there was somebody to read and to pray to them, living in the island; that they would cheerfully and thankfully attend. I distributed all the religious books I had among them, &c. They felt very much the want of Bibles, and I was very sorry we had no more to part with."

How much good such a shipmaster can do! And how characteristic his missionary zeal! When the fishermen sailors, Andrew and Philip found Jesus, they went immediately in pursuit of their brethren, Simon and Nathaniel.

Alas! "few and far between," are the "angel visits" of such ships! Shall not Christians do all they can to help forward this work, thus begun by the Spirit of God? We have ready at hand, missionaries and colporteurs for the whole earth, and shall we not rouse up and prepare, and furnish them to go forth, the heralds of the truth, which, even though we do not impart, God will of His infinite mercy, and in His own appointed time, surely cause to "cover the earth as the waters cover the sea." Eternal must be our self-reproaches and regrets, if we forfeit the privilege of laboring with the Lord, in this His ineyard. Neither sailors, nor the heathen, are to remain forever "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise," and it is written that many who are first shall be last, and those who are last shall be first. Let us beware, lest neglecting this "cry from the deep," we leave ourselves forsaken.

Rev. Mr. Trappier

For the Banner of the Cross.

Low and pitiful design of diverting the choice of a Lady from the Presbyterian Church. In a private way, and for proselytizing purposes."

What a strange idea some people have of proselytizing. Such is the use of the word in certain quarters, that any, who would employ it in the connection in which it was used above, are advised, if they do not use it in the theological sense, to consult some Dictionary of the English language, and learn that the word is altogether inadmissible for their purpose. But, as it would probably be more pertinent, they are referred, for the theological sense, to Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible. From no quarter that I know of, can a warrant be drawn, for applying it in the case of a clergyman of the Church instructing one of his charge, in order to prevent a falling away from the Church. It does not seem that it can be used with any propriety in such a case, even if the minister has boldly pointed out what he conceived to be a very objectionable feature in the doctrines of the society, against which he would, under his ordination vow, guard his weak member. And if he can show that the interpretation he puts on those doctrines is the sense, in which their preachers advocate them; and quotes an expression for this purpose, which an individual had told him that he had heard from the pulpit,—even then, it does not seem that he can be viewed as proselytizing.

If to proselyte is to "convert," as defined by the best lexicographers, then the use of it in such a case must be condemned. It is this improper use of it, with the other expression, "low and pitiful design," that suggests the propriety of the above hints. The writer of the present article does not express himself in reference to any occurrence in his own parish; but in reference to reflections on a clerical brother, the particulars of whose case are well known to him, and had also been communicated to the author of the sentences heading this piece—communicated, and their receipt acknowledged, before the expressions appeared.

But does it follow from this that the minister of the Church would be culpable for even endeavoring to gather all the world into the net, which, as a fisher of men, he is bound to use? It is well known that the clergy of the Church can never be accused, even in their zeal for her enlargement, of ever going beyond what decency and good manners allow. But while they are acquitted of any obtrusiveness, it is humbly hoped that they will never be backward to inform every inquiring mind, whether found in the irreligious world, or among the sects of Christians. There is no telling how many good Christian people are out of the pale of the Church, simply because no inciting cause of inquiry has set them on, to ask after the good old paths. A remarkable instance, that furnishes an example of this, has very recently come under the writer's own observation. The result has been such, as to make him resolve that he will, henceforth, use even less reserve, in giving information on the Church, than he has hitherto employed. He will lay himself open to the charge of proselytizing; but it shall be in the sense in which the Apostles and their ministers went to the work of proselytizing the world, viz:—by gathering into the one fold, of which Christ is the Shepherd, such as he can, of those who "scatter abroad."

Important Questions.

BELIEVE NOT EVERY SPIRIT, BUT TRY THE SPIRITS WHETHER THEY BE OF GOD.

If A SPIRIT WHICH IS OF GOD has said that "unless a man is born of water, and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God;" that "as many of you as have been baptized unto Christ, have put on Christ;" that "ye are all baptized by one Spirit into one Body, which is Christ;" and that "ye are saved by the Washing of Regeneration, and by the Renewing of the Holy Ghost." Of what sort is the Spirit which denies BAPTISMAL REGENERATION?

If A SPIRIT WHICH IS OF GOD has said that "as many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into His Death;" that "Christ also loved the Church, and gave Himself for it, that He might sanctify and cleanse it, by the Washing of Water; and the Word." (i.e. according to St. Chrysostom, "and by the verbal formula used in Baptism;") and "be Baptized, and wash away thy sins;" and "be Baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the Remission of sins." Of what sort is the Spirit which denies Baptism to be an instrument of our Justification, and a means of conveying to us the benefits of Christ's Passion?

If A SPIRIT WHICH IS OF GOD has said that "Baptism doth also now save us:" of what sort is the Spirit which says in flat terms—IT DOETH NOT?

If A SPIRIT WHICH IS OF GOD has said "the Bread which I will give is my Flesh, which I will give for the life of the world," and afterwards at the last supper "This is my Body; This is my Blood, and "the Bread which we break is it not the Communion of the Body of Christ;" and "the Cup which we bless is it not the Communion of the Blood of Christ;" and that "they who eat and drink unworthily, eat and drink damnation to themselves, not discerning the Lord's Body." Of what sort is the Spirit which denies Christ to be present, and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper, as if it were the mere empty sign of an absent thing?

If A SPIRIT WHICH IS OF GOD has said "except ye eat the Flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His Blood, ye have no life in you; whose eateth my Flesh, and drinketh my Blood, hath eternal life: and I will raise him up at the last day." Of what sort is the Spirit which denies the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Lord to be generally necessary to salvation?

If A SPIRIT WHICH IS OF GOD has warned us that "prophecy is not of private interpretation," and "to hear the Church." Of what sort is the Spirit which bids every man to interpret Holy Scripture for himself, and to hear nothing but—PROTESTANTISM RUN MAD?

One thing is certain,—that, as these two Spirits flatly contradict one another, they both cannot be of God. Whichever of them speaks the "mind of Christ," the other must speak the mind of "him who is with the world." The command is express—TRY THEM. Disbelieve one we must. Philadelphia, 1848.

Easter A. M. 16. St. David's Manayunk, Easter afternoon, 9. Trinity, Southwark, Evening of Easter-day, twenty-eight.

New York.—SERVICES BY THE BISHOP OF PENNSYLVANIA.—Acting by the request of the Standing Committee of the Diocese.

Tuesday evening, 11th inst., in the Court House, Sandy Hill, preached, and confirmed eleven persons.

Friday, 14th, morning, in St. John's, Kingston, Ulster county, preached, and confirmed sixteen persons.

Saturday, 15th, afternoon, in the Church of the Holy Communion, New York, preached, and confirmed twenty-nine persons, also one in private.

Palm Sunday, morning, held an ordination in St. Peter's, Chelsea, New York, on which occasion, Mr. L. Nathaniel Garfield, and Mr. Henry Sansom, (the former an Alumnus of the General Theological Seminary,) were admitted to the holy order of deacons, and the Rev. Thomas Cook, and the Rev. C. Winter Bolton were admitted to the holy order of the priesthood. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. R. H. Bourne, assisted by the Rev. Lot Jones, of the Church of the Epiphany, who read the lessons. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. The candidates for the diaconate were presented by the Rev. Hugh Smith, D.D., Rector of St. Peter's. The candidates for the priesthood were presented by the Rev. Lot Jones, who with the Rev. Dr. Smith, and the Rev. Mr. Bourne, assisted in laying on of hands. The most holy sacrament of the Eucharist was administered by the Bishop, assisted by the rector of St. Peter's. Previous to the ordination, the Bishop confirmed twenty-one persons, and addressed them.

In the afternoon, in the French Church du St. Esprit, preached, and confirmed sixteen persons.

At a later hour, in St. Simon's Church, (German,) confirmed twelve persons—all the services except the confirmation office being in the German language. The Bishop's address, having been translated into German, was read by the pastor of the church, the Rev. Mr. Cook.—Churchman.

Western New York.—BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATIONS.—On Tuesday morning, April 11th, in St. James' Church, Skaneateles, Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Spencer M. Rice, of Jordan. The Bishop preached, and confirmed nine persons, the Rev. Mr. Seymour, the Rector, reading the confirmation preface.

St. James' Church, as we well know, and as we have often had occasion to feel, is most beautifully situated on the very brink of the Lake, and has during the past year, been enlarged and improved, and now presents both within and without, a handsome and churchlike appearance.

We have never forgotten the interest we had in that day's holy services, when St. James' Church was consecrated by Bishop Hobart, on the 23d of September, 1828, and the part we took in the solemn rites of the occasion, nor shall we ever forget the journey we took the following night, dark and tempestuous, as we rode with that dear and beloved one to meet the appointment of the following days.

On Sunday, the 16th inst., Bishop De Lancey preached morning and afternoon, in Grace Church, Lyons, and in the afternoon confirmed seven persons, prayers and the confirmation preface having been read by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Bissell. The congregations were large on these occasions.—Gospel Messenger.

Rhode Island.—EPISCOPAL ACTS.—On the Sixth Sunday in Lent, April 16th, in Grace Church, Providence, the Bishop administered the Holy Rite of Confirmation to fourteen persons.

On the Monday before Easter, April 17th, seven persons were confirmed in Christ Church, Westerly. Evening Prayer and the Preface were read by the Rev. T. H. Vail, rector of the Parish, and the Bishop delivered a sermon and address.—Ch. Witness.

Maryland.—ST. PAUL'S PARISH, PRINCE GEORGE'S CO.—The third church for this large parish, which has been so long in contemplation, in the village of Woodville, is at last under contract. It is to be a frame building, 62 feet by 24, with a Chancel 8 feet by 14. A small vestry room in the rear of the Chancel. The windows, five on a side, pointed; with a triple lancet behind the Altar, and a corresponding window in the west end.

It is highly creditable to St. Paul's Parish, that beside having the funds in hand to pay for this new building, it has paid more than $1500 within the last three years in discharge of an old debt of long standing. Much yet remains to be accomplished by the parishioners before this, the largest parish in the diocese, can be considered as adequately furnished with provision for the spiritual necessities of the people; but there are sufficient indications that the good work will go on, and multiply.

CONFIRMATION.—In St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, on the morning of the Sixth Sunday in Lent, the Bishop preached, and confirmed twenty-eight persons.—Church Times.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. David H. Macurdy has accepted an unanimous call from the Vestry of St. Paul's Church, Waterloo, Seneca Co., Western New York; and expects to enter upon his duties on the second Sunday after Easter.

The Rev. Charles S. Putnam having received and accepted a call to Christ Church, Derby, Conn., has resigned the charge of St. Paul's, Woodbury, Conn.

The Rev. Pierre Teller Babbit, of Charleston, S. C., has been unanimously called to the Rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Woodbury, Conn.

The Rev. Ferdinand E. White, having removed his residence from Milford, Conn., to Washington, North Carolina, requests that all letters and papers for him, may be addressed accordingly.

Church Review and Ecclesiastical Register.

This Quarterly Magazine is devoted to the exposition and defence of the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church; to the promotion of an elevated Christian Literature, and to a faithful record of important Ecclesiastical, University and Missionary intelligence from all parts of the world. The effort to establish the Church Review has been warmly commended by a large number of the Bishops and Presbyters of the Church.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"The Editors of this journal have abundant ability and as much of industry; and we doubt not they will fill out their plan of usefulness to the cause of the Church, and of soundness in all good things."—Gospel Messenger.
"This Number has fully realized our highest expectations. It shows a degree of ability and sound Churchmanship on the part of the Editors, which afford good promise that this Review will be a credit to the Church, and take rank among the ablest periodicals in the country. The Ecclesiastical Register is a new feature, and quite as useful as it is novel."—Witness and Church Adv.
"It promises to be conducted with signal taste and ability."—Literary World.
"Should these mixings [as to support, and concerning which the Editor need now have no fears] prove to be unfounded, we shall be among the first to rejoice in the high and honorable career before it."—Protestant Churchman.

MISS H. M. PHELPS, PRINCIPAL.

This Institution will open on the 1st of May and close in July.

In offering her services to the Public, Miss P. begs leave to say, that she was for several years connected with the Troy Female Seminary in the Departments of Natural Science, Ancient and Modern Languages.

More recently she has had charge of a Female Seminary near New York city, and from both of these situations can bring abundant and satisfactory testimonials of character and qualifications for the responsibilities she is about to assume.

The school is designed to be one of a high order for training the intellect and forming the character both morally and intellectually. The course of study will be thorough and extensive, embracing the various departments of a useful and ornamental education.

Miss Phelps has leave to refer to the following gentlemen:

The Right Rev. Alonzo Potter, Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

Valuable Theological Works.

History of the Church of Christ, by Henry Stebbing, D.D. 3 vols. 8vo.

* * * This learned work is valuable as being the continuation of Milner's Church History, and covers the eventful period from the Diet of Augsburg, in 1530 to the 18th century.

Bishop Hopkins' Complete Works. Royal 8vo.

* * * Bishop Hopkins' "Exposition of the Ten Commandments," and "The Lord's Prayer," taken in connection with his other works, form in themselves a body of divinity, the possession of which alone would enrich the library of a household. While he illuminates the understanding, he never fails to warm the affections to that elevated purity of life and thought which flows from true conceptions of the duties and obligations of man in relation to God.

The Christian Treasury; a selection of Standard Treatises on subjects of doctrinal and practical Christianity; containing Mayle's Discourses and Dissertations on the Scriptural Doctrines of Atonement and Sacrifice; Witherspoon on Regeneration; Boston's Crook in the Lot; Stuart's Letters on the Divinity of Christ; Guild's Moses Unveiled; Guild's Harmony of all the Prophets; Lee's Authenticity, Uninterrupted Preservation, and Credibility of the New Testament. Edited by Rev. T. S. Menses, L.L.D. royal 8vo.

The Bible, with the explanatory notes and practical observations of Rev. Thomas Scott. 3 vols. royal 8vo. This is the best edition of Scott's Bible, and is illustrated with very fine engravings and maps.

Neander's Life of St. Chrysostom, translated by Rev. J. C. Stapleton, 8vo.

Archbishop Leighton's Whole Works, with the Life of the author, by the Rev. John Norman Pearson, M. A., 2 vols. 8vo.

ASTON RIDGE SEMINARY

For Young Ladies.

THE COURSE OF STUDY comprises all the branches of a thorough English education, together with the Latin and French Languages, Music and Drawing.

INSTRUCTORS.—MRS. HUNTINGTON and MISS McCLEAN. Mrs. H. has a thorough knowledge of the French Language, having resided many years in Paris, and is acquainted with the best systems of education in European Seminaries.

MISS McCLEAN is an experienced and successful teacher of the English branches.

The Ancient Classics, English Literature, and the Natural Sciences, with the aid of Philosophical apparatus, are made the subjects of familiar lectures by the Rev. B. S. HUNTINGTON, A. M.

The French Language is spoken in the family.

SITUATION.—Aston Ridge is in Delaware County, Pa.; about two hours' ride from Philadelphia, via Chester; it is remarkable for its healthiness and beauty of scenery. The number of pupils being limited, they will here enjoy the retirement and advantages of a quiet Christian home.

TERMS.—Per session of five months, for Board and Tuition; French and Latin; Books and Stationery; and all ordinary charges for incidental expenses, $120.

No extra charges, except for Music and Drawing, at the usual rates.

Payment is always in advance.

Each pupil is expected to come provided with a silver fork and spoon, towels and table napkins, and to give six weeks' previous notice before leaving.

The sessions commence on the 1st of May and the first of November.

Pupils are received at any period, and are charged from the time they enter.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

"Besides faithful literary and religious instruction from well qualified preceptors, the pupils will enjoy the inestimable advantages of a retired, refined, and affectionate home, in one of the most beautiful positions in the state."—BISHOP POTTER.

"I should regard it a great privilege to have a daughter of mine under your care."—BISHOP COBBS.

"The character and influence of the principals have long been known to me.—Their pupils will find a combination of advantages, physical, mental and religious, such as few similar institutions can present."—REV. DR. TYNG, New York.

"The site is one of surpassing healthfulness and beauty. The high qualifications of the principals give the institution very peculiar claims to the attention of those who desire that their children may, during the dangerous period allotted to the business of education, be encircled by the conservative influences of a Christian household."—EPISCOPAL RECORDER.

"Seldom does so good an opportunity present itself for the acquisition of the French language. It is spoken in the family with a pronunciation and accent purely Parisian."—REV. ANTOINE VERREN, Rector of the French Episcopal Church, New York.

DR. LYONS' CHRISTIAN SONGS.

In press, and will shortly be published by GEORGE S. APPLETON, 148 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, CHRISTIAN SONGS, by the REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL. D. THIRD EDITION, with five additional songs. On paper of the best quality; price 50 cts.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A volume got up in a substantial and elegant style. Our readers have had frequent opportunity of judging of the peculiar excellence of its contents."—Philadelphia Saturday Courier.

"We have read these Songs with great pleasure, and regard them as at once chaste, graceful, and breathing genuine Christianity."—Penna. Inquirer.

"They are imbued with the spirit of piety, and have a just claim to the title, Christian Songs."—Banner of the Cross.

"They are truly poetical, though poetry appears in them constantly as the handmaid of religion."—N. Y. Churchman.

"We have read this elegantly printed volume with great delight. With rare excellencies, the author has no faults of style to mar the pleasure received from the perusal of his pages."—Protestant Churchman, N. Y.

"These brief poems are evidently the productions of a man of taste and genius. They are replete with sentiments of benevolence and piety."—Episcopal Recorder.

"The work contains thirty-one lyrical pieces, many of them of great merit."—Philad. North American.

"The present selection is small and choice; nothing has been admitted merely to swell the size of the book, but every song has decided merit and ability."—Hartford Calendar.

"This is a new edition of these much-admired poems."—Burlington Gazette.

"They indicate a strong mind, sound sentiments, and a bright fancy."—Richmond Enquirer.

"A volume which should grace the collection of every reader of sensibility and taste."—Germantown Telegraph.

"The volume is a gem of the first water."—Missionary, N. Y.

"We congratulate the religious world on this addition to its stock of sacred poetry."—Toronto Church.

"Oh, steal not thou my faith away," and an "Evening Hymn," included in these "Christian Songs," are two of the most beautiful sacred lyrics we have ever met with."—Neal's Gazette, Phila.

"It is really what it professes to be, a book of 'Christian Songs,' and one which every Christian of taste can and should appreciate."—Christian Repository.

"The versification of Dr. Lyons is smooth and graceful, his feelings those of a poet, his sentiments those of a Christian."—Presbyterian.

"Most of them are of a very high order."—Christian Chronicle.

"The subjects selected are chaste, elevated, and beautiful, and the poetry smooth, graceful, and flowing."—City Item.

"A perfect cluster of gems, set in fine work by the printer and binder, to be preserved for after ages."—Scott's Weekly Paper.

"They are no ephemeral pieces; they will live, and find their way to the heart, and delight the ear, among the few permanent contributions to our growing literature."—Baltimore Church Times.

"This elegant volume contains a collection of lyrical pieces, whose merits as sacred songs will commend them to the favorable regards of the lovers of poetry."—Christian Observer.

"They have been very extensively copied—a proof that they appealed to the finer feelings of many hearts."—Phila. Saturday Post.

"The author is a true poet."—Philadelphia Lotus.

Summer Retreat for Children,

AT NEWPORT, R. I.

A gentleman having a delightful residence a short distance from Newport, R. I., and near the sea shore, proposes to take into his family, for the summer months, five or six little girls, between the ages of 6 and 12 years. The advantages of his estate for sea bathing and healthy air are not surpassed by any other on the island. The studies of the children entrusted to his care will be carried forward under the tuition of his lady, who will also extend over them the watchful care of a parent.

To parents proposing to travel, and to those seeking for a healthy summer abode for their children, rare advantages are here offered. Further information in regard to terms, &c. may be had by applying to the "Editor of the Banner of the Cross."

The Way of the Church with Children.

"Remember, now, thy Creator, in the days of thy youth."
Ecclesiastes xii. 1.

There is nothing more observable, in Holy Scripture, than the way in which it deals with children. The sad fact of their inherited depravity, it every where admits. The solemn truth, that without holiness none shall see the Lord, it every where presents. It never, for a moment, loses sight of the great plan of God, in their redemption, edification and salvation; through Him, Who died for them, and rose again. Yet it addresses them in no harsh words. It lays upon them no hard yokes. It never overloads, it never worries, them. It approaches them with the arguments of affection. It addresses them in the language of love. It asks, of all, their all; and, yet, in words which none can fail to feel the words of utmost love: "My son, give Me thy heart."

The world would wink their weakness out of sight; and not so much as hint the thought of sinfulness. It wins them to its way by flattery and falsehood. Its appeal is to their vanity, to their sensual nature, to their self-will. It would postpone the thought of death. It would postpone the thought of duty. It would postpone all serious thoughts. She teaches no self-distrust. She teaches no self-control. She teaches no self-sacrifice. Her only lesson is, enjoy the day! The only text that she would ever take, to preach from, she perverts from Holy Scripture, as Satan did, when he would tempt our Lord: "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes." No word, in all her preaching, of that solemn closing clause, which gives to human life its end and equipoise: "but know thou, that, for all these things, God will bring thee into judgment."

Unhappily, the world is not the only teacher that misleads the young. There are systems that are called religious, that are quite as dangerous: antagonist, it may be; but antagonist in error. The system, that forbids a smile; the system, that takes all the rose-colour from life; the system, that would hang the universe in sack-cloth. It may succeed in making children miserable. It must result in making hypocrites, or infidels, of men. They may begin with Puritan, but they will end in Pharisee.

And, between these opposites, there lie in wait, for youthful hearts, innumerable shapes and shades, that lay their claim to Christian names, while they show any thing but Christian principles or Christian tempers. There is the theory, that leaves the child to his own way, entirely, till he comes of age, to answer for himself; as if the Devil would have grace to wait for him as long as that: and the theory, that would stimulate and terrify the very infant into paroxysms of penitence, and imagined if not invented experiences. There is the Selections.

The following article is on a subject which comes home to the hearts of most of those who dwell in this habitable world. Parents, especially those who are inclined to think that their peculiar offspring are either better or worse than all past, present, or future children, may find instruction and comfort in perusing this article which our limits have compelled us to abridge. The admirable lines above connect well with this article, for it treats too of "the Flowers of God," the fairest and sweetest that bloom on earth, so fair, so sweet that He esteems them meet to be transplanted to His own Paradise.

Our readers will also see that this article connects well with the selection following, which shows under what "care" alone "childhood" may be made bright and blessed as the season of heavenly promise.

Childhood and its Reminiscences.

How wonderful is the nature of childhood! Inhale for a few minutes the subtle, etherizing reminiscences as they rise in your mind; and, when you are dead to all you have learned and it since, tell us what you see. Is it not a mingled scene, like Shakspeare's Midsummer Night's Dream?—half fairy, half human; but the fairy-land, the real terra firma! Strange wanderings and losings of our way! Earthly loves, and airy jealousies, and parents' harsh decrees; with elfish gambols and tricks between; communings with cobwebs and pease-blossoms, sucking with a bee, and fondling foolish asses' heads! All seen by a range pellucid light, as if the brightness of heaven were reflected through the troubled waters of life. Such, at least, are the visions we behold when we summon them from the depths of our memories, and bid them tell us what manner of children we were; now appearing in playful forms, advancing and retreating, and peeping at us from behind rosy clouds; now nodded in one lonely little earth-bound figure, looking fearfully around, with the black clouds gathering, and sometimes leaping to appear to all when we do call.

So are all childhood reminiscences thus? By no means. Our natures there are, gross and dense, seeing nothing in the deeds of their lives for the mud and filth the stream is carrying. Thit. Some, hard, and cold, and common, who care not to live and others; sinning or sinned against, who dare not. Once a few happy beings have only to cast down a serene eye, before deep, to see the smooth, pure sand, with grains of gold theping in it, and not a weed or a bubble between that and tismresent selves.

What is a child? That is the question. Is it merely what it child to the outward eye, a lesser version of humanity, a weaker throw of ourselves—who wears short frocks and eats egg-on the, goes earlier to bed and sounder to sleep, has less sense, by itlength, less knowledge, and less of everything? No. A of Glad deep mystery, which all our reminiscences cannot un-Theirough they may give a clue to it—who has a hidden life tual in, which it instinctively knows to be foolishness to the brow, and betrays to no one, not even to the fondest mother—heave the strongest natural guarantee for another state of being time, shall cavil at a future existence he cannot understand, that sh has already passed through one he cannot explain?—their fe, with the faith of a saint, the fancy of a poet, the fervency of an idiot, and the subtlety of the very fiend him- improves us with its innocence, and puzzles us with dness—who is given to be our charge, and set to be ole. This is the real child; more different even from than it is less in degree; not even as the bud to the analogy fails both ways, but rather like that un-material we know so little of—once vegetable, now he relics of another order of things—going through a and gradual process ere it issue upon the world in common coal, or, rarely though it be, in that of the This is the real child; not to be confounded with are, in truth, only lesser specimens of our own dull selves—human small coal—with no other voca- wear longer frocks or tails, break bigger playthings, wine, and spend more money, grow taller, wiser, and Belove God has ever thought of the immense difference of feeling unto salv different children inspire you? The real respect cipate my you watch some mysterious little shrine of the your Crpursues its own butterfly thoughts, and basks in its would hal sunshine, feeling absolutely honored if it con- His, at alquit its inner fairy-land, and bestow its sweet folly tism. Y, upon you! Or the weary indifference with which yourself necessary civilities to some little machine for the firmation, bores you somehow with the mere sound of its in- now, to g and whose flat truisms you feel inclined to snub on the Ciry! Or, again, the positive hatred you take for some odious little incorporation of selfishness, all ripe for every vulgar end of our nature, whose very childhood is an unfair defence to it, and whom you long to get for one hour into your power, and feel that the most malicious castigation you could invent would be only a duty to your fellow-creatures, and a relief to your conscience!

It seems to us that there are two legitimate periods for deep parental anxiety at the very outset of their children's lives. First, when the child is born, to ascertain that it is provided with all the necessary mechanism for a healthy and active body; and, secondly, when the mind begins to show itself, to make sure that it be endowed with the requisite amount of childlike-ness for the formation of a true and estimable character. Gifts and talents are another thing—capricious in the signs and times of their budding, the darkness of a late dawn often mistaken by common observers for the dullness of a dark day. But if the child be but childlike enough, if it have but enough of that sort of foolishness bound up in its heart, it may be destitute of brilliant parts or particular gifts, but the parents may rely, that, as the imperfection of this world goes, it will turn out a sound, if not an interesting character, in spite of the greatest mismanagement on their parts.

People talk such nonsense about precocity! As if it were only connected with genius and singularity. But genius is not precocity; if anything it is exactly the reverse. Genius, in truth, is something more childlike still than childhood—more foolish, more fanciful, and more faithful, and incorrigibly so for life. Instead of anticipating in childhood the mind of a man, it retains in manhood the heart of a child. Every genius is a child, and every child is a genius, morslly, if not intellectually, or there is little to be hoped from him. But it is your wise, prudent, hard, sedate children, who are really precocious, born with a kind of spurious native experience of their own, who naturally antedate that caution and cunning which others so painfully acquire; keeping out of scrapes and disappointments, because they have none of that love and trust which lead other children in. This is the precocity parents should be afraid of. They will have a child who will save them a world of present trouble, who will commit no blunders, and break no bounds, save his pocket-money, and spare his clothes, spy out all his brothers' and sisters' faults, and report all the servants' peccadilloes, and be probably held up in the family as a standard of circumspection and prudence, or, what is falsely called up to a certain age in juvenile life, of "goodness;" but let them not rejoice; they will have a son who will desert his father if he be unfortunate, grind his mother if she be a widow, bear a smooth character to the world, but a hard heart to his own; turn against his parents in their old age the very character they falsely bestowed in his youth; and in addition to this, have the strongest health and longest life of the family; for there is no life-preserver like the precocity of a narrow spirit and a cold heart.

Children are the fruits of the fall. Born, as it were, before sin had taken universal possession; as if the last lingering light of innocence had beamed upon them for a moment, and then sunk forever below the horizon. We see its smile impressed upon them, shining through all the sin that reigns in their members; making them easy of faith, and pure in heart, and fearless of the morrow; but waxing fainter and fainter, as their minds gradually strike deeper into the common soil of life, till they are ripe to receive that better light, which has been revealed to our understandings in lieu of that which was forfeited by our natures. * * * * *

Most children cry, and it is a safe and desirable sign. Some cry to please themselves, and some to please their mothers. There are only two sorts who abstain, as different as light and darkness, though often confounded. The one is the haughty spirit, the other the sullen temper. The first, with gentle usage and implicit trust, you need never despair of; the latter, alas! will tire out the fondest physician.

In contradistinction to the subject of naughtiness, there is a word we have alluded to before, which we must inquire a little into—one oftener taken in vain than any other in infant education, and which, in our recollection, was the enigma of the little vocabulary. We mean that magic word good. In children of sense and principle, the vagueness of this term is most distressing; implying as it does, first one thing and then another, and nothing long. Sometimes a strong exertion of the will; sometimes a total abeyance of every faculty; now a dryness in the atmosphere, which keeps their hair in curl; and now a letter by post, or a hamper from the country, which puts their mother in good humor. With us this word is associated with very mixed feelings. Certainly it was a pleasure, as all rare surprises were; but still it always brought nervous misgivings, and fearful look-ings forward to a long future, in which more would be expected from us, and less on our part likely to be fulfilled; for how were we ever to be sure of being good again, when we never know how we had contrived to be so in the present instance? From our own recollections, however, and much subsequent observation, we should say that the real maternal beau ideal of the term consists in a keen power of discrimination between the value of a stuff gown and a silk one, accompanied by a general constitutional slowness of circulation. And a reference to foreign languages confirms this view. The French synonyme is sage, wise; the German, artig, polite; neither of them in the least childlike, but both corresponding with the quality implied. Every wise child must know the difference between stuff and silk, and no polite child would ever think of trampling it under foot.

That's why stories of good children, who are always prudent, prim, and precise, are so distasteful to children of any promise at all. They feel the misnomer, and their natural instinct rises against it. Parents give themselves much trouble, and their children much torment in trying to enforce this many-headed term; but they may rely upon it, in nine cases out of ten, a good, open, honorable naughtiness, is a far better thing.

Where there is really a good child, let us watch and pray, for it is a fearful gift to a parent's heart. We have known one—meek, loving, patient—the unconscious pattern of every Christian virtue, with a conscience too tender for our coarse ones not to offend. Oh! what would we have given for more of those qualities which others take so much pains to repress? She was good, if you will—goodness personified—too good, alas! to live.

But though a child can neither naturally practice nor appreciate that real goodness which results from the ripened discipline of the mind, yet there is no period of our lives in which we have a more delicate sense of many beauties and refinements of character. The enthusiastic admiration children take for some plain faces is a puzzle to us, with our pride-of-the-eye and lust-of-the-flesh ideas, and may be invariably traced to some sweetness of expression, or gracefulness of action, or to something too subtle, perhaps, for us even to take cognizance of. Paleness and slightness they are usually taken by, and dress greatly guides their first likings and dislikings, as it does those of all sensitive, artistic minds. Their antipathies too are equally strong. Loud voices, and red faces, and boisterous manners, are ineffably disgusting to them, especially in women, for they are great judges of what becomes each sex. We remember hating a good lady (and do so still) who clapped her chest, and switched her petticoats violently as she walked, and was perpetually performing the most fortissimo trumpet passages on her nose. In judgment whereof upon her, it was settled among us that she should be called Mrs. Pimlico—this being the ugliest name in the world to our ears—eat nothing but mutton skin and pork fat, and only walked two inches at a step. Accordingly, an experimental trial of this rate of progress was instantly made; a full hour was spent in getting across a small back-yard, and next day it was wondered why our little legs were so stiff.

It is strange that while volumes over volumes have been written to show the wonderful adaptation of this outer world to the wants and wishes of man, few have thought how tenfold more wonderful it is in the case of a child. Imagine what it must be to see the whole playground of this fair world spread before him, strewn all over with treasures, thicker and richer than in Aladdin's garden; novelty, wonder, and delight, in leaf, flower, and stone, and play in everything! Think of the boundless abundance above his head, beneath his feet, meeting his eye and courting his hand. Flowers growing for him to pluck and peep into; trees made with branches for him to climb, and fantastic roots for him to sit in; butterflies fluttering and dancing purposely to lead him on; cobwebs spread on a level with his eye; the spider laying its eggs in a tuft of wool on a green leaf, and the frost embroidering a crust of point lace over a dead one for his wonder; and then that beau ideal of his fancy—that paragon of his imagination, the bird's nest, with its exquisite speckled contents, which it would be hard to think was not built for him!

And not his Creator alone has thus ministered to the one prevailing craving of his nature; his fellow man, in spite of himself, is always playing into his hands. Every stack he rears, every ditch he digs, every gate he hangs, is one word for himself and two for the child. Nothing comes amiss—new houses, and old ruins, and church-yards, and pigs and poultry, and lambs, and puppies, and kittens, and all sorts of furniture—everything natural and artificial, vegetable and animal, is all his own; to say nothing of those two grand primeval playthings, most desired and most forbidden, more exquisitely fascinating than every other, the alpha and the omega of all the rest—fire and water!

Playing materials are as plentiful as the air he breathes. You can hardly place him where they are not. The great difficulty with hard-hearted parents is to find some hole to shut him up in where he shall have, as the term goes, "nothing to play with;" for what seem bare and void to eyes which the cataract of age and prose has overspread, are full of beckoning, whispering fairies to his. But then comes the first, and great, and perpetual sorrow of his life—the difficulty of knowing what he may play with and what he may not—a difficulty, poor child! which he never overcomes to the end of his days.

One would think that the costly and ingenious playthings of the offspring of the rich would give them an undue advantage over those of the poor; but, no—play is too essential to a child to depend upon the amount of his father's income. Watch a little tattered urchin; a stick, a puddle, or the dust of the road, is all he needs; a piece of chalk and a flagstone is extra luxury. Country has most materials, but town has plenty. We have seen a little girl help a toddling two-year-old sister across the street, with "Meggy, come away, and feel of the bonny beast," and both stand fondling a raw calf, hanging head downwards at the butcher's door, as if it had been an ermine muff; while a child, of a year old, sat on the step, as happy with a dead herring as if it had been a wax doll.

Deprive the little being even of every outward sign of amusement, and you can't stop the inward impulse. Have you not seen some little fairy spinning round and round on the points of its toes, repeating the same silly jingle of words, with happy purposelessness, living in an atmosphere of spontaneous, self-sustaining enjoyment; not touching the outer world so much with its elastic spirit as the floor with its tiny feet? Or do you not remember a still more passive and independent mode of entertainment, shutting our eyes suddenly and seeing the phantoms of the last seen object dimly traced within our closed lids; or looking at the sun, and then enclosing a ball of fire, now red, now yellow, dilating and contracting, and at last exploding like a shell, in darkness visible; or pressing our eyeballs and seeing the lightnings playing on each side, or circles of lurid light revolving round on the uttermost horizon of our inward sight? or, when tired of these, making strange melody in our hearts with eyes wide open, dreaming and floating in a listless element, as in a state of self-mesmerism? Childhood was made to play, as man to mourn; children do gather grapes of thorns, and figs of thistles.

The death of a child! The words are full of a strange and moving meaning; winter following spring, nightfall succeeding to dawn! Fanciful ideas crowd upon the mind hand in hand with solemn truths. That little being who knew nothing here, now to know the end of all things! That vacant intelligence which wondered at the ticking of a watch, now to understand the mystery of its own being! My own child, who was to hang upon my lips for instruction, now advanced where one word from its own would be a revelation to me! That helpless creature, borne from arm to arm, guarded by day and watched by night, too shy to bear the approach of a strange face, now launched alone in the "vast profound," escorted by intelligences divine but strange! Will there be one among that crowd of disfranchised spirits who will claim an early affinity with it? Will the little brother who departed a year ago recognize this as the babe who entered the bonds of flesh, as he was leaving them? Or will it be one of the first signs of a better existence that the ties of blood are not needed in it?

Of all the sorrows in this world, that for the death of a young child brings with it the readiest healing. Would you grudge its having received promotion without paying the purchase-money?—the rights of citizenship without residence?—the certificate of humanity without the service?—the end and aim of life without this weary life itself? The death of a child is an enigma, but one which solves many others. The mind may dream and wonder, and form strange conclusions from the weakness of that life which has yielded to the strong arm of death; but two truths remain distinct, more plainly read on that cold marble cherub than on any other form of lifeless clay, and those are, the worthlessness of that breath which a child is summoned to render up, and the freeness of that grace which a child is able to inherit.

We remember a remarkable dream which occurred at a time when a little being came but to leave us again, whom we hardly thought could have claimed a place in our heart but for the void it left; and it always recurs to our mind when we hear of new life and old death meeting thus instantly on the threshold.

We dreamt that we were conveyed by some mysterious guide to the entrance of this earth. It was a kind of gallery, through which angelic beings, winged and beautiful, were rapidly passing, all towards the earth—some with grave, others with hopeful aspects; their expressions as various as they were legible.

"What does this mean?" we said. "Who are the passing spirits who go all one way, and why are their countenances so various?"

Our companion replied—

"They are guardian angels, each on his way to take charge of a new-born infant. They know not its ultimate doom, they know the sphere to which it is born, and the probable and temptations it will be exposed to.—Look at that angel," he said, "with the serious mien, as if a hard duty were before him! His charge is the child of the rich and noble of the world who will bring him up in pride and luxury; and his heart grows hard and selfish, and selfishness in high places has the most terrible sorrows, and without sorrow the voice of his good angel hardly be heard."

"And see that spirit who passes with eager, hopeful mien. To him is committed the child of a vicious father, who, at this moment that a child is born unto him. But open his eyes, and he will find a combi- of the principals have their pupils will find a combi- mental and religious, such can present."—REV. DR.

Then another spirit passed, with firm but peaceful aspect.

"His charge will be arduous. The child now before us has wilful and tumultuous passions, and his heart is stubborn and perverse, and he will defy authority, and wrong, and the world will say there is no redemption for him, and even his father's face will be turned from him. The silence of a sick chamber, a mother will plead in his name, and the child of many prayers shall yet be brought to the fold."

Then came one with anxious mien, and he was a genius who would win the applause and idolatry of the masses; and a second, with heavenly compassion, beat his breast, and he was hurrying to the obscure and lowly; and a third, calm and peaceful, presided over the even tenor of a poor orphan, who, the blessings of sainted parents; and a fourth, full of anxiety, who hastened to receive his charge from a father of his contents."—Philadelphia

And a fifth, whose countenance of heavenly woe we ask the cause of; and many more, all going to the posts—to the children of the good and the bad—the low—the careless and the unbelieving, till we of asking; when, suddenly, came one, distinguished by the radiance of joy upon him.

"What is his charge?" we said. "Surely it is of some future saint upon earth?"

"No," said our conductor, "he is the angel of heaven, who has died at its birth, and he is going to carry it to heaven."

And then we awoke and found it was only a dream, ever since then we have never heard of the death of a child without thinking of the joy on that angel's countenance.

It is a grave and momentous question, not yet fully solved, whether children should be taught religion, but how much to be taught. The present day sets little bounds on the minds of children, and many minds will sin and suffer much ere they recover from the disgust of over-repletion. Now and then a child is born with the shadow of death and the brightness of heaven both set on his brow, who lives in religious thoughts, as Mozart did in musical, and leaves us to be the joy of angels. But oftener much a little hypocrite is manufactured with the stamp of premature vanity of the worst kind upon him, who prates of holy things by rote, and lives to be the disgrace of men. But with children of good health and average understanding, the relish for religious things, although unfailing, is so exquisitely delicate, that the only rule we can observe is not to overdo. Long services and prayers, and strict Sundays, and all the routine of so-called evangelical teaching, are almost, without exception, vanity and vexation of spirit with them. Short prayers and beautiful hymns they will love; but even here, if we recall our own childhood, we shall remember that every child associates the ideas with some fanciful theory agreeable to his own imagination, or reduces the words to some jingling gibberish agreeable to his own ear—innocent, but absurd; for the whimsical ways of a child are foolishness to us, and wickedness to most Sunday School teachers. We remember always saying—"We believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth; and in all things visible and invisible." We were ready to believe in anything in the world; and thankful we were, when time had rectified the mistake, that no one had ever cross-questioned us upon it.

But these things matter not. The form of sound words, as near as possible, is all we can give for the winged thoughts of religion, which blow where they list, to pause and nestle in; and not too much even of these. And, above all, we must forbear to question a child on its religious feelings. All high thoughts are indefinable to himself, and all indefinable thoughts shy to others; a child who can explain such is an impostor. Every germ of life, spiritual or material, is incomprehensible to us, and if brought prematurely into daylight perishes.

But a child is a praying creature, though he prays indiscriminately. We always prayed in distress. We remember praying when our mother was ill, and when we had dropped a sixpence and could not find it. We prayed in all earnestness upon occasions which we should think profane now; but we were a child then, and "of such is the kingdom of heaven."

A child's ideas of what heaven is are among the deepest mysteries of our nature. The captive soul's involuntary conjectures of its native land—now rising into the sublimest poetry—now grovelling in the basest materialism, according as it strikes against the stones of its prison walls, or catches light through the chinks between them. This is sacred ground we should especially forbear to plant or trample in. General ideas of beauty, goodness, and happiness, in the presence of God, with joys at his right hand for evermore, and angels ever bright and fair, we may dwell on; but having thus lifted him up from earth, let us not presume to question him whither he wanders. Even with the best intentions we may err, whenever we seek to define what we know as little about as himself, and, perhaps, less. It is a mournful picture, and tells a sorrowful tale, that anecdote of the little Scotch girl who asked her mother what heaven was, and Newton and Hon. Judge Bell, Philadelphia.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

Clergymen, Students, and all in quest of Books at Low Prices, are informed that the subscribers keep constantly on hand a very large and choice collection of old and new Theological, Classical and Miscellaneous Books; and would be pleased to receive orders for the same. We have also an awe—half natural, half acquired—of the very name of heaven, unless we render it irreverently cheap, which withholds them from asking for close details; or, if a chance child persist in doing so, we may depend he is a little radical in embryo who will never get there.

But it is time that we should leave our subject, and commit the children, whose rights and wrongs we have been thus desultorily considering, to the guardianship of their best friends or worst enemies—their natural protectors or unnatural tormentors, namely to their parents. To the outward eye there may seem to be an immense difference between the position of children in life. Some accident shows us a family of the rich and a family of the poor standing together—the one with feathers and plumes, dolls and whips, and bright cheeks—the other with bangles and bare feet, and dirty faces, and, instead of a toy, some necessary burden, as a foretaste of a life of labor, in their hands; and a pang goes through us at the inequality of their fates. But this is a wrong view. It is not the inequality of fortunes that affects a child, but the inequality of parents. The parent is the child's fate—its good or evil genius—under whose auspices life will smile or be the fortunes ever so low, or frown, be they ever so high. The poor and tender mother will make her children happier, though dragging them up in poverty, than the rich and harsh one, though lapping them in luxury. Question many a memory what it envied other children most in the days of its childhood, and it will tell you, with painful tenacity, that it envied them not the toy, or the carriage, or the delicate fare, or the rich clothing, but the tender mother and the indulgent father; that it envied them the mother's praise—the word of encouragement in due season, and felt that this alone would have made a sunshine in a dark place.

Children may be neglected or spoiled; servants and governesses, uncles and aunts, may rule their fate to their present weal or woe; but there is no happiness and no misery which affect our future reminiscences so surely—which sinks so deep into the heart, to wither or gladden it in the trials of life—as that which we owe in the days of our childhood to our parents.

But this is a subject which deserves a chapter to itself. We would only add, that in asserting the inequality of a child's lot to consist not in birth or fortune, but in the nature of their parents, we have asserted the greatest inequality of all. Children are born of the tender and the harsh, the pious and the unbelieving, the thoughtful and the careless; and their trials will be accordingly. Their and our only part is to remember, that "the Lord is the Maker of them all."

The following is one of four sermons preached "at the season of confirmation, in St. Mary's Church, Burlington, (N. J.) in the weeks before Lent, 1848, by the Rector and Bishop of the Diocese."—Bishop Doane

In connection with the above it shows the true voice of the Church on the same important subject.

The Way of the Church with Children.

"Remember, now, thy Creator, in the days of thy youth."
Ecclesiastes xii. 1.

There is nothing more observable, in Holy Scripture, than the way in which it deals with children. The sad fact of their inherited depravity, it never where admits. The solemn truth, that without holiness none shall see the Lord, it every where presents. It never, for a moment, loses sight of the great plan of God, in their redemption, edification and salvation; through Him, Who died for them, and rose again. Yet it addresses them in no harsh words. It lays upon them no hard yokes. It never overloads, it never worries, them. It approaches them with the arguments of affection. It addresses them in the language of love. It asks, of all, their all; and, yet, in words which none can fail to feel the word; of utmost love: "My son, give Me thy heart."

The world would wink their weakness out of sight; and not so much as hint the thought of sinfulness. It wins them to its way by flattery and falsehood. Its appeal is to their vanity, to their sensual nature, to their self-will. It would postpone the thought of death. It would postpone the thought of duty. It would postpone all serious thoughts. She teaches no self-distrust. She teaches no self-control. She teaches no self-sacrifice. Her only lesson is, enjoy the day! The only text that she would ever take, to preach from, she perverts from Holy Scripture, as Satan did, when he would tempt our Lord: "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes." No word, in all her preaching, of that solemn closing clause, which gives to human life its end and equipoise: "but know thou, that, for all these things, God will bring thee into judgment."

Unhappily, the world is not the only teacher that misleads the young. There are systems that are called religious, that are quite as dangerous: antagonist, it may be; but antagonist in error. The system, that forbids a smile; the system, that takes all the rose-colour from life; the system, that would hang the universe in sack-cloth. It may succeed in making children miserable. It must result in making hypocrites, or infidels, of men. They may begin with Puritan, but they will end in Pharisee.

And, between these opposites, there lie in wait, for youthful hearts, innumerable shapes and shades, that lay their claim to Christian names, while they show any thing but Christian principles or Christian tempers. There is the theory, that leaves the child to his own way, entirely, till he comes of age, to answer for himself; as if the Devil would have grace to wait for him as long as that: and the theory, that would stimulate and terrify the very infant into paroxysms of penitence, and imagined, if not invented, experiences. There is the theory, that denies to children an admission into that heavenly kingdom, which Jesus Christ declared was theirs; at the same time that He taught baptism as its only entrance; and the theory, that insists on infant baptism, at the very earliest moment; and then leaves the heavenly grace to work its way against a sinful nature, and a wicked world, uninfluenced by counsel, unaided by example, unsanctified by prayer. There is the theory, that never speaks to children of their soul, or of their Saviour; of their duty here, or of their account hereafter; and the theory, that forever dings the childish ear with words of sternness and severity; and would scare the soul into salvation.

What a contrast, with all these, the "still, small voice," serene as summer dew, and searching, like it, into every turn and tendril of the youthful heart, in which the Holy Scripture speaks to children; as, in those gracious words, which I repeated from the Royal Preacher, as the text and theme of my discourse, this morning: "Remember, now, thy Creator, in the days of thy youth." A text, like this, can need no sermon. It is text and sermon both. It addresses the young. It appeals to their heart. It speaks to them of their Creator.

It addresses the young. They have fallen, as it were, but just now from His hand. The world is new about them. It is what Eden was to Adam, when he woke from that deep sleep; all beauty, all fragrance, all delight. There is verdure upon every tree. There is perfume in every flower. There is freshness in every fruit. And there is companionship in their enjoyment. Their social nature meets response. The very air is balm. Not a movement, on the earth, or in the heavens, that is not made to music. No feeling, but of joy. No dream, but of delight.

It appeals to their heart. It is that, in them, which is the tenderest, and yet, the truest. It has not been hardened by the world. It has not been seduced by the Devil. It has blushes, yet, and it has tears. It can feel, yet, and it can remember. It has not forgotten, yet, that it has a father. It is not ashamed, yet, to confess a mother. It yet can yearn. It can yet be grateful. It still can love.

It is the time, now, to speak to them of their Creator. He spread the earth with verdure. He filled the air with fragrance. He hung the heavens with majesty. He made all nature beauty to your eye, or music to your ear. He filled your heart with pulses; and made them quick with pleasure, and tuned them all for joy. And, is it you that shall forget Him? Is it by you that He shall cease to be remembered? Is it you that shall not love Him? Is the tree, where your first sports were shadowed from the heat of noon, forgotten? Is the brook forgotten, where your summer Saturdays were spent? Have you forgotten your father's smile? Your mother's tear? And will you not remember your Creator, now? Will you refuse your Heavenly Father, when He says, "My son, give Me thy heart!"

And how well in keeping with the voice of Scripture, and the way of nature, is the dealing of the Church with children. She takes them all, at their first breathing, to her arms. She sprinkles them, in their Redeemer's name, with the baptismal water, which shall make them His. She lays them at her full and fragrant breast. She nurtures them with "the sincere milk" of the life-giving word. She feeds them with convenient food. She guides their tottering feet. She tunes their stammering tongues. They hear her voice in prayer, and learn to pray. They hear her voice in psalms, and sacred songs, and learn to sing. They listen to her old majestic Creeds, and they fall in upon their hearts. They join in her deep penitential litanies, and they are inwoven with their souls. They hear, in her, the holy word of God, and it imbues their lives. They are catechized by her, in the way in which they ought to go, and their feet learn to love it. She keeps ever before them their baptismal pledges. She keeps ever before them their baptismal hopes. Her voice is like their mother's, in the lullabies that soothed their infancy; and they are swayed by it, in childhood. Her hand is like their mother's, when it led them through the fields, at evening twilight, or to the house of God, on the fresh morning of the sacred day; and they are guided by it, in their youth. They cannot tell when they first thought of God. They cannot tell when they first knelt in prayer. Their faith is an undoubting faith. Their service is an habitual service. The Cross, which was impressed upon their brow, in Baptism, the catechising has imprinted, through the heavenly grace, upon their hearts. They go up, at the due time, to receive, in Confirmation, the measures of the Spirit, that shall strengthen them to bear it on, through life. And, in their First Communion, they embrace it with a fuller and more fervent love; and make it theirs forever.

"Mere human energy shall faint,
And youthful vigour cease;
But those who wait upon the Lord
In strength shall still increase.

They with unwearied step shall tread
The path of life divine;
With growing ardour onward move,
With growing brightness shine.

On eagles' wings, they mount, they soar,
On wings of faith and love;
Till, past the sphere of earth and sin,
They rise to Heaven above."

Beloved children, the sons and daughters of my heart, whom God has given to me, to feed and guide, by grace, through faith, unto salvation, you have perceived my meaning, you will anticipate my desire. It is you, that I would have remember, now, your Creator, in the days of your youth. It is you, that I would have to give your hearts to Him. You, that are not yet His, at all, devote yourselves, this day, to Him, in holy Baptism. You, that are His, in Baptism, resolve, this day, to give yourselves anew to Him, in Confirmation. You, that, in Confirmation, have received the Spirit's sacred seal, determine, now, to go to Him, as He would have you, Who died for you, on the Cross; and do, as He commands you, in remembrance of Himself. And you, that there have tasted that the Lord is gracious, hold fast to the beginning of your confidence. Daily renew your vows, daily renew your prayers, daily renew your tears; that He may keep you His forever.

"Now, in thy youth, beseech of Him,
Who giveth, upbraiding not,
That His light in thy heart become not dim,
And His love be unforgot;
And thy God, in the darkest of days will be,
Greenness, and beauty, and strength, to thee."

Some Rules for the Conduct of Human Life, &c.

(By Archbishop Synge, 1659—1741.)

Harmony in music is such an agreement between the notes that they are sounded by voices or instruments as renders the whole delightful to the ear. Where this agreement is wanting, the sound of notes is not harmony, but jarring. And wherever there is such an agreement between things or persons, as makes the consideration thereof pleasant to a good and judicious man; this also, by an easy metaphor, we call harmony.

Such an harmony as there is between all the works of God, where it is not disturbed by the evil practices of men. "The Lord by wisdom hath founded the earth; by understanding hath he established the Heaven."—Prov. iii. 19. Such an harmony there is between righteous and good men in their mutual intercourse one with the other. "Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."—Ps cxxxiii. 1. And such an harmony there is in the mind of every truly righteous man as often as he considers the agreement that is between his his own thoughts, desires, words, and actions, in that which is good. "Our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshy wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world."—2 Cor. i. 12.

Now, that you may not contribute to the interruption of this harmony, either within yourself, or in or with others, observe not only the rules of a wise life, which I have already laid down, but also these that follow:—

Rule 1.—Take care to fix right principles well in your mind—for want of which men are often various and unsteady in their actions, and uneasy to themselves and others. Therefore,

Rule 2.—When you have well fixed your principles, to be sure always to speak and act according to them, and never to vary from them for the sake of party or any other worldly consideration. For this doing, God, your own conscience, and good men will approve of you; nor ought you to be moved at the censures of fools or wicked men.

Rule 3.—Whatever you do or speak, let it always be done in its proper order, and in a manner suitable to the thing itself. For example: that which is of greatest importance, let it first be taken care of. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness."—Matt. vi. 33. Let serious things be spoken and done seriously. Let good and friendly offices be performed with charity and good-will—"not grudgingly or of necessity."—2 Cor. ix. 7. And the like I may say of all other your works and actions, which, when they are not only good but also suitable to the importance which they do, or ought to carry in them, are pleasant to be beheld and observed; but when there is an incongruity between the thing spoken or done, and the manner of speaking or doing it, it becomes more or less nauseous, and sometimes ridiculous. "Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour; so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour."—Ecc. x. 1.

Rule 4.—Be in reality what you are willing to be thought to be. Every man desires to be thought honest, just, and virtuous, that hereby he may gain love and good-will from all that know him. Now, the only sure way to be thought so is really to be so. "Hypocrisy may for awhile deceive the world; but in a little time it will be detected, and render an hypocrite odious to men, as he always is to God."

Rule 5.—If you would preserve a delightful harmony in your own mind, and the like between yourself, and all with whom you have any intercourse, possess your mind with an universal sincere love for all mankind, friends, strangers, and even enemies, if you have any. If you cannot always do this for their sakes, who are of the same nature with you: yet do it for the sake of God, your Creator, Who commands it, and of Christ your Redeemer, Who, "while we were yet sinners, (and thereby enemies,) died for us."—Rom. v. 8. Root out and banish from your mind all envy, malice, hatred, and ill nature. These are the storms and tempests of the soul, and the chief causes of all those hurricanes which disturb the world; in which I hope you will have no share. "Let all bitterness and wrath, and anger and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you with all malice. And be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."—Eph. iv. 31, 32. Particularly never be angry with a man, and much less hate him, for being of a different persuasion from you in matters of religion. "The servant of the Lord must not strive (except it be by the strength of his arguments) but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient; in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves."—2 Tim. ii. 24, 25. In many cases you innocently may, and sometimes you ought by lawful means, to defend yourselves from an injury; but never do or say anything beyond what is necessary for your own just defence or by way of revenge. "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath. For it is written, vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord. Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink. For in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. (and, it may be, melt him down into love and friendship.) Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." Rom. xii. 19, &c. "Scarce any man is capable of hating another, who, he finds, sincerely loves him."

Rule 6.—Easiness and innocent pleasantry in conversation very much tends to maintain harmony and good agreement among those who converse together. Let this, therefore, always be your care, in whatever company you shall be; let your discourse, in your turn, be rational, and your wit always harmless. Abstain from all biting and satirical jests and speeches. "There is no man but will take it ill to be set in an odious or ridiculous light; although it be but in sport."

Rule 7.—Be always ready, to your power, to relieve the poor, and help the distressed. This will give great delight to your mind, and gain you the good will of all that know you. Remember the fortune you enjoy is not your own but God's. He is the proprietor, you are only the steward of it, and must one day give a strict account of your stewardship. "If, therefore, in your account there may be many large articles for things that are unnecessary and might have been spared, and but a few small ones for the relief of the poor, the fatherless, and the widow; can you ever hope to receive the reward of a faithful steward or servant?"

(To be continued.)

ALLEGORICAL.—A traveller, setting out upon a long journey, was assailed on the road by curs, mastiffs, and half-grown puppies, which came out from their kennels to bark at him as he passed along. He often dismounted from his horse to drive them back with stones and sticks, into their hiding places. This operation was repeated every day, and sometimes as often as twenty times a day. The consequence was, that more than half the traveller's time was consumed in chasing those dogs and puppies. A last he was overtaken by a neighbour, who was going the same road, but who had set out a long time after him. The latter traveller was very much surprised to find the other no farther on his journey; and, on hearing the reason, "Alas!" said he, "is it possible that you have lost your time and wasted your strength in this idle occupation? These same animals have beset me all along the road, but I have saved my time and my labor in taking no notice of their barking, while you have lost yours in resenting insults which did you no harm, and chastising dogs and puppies, whose manners you can never mend."

SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1848.

To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 89 south Fifth street, Philadelphia.

THE PROPER AGE FOR CONFIRMATION.—An article in the English Churchman, which we subjoin, calls attention to this important practical question. Although the rule of the Church seems plain in this matter, yet a diversity of opinion and practice with regard to it, prevails to no little extent. Many whose judgments are entitled to respectful consideration, are opposed to the admission of candidates in early youth. Indeed the parochial clergy are often embarrassed by the diversity of views entertained on this subject. This is a practical question which may be profitably discussed. If the opinions now expressed can be fairly opposed, we are perfectly willing that our readers should hear the other side.

We think the question should be decided by the authority of Holy Scripture, and by the consequent practice of the Church.

The first question then is—What is the rule which may claim Scriptural authority?

So far as Confirmation is a Divine Ordinance, the warrant for its practice at any age, must rest upon Scriptural authority. That this ordinance has the warrant both of Scriptural precept and example, is most certain. It is equally certain, that no prescribed age has been defined, as the earliest period when it may be duly administered. Our argument from Holy Scripture must be deduced from what is implied, rather than from what is expressed. Jewish children were admitted as "children of the precept," at the age of thirteen, and earlier, as in our Saviour's case, whose appearance in the temple, when he was twelve years old, according to Grotius, is supposed to have been for this purpose.* It was said of children whose intelligence made them ready for this duty, at an earlier age, that they "ran before the command." They were then questioned publicly as to their religious knowledge, and if found meet became responsible for their religious duties, and were obliged to keep the Law.

We know that the Law was not more easy to be comprehended by the young than the Gospel, and we may presume that Christian children are not less precocious than those of Jewish parentage.

We consider it, moreover, a plain denial of the simplicity of the Gospel to say that the young, who have attained the earliest years of discretion, cannot understand the nature of its plainest obligations. Besides, the question is not Do you understand, but Do you believe all the articles of the Christian Faith? Youth, we might almost say childhood, is the season of Faith, of trust—doubt and distrust are the growth of riper years. Will any one say that a child of fourteen, or even of twelve, is too young to repent, believe, obey? And are not these the baptismal promises and vow which are renewed and acknowledged, as obligations for which they are responsible, by those who come to confirmation? We may also cite our blessed Saviour's illustration of the manner in which the kingdom of God was to be received, by setting a child in the midst of His Disciples, and of His permission of the confession of His holy name by the children in the Temple.

And how, we would ask, are parents to obey that charge, "Train up a child in the way he should go," if they are not to urge and require from their children the acknowledgement of Christian obligations and the assumption of religious vows and promises? The argument for early confirmation is especially strong in this country, where children assume, at such an early age, independence and self government in other respects. In truth, with us there is a very short stage between infancy and manhood!

* See Wheatley, page 403.

The rule which the Church has established upon the evident spirit and intention of the Gospel, as implied in Holy Scripture, is most plain. This is clearly made out in the article from the English Churchman. An additional proof we derive from the Form prescribed for the Bishop, "Defend, O Lord, this thy child, [or this thy servant]."

Besides, the parents who bring their children to Baptism, are charged that they are to take care that their children be brought to the Bishop to be confirmed by him. The charge is not to let children have their own way, but, while under parental authority and discipline, they "be brought."

As a further indication of the mind of the Church on this point, we may cite one or two extracts from the hymns, set forth by authority to be sung at "Confirmation."

"Youth when devoted to the Lord
Is pleasing in His eyes;
A flower, though offered in the bud,
Is no vain sacrifice.

To Thee, Almighty God, to Thee,
Our hearts we now resign;
'Twill please us to look back and see That our whole lives were Thine."

91ST HYMN.

"True wisdom early sought and gain'd
In age will give thee rest;
O then, improve the morn of life,
To make its evening blest."

92D HYMN.

We are aware that the Hymns are not the safest standards of doctrine, but they may certainly be regarded as indicating the Church's view of a right practice. Some excellent remarks on this subject may be found in Wheatley. He shows that "Bucer found fault with our Church for administering Confirmation too soon." It is from those who agree with Bucer, rather than with the Church of which they are members, that similar objections come.

The objection urges that children should not be confirmed "till such times as they have had an opportunity of giving sufficient testimonies of their faith and practice." To this Wheatley sensibly replies, "that the enabling persons to give such testimonies of their faith and practice, is the end of Confirmation; and therefore Confirmation is to be administered, to assist them in manifesting their faith and practice, and not to be deferred till they are already manifested. For this reason it is very evidently the design of our Church, that children be confirmed before they have opportunities of being acquainted with sin: so that the Holy Spirit may take early possession of their youthful hearts, and prevent those sins, to which, without His assistance, the very tenderness of their age would be apt to expose them." We are not arguing for a mere performance of this solemn duty. We do not think parents should bring their children to this holy ordinance, unless they have taken care to have them well instructed in all their religious duties, and are resolved to follow up their past carefulness, by future earnest concern for their children's welfare. Nor do we think children should be dragged to the unwilling discharge of this responsible duty. As Wheatley says, "It is indeed highly expedient that those who are confirmed should be old enough to understand the nature and advantages of the rite they are admitted to, and the obligations it lays upon them; and if they are duly apprised of this, they are deemed by our Church qualified enough."

We agree with "the English Churchman," that no specified age should be fixed as a limit. It is plainly absurd to do so, unless you can prove that mental faculties and moral qualities are developed at the same time in all cases. Experience shows that children sometimes arrive at "years of discretion" in very early life, while others are very late in attaining the same point. We therefore conclude for the above reasons, that neither in Holy Scripture, nor in the rule of the Church; nor in the decisions of sound reason, can any argument be found for forbidding children of any age, when duly instructed and sufficiently intelligent to understand the nature of their assumed obligations, and when themselves desirous to discharge them, from coming to Christ in the appointed ordinance of Confirmation. On the other hand, the spirit of the gospel, the practice of the Church, the decisions of reason unite with a Saviour's merciful voice in saying, "Suffer them to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

For the further elucidation of these views, we refer back to the admirable exposition of them in the sermon quoted among "Selections," from a course setting forth, "The way of the Church with children." And to this we add the following conclusive article from "the English Churchman."

Some of their Lordships, the Bishops, having announced their intention of holding Confirmations in the course of the next few months, we take the opportunity of submitting to our readers a few observations upon this important subject, which, with the greatest deference to our Spiritual Fathers, we venture to hope may lead to some modifications and improvements in regard to the administration of that Apostolic rite.

In the Pastoral Letters issued from time to time by certain of their Lordships, the minimum age of Candidates for Confirmation appears to be fixed at sixteen. If we recollect right the Bishop of Oxford was, last year, particularly stringent upon this point, and even went so far as to express a wish that Candidates should not be presented until a still later period.

Now, upon any point which the Church had clearly left open to the "godly judgment" of the Bishop, we should be very loth to offer our opinion in opposition to that judgment, unless we were able to support our opinion by a reference to some generally recognized authority, or by pointing to some manifest practical evils or hindrances which resulted from carrying out the judgment of the Bishop.

In the present case, we think it will not be difficult to prove that the matter has not been left open by the Church, and therefore it will be unnecessary for us to offer any mere opinion upon the point.

At the conclusion of the Office for Public Baptism of Infants, the Priest is enjoined to address the Sponsors as follows—

Ye are to take care that this Child be brought to the Bishop to be Confirmed by him, so soon as he can say the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, in the vulgar tongue, and be further instructed in the Church Catechism set forth for that purpose."

From this, taken in connection with what precedes it, it is quite plain that the capacity of the Child, by God's grace, to "know and believe" the Christian Verities, is the only test or limit. And the Preface to the Order of Confirmation confirms this view.

We next come to the Canons Ecclesiastical of the English Church. The 61st Canon is as follows—

"Every Minister that hath cure and charge of souls, for the better accomplishing of the orders prescribed in the Book of Common prayer concerning Confirmation, shall take especial care that none shall be presented to the Bishop for him to lay his hands upon, but such as can render an account of their faith according to the Catechism in the said book contained. And when the Bishop shall assign any time for the performance of that part of his duty, every such Minister shall use his best endeavour to prepare and make able, and likewise to procure as many as he can to be then brought and by the Bishop to be confirmed."

Here again, the capacity, and not the age of the child is the test. But we think we may carry the matter still further, and show that even if age be admitted as a limit, the age of sixteen years cannot be laid down as that limit consistently with the laws of the Church. The 60th Canon enjoins as follows—

"Forasmuch as it hath been a solemn, ancient, and laudable custom in the Church of God, continued from the apostles' times, that all Bishops should lay their hands upon children baptized, and instructed in the Catechism of the Christian Religion, praying over them, and blessing them, which we commonly call Confirmation, and that this holy action hath been accustomed in the Church in former ages to be performed in the Bishop's visitation every third year; we will and appoint, that every Bishop or his Suffragan, in his accustomed visitation, do in his own person carefully observe the said custom. And if in that year, by reason of some infirmity, he be not able personally to visit, then he shall not omit the execution of that duty of Confirmation the next year after, as he may conveniently."

By this we see that Confirmation may be administered as seldom as once in three years, or, in certain cases, even once in four years would suffice to keep within the letter of the Canon. But by the 12th Canon it is enacted as follows—

"The Minister, Churchwardens, Quest-men, and assistants of every Parish-Church and Chapel, shall yearly, within forty days after Easter, exhibit to the Bishop or his Chancellor the names and surnames of all the Parishioners as well men as women, which being of the age of sixteen years received not the Communion at Easter before."

Now, if a person of sixteen years of age may be "presented" as a "Non-Communicant," and if Confirmation, which is, in ordinary cases, a necessary preliminary to Communion, may not have been obtainable during the previous three, or even four years, it is quite plain that the English Church, in making these Canons, contemplated an earlier age,—viz., thirteen, at the most for the administration of Confirmation. The same inference might be drawn also from the Rubric at the end of the Service for Holy Matrimony—that "It is convenient that the new-married persons should receive the Holy Communion at the time of their marriage;" at which time it sometimes happens that one of the parties is not more than fifteen or sixteen years of age, and if only the minimum of the above Canon be complied with there may have been no opportunity of receiving Confirmation for three years previously.

It is, then we think, perfectly clear, that if we seek to establish age as a test, instead of, or in addition to, capacity, the Canonical age, according to the English Church, is, at most thirteen or fourteen, rather than sixteen. But we would strongly urge the expediency, if not the absolute necessity, of abstaining from any endeavour to fix a particular age as a limit, in a matter which depends mainly upon the use which has been made of the Gift of the Holy Spirit in the Sacrament of Baptism.

Nor would it be difficult to shew that any such limit may have the effect of supporting an erroneous view of the true, essential character of Confirmation—its strengthening and confirming nature—which has been so much lost sight of in the popular notion that its main object is to afford an opportunity of confirming Baptismal Vows. If it be admitted, as it must be, that the one, primary, essential, object of Confirmation is the renewal and increase of the Holy Spirit, in the individuals Confirmed, by the "laying on of hands" by the Bishop; and that this is especially intended as a supplement to Baptism, and a preliminary to receiving the Holy Communion, by which they are to be strengthened and refreshed for that warfare with the World, the Flesh, and the Devil which an entrance upon the active duties of life necessarily and peculiarly entails—it is evident, most evident, that Confirmation and Communion should, if possible, come before those active duties are commenced, or it will, in many cases, be too late.

Now, leaving out all consideration of the higher classes, it is notorious that many of the middle, and most of the lower classes, are already engaged in the active business of daily life at sixteen years of age. Young women have been, perhaps, two years in service or other occupation; young men have become clerks, apprentices, servants, soldiers, mechanics—all engaged, from morning till night, working for their daily bread—surrounded by temptations, and unable, or unwilling, to devote much time, even upon Sundays, to study and prayer. The reports of the Commissioners of Education state that, in many instances, the children of the poor leave school at the age of seven. At that tender age they are frequently thrust out into the world, and are compelled to earn bread for themselves and their parents. They have few opportunities of keeping up the knowledge which they have acquired at school, and still less do they sustain the intercourse with their spiritual Pastors which their school-life had commenced. So that, if they will not be Confirmed before they leave school, or shortly after, the probability is, either that they will not be Confirmed at all, or that they will receive that solemn Rite under much less favourable circumstances.

If we are met by the observation that the Christian Religion contains deep Mysteries and solemn truths, we, of course admit it, but we deny the conclusion which is intended to be drawn from the remark. Undoubtedly there are Mysteries and truths whose depths the young mind cannot fathom. But there is none which the young and Regenerated heart cannot believe with all the freshness and simplicity of a virgin faith; and we need hardly remind any orthodox Christian that Faith, rather than an Intellect, is the key to Divine knowledge. Many a well-trained Christian child may be able to say, in all truth and simplicity—"I am wiser than the aged, because I keep thy Commandments."

We trust that we have said enough to induce the Clergy of those Dioceses, in which the limit of sixteen years of age has been laid down, to suggest to their Bishop the reconsideration of that rule. We feel sure that many of those who have had experience in the religious capabilities of the young will confirm what we have said.

THE BISHOP OF THIS DIOCESE had a providential escape from a serious injury on Sunday afternoon. Proceeding to Taquequa for evening service, the horse ran away and broke the carriage in pieces. The Bishop and the Rev. Mr. Evans escaped by leaping from the carriage. We are happy to state, that although the Bishop is severely bruised, and has been obliged to defer the appointments of the visitation yet unfulfilled, in the opinion of his physician, he has received no serious injuries.

The trial of Mr. Gutteridge for a libel has terminated in his being found guilty upon every one of his numerous pleas. It is, therefore, judicially decided that Dr. Lee is entirely innocent of the serious charges which Mr. Gutteridge brought against him.

We understand that the choice of the Presbytery of the Diocese of Glasgow is likely to devolve on the Rev. William Burgh, M.A., (one of the Ministers of St. Mary's Church, and colleague to the Rev. M. Almond), as successor to the late Bishop. Mr. Burgh is an Irishman, and has only recently become connected with the Scottish Church, but he has already become so well known for the soundness of his views, the urbanity of his manner, and the pious earnestness, united with great tact and rudeness, with which he enforces what he conceives to be his duty, in the face of prejudice and suspicion, that it is confidently thought his election will be unanimous.

The funeral of the late Bishop was to take place on Tuesday and would be attended by nearly the whole of the Clergy of the Diocese.—English Churchman.

Twelve thousand men, says the Debats, have marched from Rome to succor Lombardy against the Austrians. The Pope, on their departure, gave them his benediction in the following terms:—

"As Head of the Church, I am at peace with all the universe. As an Italian Prince I have a right to defend Italy my Country. I bless you. The cause you go to defend is a holy cause; God will make it triumph. I bless you once more. Fight and conquer in the name of the Lord."

Here is confusion, surely. Which of the two personages between whom Pius IX. divides his identity draws the sword, and which of them blesses it? But is it the fault of the Pope's position, and not his own, that he sees his own image at once on both sides of the thaumatrope.—London Guardian.

Inasmuch as our editorial oversight can not embrace in its vision "all the Churches," we cannot speak as positively as "the Bishop" of the New York Observer. But we can most positively assert, and we take pleasure in giving this testimony, that we never knew one who was regular in reading, and punctual in paying for, the Banner, A LATE COMER AT CHURCH.

Late at Church.

MR. EDITOR;

A correspondent of the New York Observer, lately begged the editor to admonish the people who are in the habit of being late at church, to come earlier, and not disturb the preacher and all devout worshippers; to which he replied—

"We would do so most cheerfully, but we feel quite confident that all our readers have better manners and better principles than to be guilty of such rudeness and impropriety, and are not tardy, unless compelled by unavoidable circumstances. We therefore suggest to our friend that he must attempt to reach the delinquents through some other channel."

I do not know, sir, but hope that you may be able to say the same of your readers; and in that case, merely beg the favour of you to let the article pass round, until it meets the eye of some editor who will own the late-comers.—PUNCTUALITY.

THE RICHMOND CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, after giving our correction of the false statement about Grace Church, (N. Y.) on which an argument was founded against "Apostolic Order and Succession," thus shows how true the conclusion would have been if the premise had not been false!

"We cheerfully insert the correction from the Banner of the Cross. And we are glad it is not true. But upon the supposition of its truth, the inference against the so called Apostolic Order and Succession would have been good," i. e. if the Opera Troupe had come to Grace Church, and had sung therein "the Marseillaise Hymn," then there would have been an "inference" against Apostolic Order and Succession! We are therefore permitted to argue that as "the Opera Troupe" did not come to Grace Church, and did not sing therein the Marseillaise Hymn, therefore "Apostolic Order and Succession" are delivered from "the inference!"

We thank "the Richmond Christian Advocate," for this consoling logic.

We earnestly commend the following to the attention of all who may be interested by such a moving appeal:

St. Peter's Church, Union Town, Pa.

AN URGENT CASE.—A claim exists against this Church for $1200, which must be satisfied by the 1st of June next, or the building be sold. The Church cost $4500. Unable to pay the claim, the Vestry authorized their Rector, the Rev. Mr. Jones, to visit this city to solicit aid for that purpose; but, within a week after his arrival here, he was seized with a violent attack of fever, which, with much difficulty has been abated, and although he is now convalescent, is so prostrated in strength that he cannot (for some weeks at least) attend to the object of his mission. In the mean time, the first of June draws nigher and nigher. The Bishop takes a deep interest in this matter, and in his sanction of the application for aid to the Churches by Mr. Jones, expresses the "sincere pleasure it would give him to see this Church relieved from its painful embarrassments." A gentleman in Pittsburgh has pledged $200 of the sum, provided the remaining $1000 be raised. A few benevolent ladies of our Church in this city, have, also, raised $100, so that the amount now actually needed is only $900. What then is our duty in the premises? Shall we, for the sake of so small a sum of money as $900, suffer this Church to be sold, its congregation broken up and dispersed, and the interests of the Church to be completely blasted, in one of the most prominent situations in Western Penna? Shall we, for the sake of $900, lease all our past labours there—all the labours of our missionaries for years—all the money we have spent—and furnish an house of God to some "denomination" who may stand ready to purchase it, and whose members will be willing to raise such a sum for such a purpose? To ask these questions, is to answer them. If the health of the Rector had been spared, there is no doubt but his personal application to our Church members, under the sanction of the Bishop, would have readily enabled him to procure the means to pay off this debt. Let it not be, that the Providential visitation which has befallen him, should prevent this being done; but rather let it be an additional reason for exertion, that thus a part of his anxiety may be removed. An half dozen of our members, in as many of our Churches, each contributing $10 or 20, would raise the money in twenty-four hours. We hope soon to be able to answer that such is the fact.

Mr. Jones is residing at Mrs. Moulder's, N. E. corner of Willing's alley and Fourth streets. He will be happy to furnish any information which may be desired, and to whom any contributions can be sent, or to James S. Newbold, Esq. at the office of the Banner of the Cross.

The following account, by the esteemed Rector of this interesting Parish, will be read with interest by those who have assisted in this important enterprise. It may also, we trust, induce others to give their charitable aid. If any are so moved, their contributions will be thankfully received at the office of the Banner of the Cross.

Grace Church, Cleveland, Ohio.

MR. EDITOR:—I have supposed that some of your readers would feel interested in the progress of the above named Parish, which was organized nearly three years since, for the special accommodation of all those, whether settled residents or strangers, who may not be elsewhere provided with a place of worship.

The sittings in this Church are all free, affording comfortable seats for 500 worshippers.

The Rector of the Parish depends for his support on the freewill offerings of the congregation, which are made every Lord's day at the administration of the Holy Communion, as the Church in that service directs. Strangers visiting our city will find this Church open for divine service every Sunday morning and afternoon.

The Church is built of brick, in the early English Gothic, say of the Thirteenth century, 87½ feet long, by 43½ feet wide. The elevation of the gables to the apex of the roof is 40 feet, of the side walls 20 feet, supported by heavy buttresses. The front entrances are through the tower in the right corner of the building, and a door on the left, near the corner. Between the doors is a large triplet window, another triplet in the rear over the chancel, is ornamented with painted foliated tops in the lancets, surrounding the emblems appropriated to himself, by our Lord in 22 Rev. 13, 16, vs. The Alpha on the right, the Omega on the left, and the bright and morning star in the centre, with a large cross of crimson stained glass in the centre window below the star. Thirteen side windows, with the triplets, all of brown enamelled glass, diffuse a soft mellow light, yet sufficiently strong to be pleasant to the eye.

The slips, lecterns, chancel rails, altar, credence table, and frame work of the roof, (which is an open one) and the paneling between the bays of the roof, are all of native Ohio oak, of natural colour, varnished, to show the grain. The floor is also of oak. Under the front triplet is an orchestra, railed in on a platform elevated three steps above the floor. Under the rear triplet is a spacious chancel, on a platform of same elevation as the orchestra; the altar standing against the wall under the centre of the triplet. The altar is table form, an oaken slab 3 by 7, resting on heavy square pillars or columnar legs. The Lecterns, at which prayer is said and the word preached, are without the chancel rails. This Church is so far finished as to enable the congregation to occupy it for divine service. In accomplishing this long desired object, we have been essentially aided by the contributions of friends at a distance, to whom we would make this public acknowledgment of our obligations. To those who have promised us aid, but not yet sent it, we would respectfully say, that we have ventured to incur expenses for finishing the Church thus far; relying upon their promises for ability to meet our engagements. We trust that they will yet remember us, and remit directly to the Rector of Grace Church, Cleveland Ohio, or send to your office something to aid us in fulfilling our contracts.

THE WAY OF THE CHURCH WITH CHILDREN.—Four sermons, at the season of Confirmation, in St. Mary's Church, Burlington, in the weeks before Lent, 1848: By the Rector, and Bishop of the Diocese.

These brief, pointed and eloquent sermons, suited to the comprehension of the young, fitted for the instruction of the old, express a noble theory which their Author has nobly exemplified in practice. Every line and word of their eloquent Truths may be proved by results, which are witnessed in the two Institutions at Burlington whose discipline and instruction are strictly guided by "the Way of the Church with children."

The first of these sermons will be found among our selections, and we think none will read that without desiring to peruse the others.

MODERN INFIDELITY.—A PRICE LECTURE, delivered in Trinity Church, Boston, March 15th, 1848. By the Rev. Thomas M. Clark, Assistant Minister of Trinity Church on the Greene Foundation. This lecture well sustains the high reputation which its Reverend Author obtained in this city as a Preacher, and merits the unusual compliment paid by the Wardens and Vestry of Trinity Church, Boston, in publishing it. The subject, which is one prescribed by the Founder of these Lectures, is not an easy one to treat with originality. "Infidelity" is not only a trite and barren but a dark and dismal theme for a lecture. Yet Mr. Clark has succeeded in giving freshness and interest to his subject, and has made it productive of valuable instruction.

The following extract will serve to show the manner in which the subject is treated, and exhibit something of the spirit and scope of this admirable Lecture.

There are certain features of the popular skepticism of the day, which we shall briefly notice.

Like the writers whom we have now cited, our modern unbelievers generally profess to recognize Christianity in some shape. Even when they are assembled for the avowed purpose of abolishing the institutions of the gospel, it is in the name of Jesus of Nazareth, that they pretend to enter upon their work.

It may also be noticed, that the infidelity of our day aims to identify itself conspicuously with the interests of humanity, and lays claim to a world-wide philanthropy. It has a panacea for all the social evils that afflict society; and, what is somewhat strange, it proposes to rectify the various ills induced by lawless passions, through the direct agency of the passions themselves. They tell us that vice, legitimized, will cease to be vice. Gluttony, lust, laziness, filthiness, want of natural affection, irreligion, need not be eradicated from our nature, but should be provided for, reduced to a system, and they will cease to be mischievous. It exhibits the church as a great impediment in the way of reform,—as restraining all freedom of opinion and of utterance, hindering the advance of temperance, aiming to perpetuate slavery, upholding a cruel criminal code, advocating war, teaching the abiding necessity of those broad distinctions in wealth and station, which now obtain in society. It only asks to have the world given up to its direction, and it promises in some way, not as yet understood, speedily to exterminate all these social evils. All its philanthropic plans are on a broad scale, somewhat indefinite perhaps, but only the more grand, because of their indefiniteness. The first, indispensable prerequisite to the re-creation which these infidels desire, is, that the elements of society be reduced to a chaotic state, and all existing institutions, ecclesiastical, civil, and domestic, be destroyed; something shall then, somehow, be evolved from the ruin, more perfect than was ever known before.

We may still further observe, that this modern infidelity is often intensely fervid, poetical, and, therefore, to many minds, attractive. It uses "great, swelling words," in the setting forth of its pernicious dogmas. It lays claim to all the earnestness and sincerity that are to be found on earth. It sits in judgment upon received forms and systems with the solemn pertinacity of an infallible tribunal. It sweeps away the checks and balances of society, overturns its usages, reverses its arrangements, with so sanctified a fervor, that even those who stand aghast at the prospective ruin, hardly dare to remonstrate. Men forget the work of destruction which is going on, in their admiration of the sparkling fires which consume the social fabric. Amidst the wild whirl of the elemental war, there are heard, at intervals, sweet strains of melody, which ravish the ear and entrance the heart. The sense is not shocked by the coarse ribaldry of the heartless defier of God; but unbelief and irreligion are taught in words which it would seem as though God himself must have inspired.

And, again, the popular infidelity of the age professes a generous eclecticism. Rejecting all accredited forms of Christianity, it pretends to detect some good in all, and that it appropriates to itself. It therefore appears to be more of a belief, and less of an unbelief,—more affirmative and positive, than in its old developments. It avows itself to be looking around, among old creeds and systems, to see what it can find worth retaining, rather than what it can find to reject. It sometimes professes to mourn very sadly and bitterly, that it can discover so little worthy to be retained. The inference is, that there must be a very rigid standard of truth, where it is found so difficult to satisfy its demands.

And, once more: the prevailing modern infidelity lays claim to extreme spirituality. Hence, it discards all respect for institutions and ordinances. The church, the Sabbath, the ministry, the sacraments, as Divine appointments, it indignantly rejects. It can discern no spiritual meaning or spiritual subserviency in these outward arrangements. It cannot see how the body is made to live by the indwelling of the soul. It does not perceive that, as things are constituted in this world, there can be no life without the union of body and soul. Its spirituality, so far as we can comprehend it, is rather metaphysical than devotional, consisting more in the intuitions of the pure reason, than in the communications of the Divine Spirit to the soul. In its reverential moods, it seems, therefore, to regard itself,—its own high excellence,—rather than God. Its adoration does not go forth towards a Being without and beyond itself; but is introverted, and worships the god within.

THE ORDINARY GIFTS, a sermon preached in ST. PETER'S, AUBURN, at the LENTEN ORDINATION held by the Bishop of Western New York, &c. BY JOHN WILLIAMS, D. D.

This sermon, whose appropriate text is found in 1 Cor. xii. 8, 9, and 10, and 28, is such a one as we might expect from the learning and sound judgment of its Author. After a masterly exposition of the text, the preacher thus states the division of his important subject. "Leaving then these general expository views, let us proceed to consider somewhat in detail, these three ordinary and perpetual qualifications of the Gospel Ministry: the word of wisdom; the word of knowledge; and faith."

Of the manner in which these topics are treated in this Discourse, we shall give our readers a future opportunity of judging for themselves, by some extracts we have marked as peculiarly worthy of attention, as indeed is the case with every part of this able and instructive sermon.

THE SPIRIT OF MISSIONS, for May, is received. We are happy to see an article entitled "Encouraging aspect of the Domestic Field," from the Secretary.

We also find that the Foreign Committee have received more liberal contributions than usual, in answer to their appeal. Contributions to Domestic Missions for the month ending May 15th, $2,500 17. During the same month, the contributions for Foreign Missions have been $5,248 02.

For the Banner of the Cross.

To the Parishioners of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia.

The remarks which I lately took the liberty of addressing to you on the subject of rebuilding St. Peter's Church, having brought out an opponent, I renew my appeal to your indulgence while I reply to him.

My courteous antagonist informs you that "it is not his purpose to enter life lists with me but only to congratulate the congregation that this innovation is proposed boldly, and can therefore be met and summarily disposed of." He does however enter the lists. I did not invite the encounter, but I may not decline it, and although my opponent has the advantage of appearing with vizor down, I shall make no attempt to discover him. He inscribes upon his shield the name of the old covenant, immortal in romance, and I am content with it. I therefore place my own lance in rest, and with no irreverent voice cry, God defend the right.

I propose, then, to notice first, those of my positions which my opponent has left unnoticed, next, those positions not mine which he has assailed, and lastly, to review his objections to the statements and the reasoning which I have advanced.

1. My opponent leaves unnoticed my argument against the propriety of a Christian congregation's listening to the word of God, with their backs turned to the minister who reads or preaches it, a position to which the present arrangements of St. Peter's compel one half of all the occupants of the galleries and no small part of those below.

Is the objection too trivial to deserve his notice? Why, the humblest lecturer in a Temperance Hall or Mechanic's Institute, would deem himself aggrieved, on rising to address his audience, to find them seated with their backs turned upon him! And shall Christians, when called to hear the counsel of God Most High, think it a light matter in what attitude they listen to His minister whom they believe especially commissioned to declare it? Does not the spirit of the solemn command, "Take heed how ye hear," involve in its requirement a respectful attitude as well as a reverent mind?

2. My antagonist does not deny either my statement or my reasoning as to the defects in the arrangements for kneeling in the present church. Yet is the intermingling of the feet of the kneeling worshippers to pass for absolutely nothing? Let the Christian women of St. Peter's, for to them I am content to leave it, say if this is an annoyance to their devotion so utterly trivial. How many a modest worshipper in that Church has in kneeling, cramped herself into a position of penance truly Romish, to avoid the obtrusive foot of some awkward or inconsiderate occupant of the same pew! And how frequently is a Churchman in St. Peter's compelled to put a constraint upon his feelings and disobey the direction "to make his humble confession to Almighty God, devoutly kneeling," lest he give annoyance to her who kneels over against him.

3. My plea for the better accommodation of the younger worshippers passes equally unnoticed.

Yet does not our Church care especially for the young, for those whom our Lord told his disciples to suffer to come unto him? Do we indeed suffer them to come as we ought, when immuring them, in what to them are high-walled prisons, and placing them with their backs to the minister, we demand from them attention? Grant that some of the children of St. Peter's are to emigrate to Oregon or colonize the shores of the Pacific, are we indifferent to the habits they may take with them? I certainly feel no such indifference. Wherever God's good providence may in after years take my own offspring, I desire that they may go devout Christians and intelligent Churchmen, trained from their earliest years in every habit of mind and body which can impress them with reverence for God, and for His word, His Sacraments, and the House where He is worshipped.

I now pass to notice certain positions, not mine, which Old Mortality has assailed. He asserts in referring to my statement: "The present building is thought unworthy of Him, who is worshipped there—of the truths taught, and of those who worship there."

Have I indeed said this? Have I declared St. Peter's to be unworthy of God's worship? I have said that I would see the present building replaced by a church more worthy in its design and structure of Him who is worshipped there, and of the truths taught there. Is such conduct of an argument quite candid? Again, Old Mortality says, "In some minds this peculiar reverence for the East is cultivated as a point to which their worship should be directed, thus perpetuating, so far as they can, a false astronomy, as well as a false creed. This point has not been presented to you, but it forms a most weighty one in the nice calculations of the new church architecture; perhaps I should say of the revived church architecture, as I am fully aware that this too is a Roman bequest." Now since this point of reverence for the East was not by me presented to you, why does he introduce it? It can be but for one reason, and that not quite creditable to the candor of my opponent. He wishes to force it into my company, and then to disparage me by its companionship.

What has reverence for the East to do with the re-building of St. Peter's Church? The Church stands east and west already, this bequest we certainly have from our forefathers.

As to the doctrine of reverence for the East, if it be a Roman bequest it is no doctrine of the Church. As a Churchman, I read in the ante-communion rubric, that the minister is to begin that service, standing at the North side of the table, and hence infer that it is not necessarily heresy to regard one position at worship as for some possible reason preferable to another. On such a point let every one be fully persuaded in his own mind, and let us not judge one another. Men have their peculiarities. Sir Sydney Smith was once pestered by a declamatory philosopher in the street, who entertained him for some time with a disquisition on the probable position of the North Pole. At last the old hero of Acre losing patience, broke away from his acquaintance, not without some disparaging remarks upon the philosopher and his theme. The man of science, complaining of this to a common friend, declared himself much aggrieved by the abuse Sir Sydney had lavished both on himself and on the North Pole. "Abuse the North Pole did he," replied his friend, "don't mind it, it is exactly like him; I have myself heard him speak very disrespectfully of the Equator." I sincerely hope that Old Mortality has no private or personal pique against the East.

I now turn to my opponent's reply to the only one of my objections which he has fairly stated, and directly met.

After conceding "that the Church might be better ventilated and the Pews for the Sunday Schools better arranged," he asks, "What remains? Why a large portion of the congregation must always kneel with their backs turned to the holy table." "Now my fellow Christians," he proceeds, "if I dare use the name, this plea for change I implore you to resist to the uttermost. Let us not so traduce our forefathers, let us not so libel ourselves as to declare that we have just now discovered that the communion table is worthy of that sort of reverence which demands that we should pray towards it, and not look only to the God whose throne is above all heavens. This is the sort of superstition which I fear for our children. This ceremony can be clearly traced to the Romish church, when the real substance of the Saviour is supposed to be upon the altar. But having disclaimed their doctrine, why should we retain so useless, so pernicious a practice!"

Now my reply to all this, is simply that Old Mortality is, in argument, no Churchman, and I pledge myself to prove it.

In referring to the Communion Table, it is unnecessary to say that I referred to it in especial connection with the Communion Service. What is the Rubric at the beginning of that service? "Then shall the minister, turning to the people, rehearse distinctly the Commandments; and the people still kneeling, shall after every commandment ask God mercy." After the offertory, the persons collecting the alms are by the Rubric directed to "reverently bring it to the Priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the Holy Table." After the general confession to be "made by the priest, and all those who are minded to receive the holy Communion, humbly kneeling," the Rubric directs, "Then shall the priest (the bishop if he be present) stand up, and turning to the people say" the absolution. The sentences follow, and the Rubric proceeds, "Then shall the priest turn to the Lord's table, and say," the Trisagion with the words that precede it. I pause here to ask if it is a probable design of the Church that the priest should show more reverence to the Lord's table than the people, whom he just before has bid draw near with faith, and make their humble confession to Almighty God, devoutly kneeling. After this, "the priest kneeling down at the Lord's table," says the preparatory prayer, and then, immediately before the prayer of consecration, follows the Rubric, which is so conclusive on the point at issue. (Let it be remembered that the people are still humbly kneeling.)

"When the priest, standing before the table, hath so ordered the bread and wine, that he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread before the people, and take the cup into his hands; he shall say the prayer of consecration."

How can the priest break the bread before the people, if they are kneeling with their backs turned to the holy table!

It is impossible. The Rubrics, right reason, and the natural decency of things, all demand the reverential attitude for which I argue,—and yet my opponent denounces it as a superstition, a pernicious practice, and, for defending it, he would impute me in the heresy of Transubstantiation.

Why Old Mortality should not have dared to address you as fellow Christians, I am at a loss to discover, but had he doubted as to addressing you as fellow Churchmen, I could have conceived a reason for his hesitation.

Into one part of the field upon which my antagonist has entered I must decline to follow him. I refer to that portion of his address in which he seeks to draw into the controversy the views of our excellent Rector; protesting at once his own unsurpassed affection for him, and at the same time protesting "against yielding implicitly to his wishes in this and similar points."

It was my purpose not to involve our Rector in this discussion, and therefore I took pains to exclude the inference that he was cognizant of any thing I had written. Delicacy to him suggested this course. I desired that his position should be that of one, who, placed on an eminence above the dust and fray of controversy, might calmly look down on the events passing upon the field below. But my opponent has thought fit to adopt a different course, and from a reply to my arguments he has passed into a public criticism of his Rector's sermon. The gauntlet so thrown down, and on such ground, I refuse to raise. Our Rector's views need no aid or defence from me. His discourses vindicate themselves. To my own judgment the one assailed by Old Mortality possessed the merit of a masterly impartiality. In sooth, it was the truths taught, and not the tone or color of the teaching, on that occasion, which vindicated views such as I had ventured to express. To an appeal in behalf of the House of God, the lessons of the day were singularly apposite,—and who could hear the blessing pronounced on her who had done "what she could," without mentally asking whether we, too, in our offerings for God's house, could claim the same blessing.

It is while on this foreign ground that Old Mortality denies the Cathedrals of the Old World to be the monuments of a living faith. The position not being mine, I am not called upon to vindicate it, yet how easily might it be done by a reference to the Church history of England.

Take as an example, the history of William of Wykeham, the restorer of Winchester Cathedral. Who can read his life from his humble origin to his mitred tomb, and dare to deny that his was a living faith, proved by his works of boundless charity. If provision for the poor and ignorant be the test, the Churches, Hospitals and Schools, founded by Wykeham, may well put to the blush the works of a later, more enlightened, and more boastful age.

My opponent concedes that no great taste was exhibited by our forefathers in planning our church, but thinks that at any rate we have guarded against any further mistakes on the part of our worthy friends, the Quakers. We have indeed effectually done so. We have built a Tower, and on it placed a Steeple, and methinks to make the lofty edifice complete, it should have borne as an inscription, enwrought in the glazed bricks which tessellate the gables of the last century,—the axiom of Old Mortality,—"Church Architecture is a thing of mere fancy." The principle and its illustration would thus have been placed in happiest connection, and the Church Architect who surveyed it would have admitted its propriety, at least as one of those

"Thick coming fancies
That keep us from our rest."

It is not strange that, setting out with such a principle, my opponent should assail that noble science which reverently aims to symbolize in stone the doctrines of the gospel. He urges that religious truth should be made visible, not in the dome and turret, but in the life and practice.

Why, I reply, have we raised upon our Spire the Cross, if not to symbolize in a material form the cardinal doctrine of the gospel? And is this the only doctrine which can be suggested by a symbol? The strictures of Old Mortality on this head, proceed from a want of just discrimination. I would have the truths of the gospel symbolized in stone, but realised in the part. I would have religious truth made visible in the Architecture of the Church, but practical in the life of the worshipper. Of "the revived Church Architecture," Old Mortality appears to have the profoundest horror, and dreads the prospect of what terms a Gothic invasion. The only Gothic invasion which ever afflicted the land of our English forefathers was that of the invaders of the Church, the Puritans. They warred, indeed, on the Gothic Architecture of England, but were themselves the truest Goths, and in the very spirit of Alaric, self-named the scourge of God."

How John Sergeant Ed. D.

Called fire and sword and desolation,
A godly, thorough, Reformation.

The closing argument of Old Mortality assumes the shape of a plea for the Poor. "The sum I would desire expended in so constructing St. Peter's as to allow to all its worshippers, rich and poor, a place to kneel, and better opportunities to listen and to learn, and respirable air withal, he calls an idle waste, and claims the money for the poor."

Was not the same objection made of old, when love and patience broke the alabaster box of costliest ointment and ured it on our Saviour's head?

"For it might have been sold for more than three hundred pence and have been given to the poor."

And was the blessing of our Saviour on that offering con- ded to her who honored thus his sacred person? Or is it pre- mption to claim the extension of that blessing to every costly offering made in honor of His spiritual body?

Let us provide free Churches for the Poor, and emulate Christ Church in this particular, says my opponent. It is well said. But did Christ Church move in the erection of free churches until after the remodelling of its own? In that change its interior, its Rector, the lamented James, took the deepest interest, and if there be regrets in Christ Church unassuaged at the exchange of deformity and discomfort for orderly and church-like arrangement, few, I trust, are the bosoms which pain them. Let us, I therefore say, emulate Christ Church throughout. She provided first for her own household of faith, and then addressed herself to the poor. Let us do the same. If Old Mortality will give me his co-operation in what I have at heart, he will lack neither yours nor mine in the promo- tion of the objects so justly dear to him.

"Give us a Church, not Steepled Meeting or Galleried preach- ing-house, but a Church, such as the Liturgy and Rubrics demand, though it be simple as that of Bemerton repaired by the pious hands of Herbert, and I venture to predict that the effertory of the new St. Peter's will put to shame the quarterly collections of the old."

My opponent, however, will allow me the benefit of no pre- cedent for any purpose. Trinity Church, New York, was taken down, he says, only because it was unsafe. Perhaps so,—but is Trinity Church still,—and this was all my argument. As to the question of safety, I hope our own Tower is not unsafe,—but since those who ought to know assert that the whole roof of the church vibrates with the oscillations of the tower, and on that principle explain the ominous cracking and peeling of the paint or plaster on the eastern part of the ceiling, could have wished that we had emulated the tower of Christ Church in its thickness as well as its height. A "rain of pre- cedents" which Old Mortality invites you to resist, may be withstood,—but a rain of bricks and timber would be a much more serious argument.

More might be said, but I have, perhaps, already exceeded reasonable limits.

The case has changed its aspect since I first addressed you. The wish of Old Mortality, that "this innovation might be sum- marily disposed of," has been granted. The Vestry have dis- posed of the subject,—summarily. They have practically said, that though there might be those among you who bore a regard to St. Peter's, which did not expend itself in appeals to the ashes of the dead, but was ready to prove its sincerity by deeds,—that regard should not be allowed an expression at their hands. That though there might be among you those who, as Christians, as Churchmen, as members of St. Peter's Parish, felt their hearts burn within them to build a better temple for God's worship,—they forbade it to be done.

This has been their decision.

Is it yours?

"Thou shalt not raise a False Report."—Exodus 23ch. 1v.

The pernicious practice condemned by the text, is not less prevalent now than it was in the earlier ages of the world. First inculcated by our spiritual adversary, in the garden of Eden, causing desolation and sorrow to succeed the blissful enjoyments of Paradise, it has reigned ever since in the human heart, reminding us forcibly of our fallen condition, and of the constant necessity for watchfulness and prayer.

Interdicted by Jehovah, himself, amidst the sublime display of His omnipotence on Sinai, so prone were the Israelites to rebel against His righteous commands, and vent a long and fondly cherished disposition, that to prevent a misconception of its import, the lawgiver was compelled to reiterate, in un- doubted language, the Almighty's displeasure.

Need we more convincing evidence of human depravity. Do we not see its baneful effects, in every relation of life, severing the dearest ties, exciting malevolent dispositions, and exterminating the spirit of love which should govern our inter- course with mankind? Surely, there is no weapon the enemy wields more successfully, because of the susceptibility of the human heart, its predisposition to sacrilegious indulgence; and none which aims so fatal a blow at the restoration of "peace on earth."

It is much to be deplored that the minds of some are so per- verted—either by disappointment in their individual experience, or by the love of such indulgence, that to detect a fault and magnify it, seems to confer more pleasure, than the discovery of that remaining good, in man, which should be cherished, encouraged and directed. Too frequently, alas! are these bitter impulses of our nature stifled or annihilated by contact with evil, causing evil passions to rally for vigorous resistance.

"Reputation is dearer than life,"—a good name is more to be valued than riches; and every attempt to deprive our neigh- bour of his dearest possession, is an attack upon the social compact, and consequently weakens our own position.

"Judge not that ye be not judged," is the mandate of our blessed Saviour.

Some writer has observed that "we should not judge with- out a perfect knowledge of every accompanying circumstance;" but, even then, our judgment should be tempered by charity.

Let us shun the voice of slander as we would a reptile.— Examine well our own hearts,—and that not lightly, after the manner of men,—and then if we discover that we are without sin, and not till then may we esteem ourselves privi- leged to "cast the first stone" at the character of our fellow mortal.

Be it remembered, That St. James in his excellent epistle (so full of practical wisdom and wholesome instruction,) says; "if any man among you seem to be religious, and brideth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain."

Christian Manners.

MR. EDITOR:—

As I suppose you have no objection to the occasional intro- duction of a dissertation upon the minor morals in the Banner, I take the liberty of sending a few desultory remarks upon good manners, hoping that some abler pen may do justice to this im- portant and much neglected subject.

When I study the Epistles in the New Testament, I am forcibly impressed with the spirit of Christian love and cour- tesy which pervades them. From the rank and education of St. Paul, we would naturally expect polish and refinement in the style of that accomplished scholar. We read with delight the writings of St. John, which are characterized by that meek- ness of wisdom, that persuasive gentleness, and that winning suavity which captivate the hearts of all who study the ad- dresses of the beloved disciple. But we magnify the triumph of divine grace, when we observe its influence in converting the blunt, rough fisherman St. Peter into the courteous Chris- tian. I dare not assume the prerogative of the Omniscient, in pronouncing upon the spiritual state of my fellow-sinners, but I cannot consider any person as radically converted, who is not anxious to please, and careful not to give offence. When engaged in our self-examinations, we will find it a very profit- able exercise to search the concordance for all those texts which inculcate the duties and graces in which our conscience tells us we are deficient. Often, when engaged in these investiga- tions and meditations, I have been forcibly struck with the variety of precepts, interspersed through the Epistles, which inculcate good manners. There is no vice in the disposition, or infelicity of temper which manifests itself in offensive man- ners, against which we are not cautioned, and exhorted to prac- tise the contrary virtue. As many appear ignorant that such duties are enjoined, in Holy Writ, I will submit a few of them to their consideration. To the proud and self-sufficient, I would recommend these texts: "in honour preferring one another," "let each esteem others better than himself," &c. To the rough and unfeeling, "having compassion one of an- other, be pitiful, be courteous," &c. To the meddler and mis- chief maker, to study to be quiet "and mind their own busi- ness," "what is that to thee? follow thou me." To the quarrel- some, "follow peace with all men," "as much as lieth in you live peaceably with all men," &c. To the rude and careless, "honour all men," "give to all their due," &c. How little attention is paid to this important subject in the education of children! How few are taught correct manners, upon Christian principles! If mothers would take half the pains to cultivate good manners in their children that they waste upon their dress, they would more effectually promote their usefulness, their happiness, and their success in life. When they present them a new article of apparel, if they would tell them that "'tis in good manners and not in fine dress, that the truest gentility lies," it would enlighten their judgments, and diminish their vanity. The foundation of good manners must be laid in the nursery, by the implantation of love in the heart, and by teach- ing children to perform all those little acts of kindness which form the benevolent character. When they enter the world, they will easily acquire a knowledge of the rules of conven- tional propriety, and enjoy themselves more in the social circle by endeavouring to please others, and by offering them those gratifying little courtesies, which are indicative of good-breeding, whenever they have an opportunity, than by indulging in that heartless apathy and listlessness upon which some ill-bred people pride themselves. In every situation in life good man- ners will be advantageous to the possessor. If people wish to acquire an influence over others, they will find amiable manners a powerful auxiliary, if not a sine qua non. They are indis- pensable in a pastor. They will greatly increase his influence over his own flock, and remove the prejudices of other denomi- nations. The manifestation of interest in their daily concerns, and an expression of sympathy in their joys and sorrows, will win their hearts, and induce them to listen with respect to his instructions. An insinuating address will prepossess them in favour of the truths uttered by one to whom they are attached. Many who are skeptical upon the subject of the apostolic suc- cession, would be induced to examine and acknowledge the validity of the claims of those who exemplify the spirit of the apostles by their holy living and their courteous, conciliating demeanour.

Physicians would greatly increase their popularity and use- fulness, by studying and endeavouring to imitate the compassion and gentleness, and the dignified simplicity of the great Phy- sician, when he performed his miraculous cures. How does the languid eye of the sufferer kindle with delight at the ap- pearance of a cheerful Christian physician, with mild, soothing accents! "His very foot has music in it, when he comes up the stairs." From what a vast amount of indescribable suffer- ings might invalids be exempted by the considerate compassion and soothing sympathy of their attendants!

Many thoughtless persons would be startled if they were told of their responsibility for having prejudiced the minds of the young against religion by their revolting manners. I have traced the origin of infidelity in the youthful mind to the repul- sive manners of nominal christians. The exemplification of a benign christian temper, in a cheerful affectionate manner will persuade more young people to enter the fold of the Great Shepherd, than volumes of unpalatable homilies. Many who consider it jesuitical, to "please others for their edification," do not hesitate to wound their feelings by unseasonably uttering disagreeable truths, in harsh tones, accompanied by offensive morose looks. They erect themselves into censors and dicta- tors, and miscall their rudeness "dealing faithfully" with them. These must be some of the good people with whom, Hannah More said, it will be time enough to become acquainted in the next world. They are willing to benefit others, but will not condescend to please them. Now "few can save or serve, but all may please," "a small unkindness is a great offence." Bishop Dehon who possessed a very discriminating judgment, united to great politeness, and primitive simplicity of manners, deprecated and reprobated flattery, but recommended Christians to express the affection and respect they felt towards others by speaking agreeable truths. Bishop White, who exemplified the beauty of holiness, and was a model for manners, and capti- vated all hearts, and conciliated all denominations, by "speaking the truth in love," said it would be sufficient to deter benevolent persons from saying disagreeable things unnecessarily, if they reflected upon the pain they gave. Some have an unfortunate knack of saying whatever they know will annoy and irritate others, while they pride themselves upon preserving their own equanimity. I have generally observed that those who are the most reckless of the offence they give to others, are exasperated by the least slight, or disrespectful look, or disparaging word, and feel the most implacable resentment against those who have wounded their pride and self-love. They are constantly throwing the gauntlet, every look is a challenge, they provoke hostility, and then complain and resent it.

"In many things we all offend;" let us therefore introvert our view, and rectify whatever is amiss in our own tempers and manners; and study the harmless peculiarities of others, that we may avoid giving offence. Let us adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, by promoting peace and good-will in our families, in our social intercourse, and in the church.

Those who wish to improve the rising generation, and to curb the riotous and licentious spirit of the youths who infest our streets, especially on the Sabbath Day, might effect some good by purchasing a supply of these tracts, and distributing them, with affectionate exhortations, among these neglected idlers, who are pleased to receive them, and generally listen with respect to the conversations of those who appear to take an interest in their welfare.

They can be procured at the cheap Bookstore of Mr. Simons, at the corner of Fifth and Spruce streets, where purchasers can obtain very valuable books, at a reduced price; and also a variety of useful articles. All the publications of the E. F. Tract Society, which are in print, can be procured there. Tracts are so very cheap, that there are few persons who cannot afford to do good by purchasing a few to distribute. There have been such innumerable demands upon their Depository during the past year, that their gratuitous distribution must necessarily be limited, until they can procure the requisite funds to replenish their stock, by donations, and by their sales.

Summer Retreat for Children,

AT NEWPORT, R. I.

A gentleman having a delightful residence a short distance from Newport, R. I., and near the sea shore, proposes to take into his family, for the summer months, five or six little girls, between the ages of 6 and 12 years. The advantages of his estate for sea bathing and healthy air are not surpassed by any other on the island. The studies of the children entrusted to his care will be carried forward under the tuition of his lady, who will also extend over them the watchful care of a parent.

To parents proposing to travel, and to those seeking for a healthy summer abode for their children, rare advantages are here offered. Further information in regard to terms, &c., may be had by applying to the "Editor of the Banner of the Cross."

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1848.

[Vol. X.—No. 19.—Whole No. 489.]

so useful a thought, says further to Simon Peter, "He that is washed already, or that has just been bathing, needs only to wash his feet, which may indeed easily be soiled by the shortest walk, and when that is done, he is entirely clean;" at which he should have said, "The truly good man needs not that deep repentance and universal change which is absolutely necessary to others, though he should, by renewed acts of penitence and faith, be cleansing himself from smaller pollutions, which are in some degree inseparable from the infirmity of human nature, &c." But the objection to this view is twofold. 1. It represents our Lord as descending in the 10th verse from the lofty position which he had assumed in the 8th. Unless I wash thee, he had said to Peter, after that disciple had declared that he should never wash his feet, Unless I wash thee, thou art not mine. Peter alarmed begged him to wash not only his feet, but also his hands and head. What reply then was to be expected? That Peter was already washed, and therefore need not be alarmed? That a slight cleansing was necessary to entitle him to the privilege of having part with Christ? Such a reply does not appear to be in keeping with the character or general conversation of our Lord. 2. It is to be borne in mind that during the conversation now referred to, our Lord predicted that Peter would thrice deny him, and mercifully promised to pray for him lest his faith should fail; (Luke xxii., 32;) that a few hours afterward Peter not only denied him, but cursed, and swore that he knew him not; and that upon due reflection he wept bitterly. Was Peter's one of those "smaller pollutions which are in some degree inseparable from the infirmity of human nature?" This will hardly be affirmed. Is it probable, then, that while the master was warning the disciple of his danger, and striving to prepare him for the conflict with Satan, he would at the same moment neutralize the effect of his warnings by the assurance that the disciple had been already completely cleansed, and now required but a modicum of spiritual influence? According to the view now advocated the passage is clear and unencumbered with difficulties. Peter, apprehensive of the consequences to flow from a separation from Christ, entreated his Lord to purify different members of his body. The answer was, that that was not necessary. It was absolutely requisite that he should be sanc-

Instability of Human Greatness. (From "The Times.")

It is with the greatest pleasure that we announce the safe arrival of the last and most illustrious instalment of the "Royal fugitives" on these shores. For a whole week the ex-King of the French, after playing for eighteen years the most conspicuous part on the most conspicuous stage of European affairs, had totally disappeared from the scene. His place could nowhere be found; and, shocking as all would have felt it, it was at least as probable a conjecture as any other, that his majesty had perished in the Channel. The Express steamer brought them yesterday morning to Newhaven, where they had to wait for some hours till the state of the tide should enable them to enter the harbour. At last they landed, and were glad to receive a very hearty welcome to the well-known shore. For the rest we must refer to the particulars which we have been enabled to supply, and to which the rank, the misfortunes, and, it must be added, the errors of the distinguished sufferer, will impart so peculiar an interest.

It may be safely said there is nothing in history, nothing at least, in the examples which most readily occur to the mind, that at all comes near the tremendous suddenness of the present royal reverse. This day fortnight Louis Philippe was the most prosperous, the most powerful, and accounted the ablest sovereign in the world. If the reader will just think of it, he will find that this wonderful man had attained the very acme of success, consideration and power. It is a work of time to enumerate the many circumstances of his splendid condition. His numerous, handsome, and dutiful children; the brilliant alliances—one of them recently concluded—which brought into one family interest the vast region from Antwerp to Cadiz; the near prospect of an event which would probably make his grandchild the sovereign, his son the regent of Spain; the great cross and drawback of his reign just removed,—Algeria pacified after eighteen years' war; his immense private fortune; his eleven or twelve palaces, unequalled for situation and magnificence, on all of which he had recently spent immense sums of money; his splendid army of four hundred thousand men, in the highest discipline and equipment; a minister of unequalled energy and genius, who had found out at last the secret of France; a metropolis fortified and armed to the teeth against all the world; the favorable advances recently made by those powers who had recently looked down on the royal parvenu; the well-balanced state of his foreign relations, and the firmly grasped reins of the political car;—all these gifts of fortune, and more, if we had time to go on with the list, were heaped on one man, in such profusion as really to pall the imagination. What crowned it all was, that Louis Philippe was allowed the entire credit of his success. It was all the work of his own hands. He might stand like the ancient king on the walls and towers which he had drawn round his city, in the houses of man; contemplate the work of beauty and policy which himself expressed. The balance of Europe, the causes of peoples and the price, the issues of peace and of war, were in his hands. If not that was an amari aliquid in this garden of roses and delights, mud, and impregnable forts and a hundred thousand armed men water no insignificant watch upon a few disorderly subjects. spring himself would hardly have ventured to preach upon this unalloyed text, ante obitum nemo, to so safe a man.

"That we have described was a sober and solid reality. What dipping we come to reads like the preposterous incidents of a infant's tale. A mob of artisans, boys, and some women, pours plainly, the streets of Paris. They make for the palace. Eighty April and infantry, cavalry and artillery, are dumbfounded and ed. In a few minutes an elderly couple are seen bustling from the hubbub; they are thrust into a hack cab and out of the way. The mob rushes into the Senate and into a Republican government, which exists, which is the nation with great energy and judgment, and is already enthroned with the representatives of foreign powers. occupant we follow the princes. We say it without intending which it is, and only as relating the simple truth of the that it is. No family of Irish tramps was ever so summarily much id out of the way as this illustrious group. The Queen, into the told, had run back to a bureau for some silver, but it readily it was not enough, as a hat was sent round for the royal have no at St. Cloud, and a small sum clubbed by the National of excess. At Dreux they were left with a five-franc piece before for wha hem. Flying "when none pursueth," they get to Louis cheating's once celebrated chateau at Eu, which they are licence to enter. So there they disappear into space. They torting to be at Eu, and for a week,—that is all that we know of siasm. Meanwhile the rest had dropped in one by one. They plied, like foreign birds, dashed by a storm against a light-pastor a The Duke De Nemours and certain Saxe Coburgs humil type day, knowing nothing of the rest. They parted in penitence. A Spanish Infanta, for whose hand all the world goodnes in peting only the year before last, scrambled out another enthusiasm through bye-roads and back doors; and—strange event—cessarily to give Spain an English born sovereign, under Victoria's kindly auspices. No sooner, however, have the fugitives found a friendly asylum than they are obliged to seek another roof. Other princes and princesses turn up here and there. A lady-in-waiting rejoins her mistress. A cabinet minister is found. The children and governess of another arrive. The recontres and reunions are strange enough. A prince of the blood and an ex-prefect meet in disguise and do not know one another. Very late a youthful heir to the crown of France, and who had been actually acknowledged as reigning king by the deputies, is discovered at a channel island with his mother and brother. The two children had been lost in the mob on leaving the chamber, had been got somehow to Eu, with their mother, wearied and bearing muddy marks of rough travel. Thence by heavy bribing they had procured a passage to the first British rock. Thus are they driven and scattered by the besom of revolution. They arrive penniless, without a change of raiment, dejected and bewildered, telling one another their stories of many strange adventures, having each come a different journey, though starting from one point, and almost at one hour.

After many days suspense, the king and queen are heard of, on some private information, on the coast of Normandy, where they had been "on the run" from house to house, and content with humble hospitality; the king, we are told, in strange disguises. They still have a small retinue. These half-dozen invaders, without either arms or baggage, do not find it so easy to cross the channel. Stationing themselves at Harfleur, within 20 minutes sail of Havre, they watch opportunity and the weather, which last delays their passage several days. At length they get into a British steamer. Arrived at Newhaven, after a rough passage they encounter fresh delays, as if to prove that England is not easily surprised. Louis Philippe, who was to bridge the British Hellespont, crosses it with foreign aid, and lands in a pea-jacket borrowed from the English captain. He finds himself at home. The associations and friends of his former exile greet him. A generation passes like a dream, and the aged monarch finds himself the Duke of Orleans, the banished son of old Egalité again. Would that all could be forgotten! But if what is said be true, some recollections did occur of an accusing character. The frequent exclamation, "Like Charles X.," we are told, betrayed the current of his thoughts. "We are verily guilty concerning our brother;—therefore is this distress come upon us." At the very moment the missing king appears at one port his lost minister is heard of at another. Guizot is now in London. His day for active life is over; he is again the philosopher and historian; and, doubtless, like the Roman orator, will forthwith occupy his political retirement with studies far more suited to his genius, and more conducive to his reputation, than the government of states.

England's path is clear. She is the refuge of exiles and opens her shores to the unfortunate of every land or party. She would at once preclude herself from offering this hospitality, and leave Europe without a refuge, if she involved herself in the ruined causes and pretensions of her royal visitors. She can only receive them as exiles, not as pretenders. It may be some violence to feeling, but is nevertheless necessary to let it be clearly understood by those differences within the range of courtly etiquette, that while the persons of the unfortunate are pitied and respected, and their former rank remembered, they still possess no higher character than their own nation chooses to allow.

Some Rules for the Conduct of Human Life, &c.

(By Archbishop Synge, 1659—1741.)

III. RULES FOR LEADING A QUIET LIFE.

An harmonious life I take to be much, if not altogether, the same with a quiet life. However, it may not be amiss to add two or three rules under this last title.

Quietness is either inward in a man's own mind; or outward, in being at peace with other men. Both these, when they are fully enjoyed, contribute highly to the happiness of man; and that you may enjoy them both, I hope the following rules will be of service to you:—

Rule 1.—Be well content with your own condition, whatsoever it is. Endeavour, by honest labour and industry, to make your circumstances better than they are, for the good both of yourself and others. But if such your endeavours do not meet with success; or if heavy afflictions bear hard upon you; remember that God governs the world by a particular providence, that "a sparrow does not fall on the ground without Him." Matt. x. 29. That "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Heb. xii. 6. That, "it is good for us to be afflicted, that we may learn his statutes." Psal. cxix. 71. Remember all this (I say) and more that might be added, both from reason and Holy Scripture, to the like purpose. "Bear your afflictions patiently, and make the right use of them, and hope for a blessed reward in the life to come."

Rule 2.—"Exercise yourself to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men." Acts xxiv. 16. This will give you quietness in your own mind; and the fault will not be yours if you are not of peace with all men; which will be a great satisfaction to you.

Rule 3.—Engage yourself in no more business than what you find yourself able to go through with. The want of this caution has made the life of many a man uneasy and unquiet.

Rule 4.—Meddle not with the affairs of any other man, which do not belong to you, except it be at his own desire, to do him a charitable or friendly office; and this without doing any manner of wrong to another. It is a very unacceptable thing to be "a busy-body in other men's matters either by word or deed." 1 Pet. vi. 15. Therefore, "study to be quiet, and to do your own business." 1 Thes. iv. 11.

Rule 5.—Engage not in any party quarrels (whether public or private) any further than the laws of God or your country oblige you, lest you be crushed between them.

Rule 6.—Fly from the first motions of every temptation to sin; and take sanctuary in good thoughts, good employment, good books, or good and virtuous company. The surest way to keep yourself pure and unspotted is to fly from temptation. If you cannot fly, call God to your assistance, and arm yourself with a firm resolution to resist; and always be upon your guard that you be not surprised. "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation. The spirit, indeed, is willing but the flesh is weak." Matt. xxvi. 41. "It is much better to keep yourself clean, than to suffer yourself to be polluted, because, possibly, you may again be washed. It is much safer not to be wounded, than afterwards to be healed with a scar left behind; and to keep your enemy at a distance, than to engage with him when the victory is uncertain."

IV. RULES FOR A LIFE OF BUSINESS.

Rule 1.—Lead not an idle life; but find out some honest business (private or public, or both) wherein constantly to employ yourself and others. Consider what business you are fitted for, and set yourself to it with diligence; but under take no more than what you are well able to perform; lest you come off with shame and sorrow. Idleness will betray you to many evils and inconveniences, and entitle you to no other rewards but the dismal one of "the unprofitable servant." Matt. xxv. 30. Therefore, "endeavour, as much as you can, always to be doing something which is good."

Rule 2.—"Be not slothful in business." Rome. xii. 11. For that is much the same with idleness, and sometimes worse than it. But when you have a fair prospect of doing what is good, and rightly understand the ways and means of performing it. You may possibly sometimes be defeated in a good purpose: but it is your duty to attempt it, whenever you find a reasonable probability of success.

Rule 3.—When you find yourself well able to do a good thing without the assistance of any one but God, never put it or any part of it off to be done by any other man, of whose honesty, sufficiency, and industry you cannot be so sure as, in such a case, you may be of your own. "But if you find that you want the help of others, let not the vanity of having all the praise to yourself make you decline it; lest the good you aim at may thereby be lost."

Rule 4.—When you find yourself able to perform a good work to-day, do not put it off till to-morrow. Laziness is a sort of idleness; and many a good undertaking has failed by unnecessary delay, as well as by over much haste. "Ye know not what shall be on the morrow." Jam. iv. 14. "Thou knowest not what a day may bring forth." Prov. xxvii. 1. "Therefore whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."—Eccles. ix. 10.

Rule 5.—Lawful gain may and ought in many cases to be made; for, without this, few men would be able to support themselves and their families, or to do much good to others. But let not gain (however lawful) be the chief motive for undertaking any business, whether public or private; if you are greedy of gain, it will often mislead you; "They that will be rich fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition; for the love of money is the root of all evil."—1 Tim. vi. 9, 10. Your great aim, in undertaking any sort of business, ought always to be to please God by doing good in the world. Keep this constantly in your view, and it will always lead you in the right way; but if you look aside after gain, you will continually be in danger of being misled. Among other qualifications of a righteous man, this is one, that "He despiseth the gain of oppressions."—Isa. xxxiii. 15. That is to say, all gain but what is just and honest. "Gain is a very strong temptation, against which, therefore, you must be very watchful and upon your guard."

V. RULES FOR A LIFE IN A MULTITUDE OF BUSINESS.

Rule 1.—If ever much business unavoidably comes at once upon you, be not discouraged, for that will make you negligent; but consider how to put it into the best order, that one thing may be done after another, or without hindering each other.

Rule 2.—Be always a good manager of your time, and lay hold of each opportunity that offers for the doing whatever is necessary to be done. If you neglect a proper opportunity, you may not perhaps meet with it again: whereas, by dexterously laying hold of it whenever it offers, you will be able in a little time to dispatch much business.

Rule 3.—Always consider the probable consequences of what you intend to do; that you may guard against those which are evil or inconvenient. "A thing may at first sight look very plausible; but if we look well to what may follow from it, we may find good reason for laying it aside, or at least for altering our measure."

Rule 4.—Consult with yourself, and with others who are knowing and honest, about everything of moment which you are to undertake; but waste not that time in unprofitable discourse about it, which may be better employed in doing it. Thought is quick: and when a wise man is once well informed (of which he will take care) he will not be long in deliberating what is best to be done, but many a good opportunity has been lost by too much consultation about it. "A wise man thinks much, which is soon done, but speaks no more than what is necessary, being a good husband of his time, which is very precious."

Rule 5.—Where you are not able to finish a business without the help of others, call in speedily such persons to your assistance, as are fit to be employed on it. "The more hands are employed, the more work is done; provided they are managed in such good order as not to be a hindrance to one another."

Rule 6.—Take some proper times to relax your thoughts from all business; that you may be the better able to return to it. A heavy load, constantly borne without any intermission, will waste your strength, and make you unfit for everything.

Loss of the 'Omega.'

On the 16th January last, the ship Omega sailed from Liverpool, having on board 327 passengers. Among them was a Mrs. Horner, three children from two to nine years of age, three of her brothers and a nephew, adults.

On Tuesday, 8th February, a severe gale was encountered, succeeded by several others, until the 12th, when the ship became a perfect wreck. The day following, 190 passengers embarked on board the 'Aurora,' bound for St. John, N. B.; amongst whom were Mrs. Horner, her three children and nephew. The mother, however, went back to the Omega, to procure some food, which she had left in the cabin, when the gale parted the two vessels, and with them, the mother and her children. The passengers were put on an allowance of two ounces of biscuit and a wine-glass of water per day, for seventeen days. Before reaching St. John, sixty souls perished of hunger, thirst and cold; and among others, Mrs. Horner's children and nephew, the former of whom were found on the morning of the 19th of March, locked in one another's arms;—having been 'lovely and pleasant in their lives, in their death they were not divided.' The Burial Service was read over their remains, and they were committed to the angry deep, there to remain until the sea gives up her dead.

The remainder of the passengers of the Omega were placed on board the brig Barbara, with twelve barrels of provisions; but which, in the attempt to enter a very dangerous harbor, for the purpose of procuring water, stove against the rocks, on the coast of Newfoundland. Thirty-seven passengers escaped to shore, while one hundred souls, including Mrs. H. and her three brothers, met a watery grave.

Thus have eight members of one family all perished at once,—having left an affectionate father and husband, and a devoted brother (who had a year ago emigrated from England and settled in Hopkinton, Mass.) to mourn their untimely death. Thus, likewise, has the Church, here, suffered the loss of an anticipated acquisition to our little band, of four pious members of the Church of England, and one of the Wesleyan connection.

May the mourners sustain themselves on God; and may their stricken hearts be not a little comforted by the thought, that their dear ones, 'having finished their course in faith, do now rest from their labours.' And above all, let the fact, that they are daily remembered in the Church's 'prayers for all conditions of men,' be a sweet cordial to their spirits.—Finally, we commend to Thy Fatherly goodness, all those who are any ways afflicted or distressed in mind, body or estate; that it may please Thee to comfort and relieve them according to their several necessities; giving them patience under their sufferings, and a happy issue out of all their afflictions: And this we beg for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.—Christian Witness.

New Zealand.

NEW CHRISTIAN ISLAND.—Capt. Brown, from New London, in a letter to a Sandwich Island paper, says:

"The natives of New Zealand who reside on Stewart's Island are fast becoming Christianized. They are very observant of the Sabbath.—They will not enter their gardens to get a potato to broil on the Sabbath, always prepare enough on Saturday to last until Monday, if they fall short go without. All the white residents were formerly sailors, sealmen and whalers. Their rum shops. I must acknowledge that many of them in their behaviour are far superior to the majority of people in any other place I ever visited; they seem to be much pleased with our meetings, always attending whenever the weather would permit, coming sometimes ten miles. I distributed all the books I had among them, which they seemed to be eager to receive, and a large number of tracts. They felt much the Bibles, and I was very sorry we had no more to part with. The inhabitants are nearly all Missionaries, as they call themselves, that is Christians; the result of modern Missionary work, The Church Courier.

STINGY CHRISTIANS.

The Christian Advocate and Journal makes the following sensible remarks in reference to a class of Christians frequently met with:

"We confess, however, that we have often questioned the Christian character of some loud professors whom we know, on account of their stingy contributions to the cause of the Gospel and the relief of the poor. We have known of those who would visit the sick poor, and pray with them as long as anybody, but you could no more get a dollar for the relief of the sufferers, than you could one penny; it was evident that if they could sell their prayer for a dollar a piece, they would not have given one away. A minister and his family might have starved if their brethren were not so ready to give, had not felt their Christian obligations. Such people have always by them that 'neat little pocket of selfishness,' as Watson calls it, 'Charity begins at home,' and verily, this charity leaves off where it begins. annually to their gains, and their love of gain feeds on the accumulation, until it hardens the heart, and conscience against all the claims which the Gospel makes on them, and all the calls of mercy and benevolence in suffering humanity. But the strangest thing of all is, that people really persuade themselves they are pious Christians, because they can, now and then, work themselves up to some pious feelings and emotions. Thus they deceive themselves, until at length they hear, 'Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall these things be which thou hast provided.'"

"Buried with him in baptism;"—Col. ii. 12.

"We are buried with him by baptism into death;"—Rom. vi. 4.

It is not a little surprising that eminent expositors not belonging to the sect of the Baptists should have yielded the point that total immersion is spoken of in the passages quoted at the head of this article. Take for examples Locke, Doddridge and Whitby. Locke, who evidently had his eye on the passage in the Epistle to the Colossians, thus paraphrases Rom. vi. 3, 4. "For this I hope you are not ignorant of, that we Christians, who by baptism were admitted into the Kingdom and Church of Christ, were baptized into a similitude of his death: We did own some kind of death by being buried under water, which, being buried with him, i. e. in conformity to his burial,* as a confession of our being dead, was to signify, that as Christ was raised up from the dead into a glorious life with his Father, even so we, being raised from our typical death and burial in baptism, should lead a new sort of life, wholly different from our former, in some approaches towards that heavenly life that Christ is risen to." Doddridge says, "It seems the part of candor to confess, that here is an allusion to the manner of baptizing by immersion, as most usual in these early times; but that will not prove this particular circumstance to be essential to the ordinance." Whitby tells us, that it is "expressly declared" that we are buried with Christ in baptism by being buried under water, and that the argument to oblige us to a conformity to Christ's death by dying to sin is taken hence.† Here then we find a cold and calculating layman, an "evangelical" Presbyterian minister, and a medium Church clergy-

* The edition of Locke's Works now quoted is that of London, 1823. The punctuation is probably incorrect. The author's meaning doubtless is, "Which burial in conformity to Christ's burial, as a confession of our being dead, was to signify, &c."

† A writer in the Banner (Feb. 26) says that in the Romish communion sprinkling is never used. Whitby, that the change from immersion to sprinkling is that "which the Romanist still urges to justify his refusal of the cup to the laity."

Quere; which is right?

man, uniting their forces on a particular point as if there were no reasons for doubt.

And yet there are reasons for doubt. What "similitude," what resemblance can be found between Christ's burial and a burial under water? Were the Jews accustomed to bury their dead under water? There is no proof of it. Nobody pretends that they did. Was our Lord's interment in any respect like an immersion? It is difficult to conceive wherein the likeness consists. If Joseph of Arimathea had deposited his body in a grave such as we are accustomed to bury in, and then cast earth upon it till it was covered, it might have been said that both affusion and total immersion symbolized the burial. But the body was laid in a sepulchre hewn out of a rock; a sepulchre the bottom or floor of which was probably on a level with the ground on the outside.† It requires some stretch of the imagination, then, to build as many do, an important doctrine, that of the necessity of total immersion, on such a foundation as this.

But if the ceremony of immersion furnishes an apt representation of an internal cleansing, is not total immersion preferable to affusion, as representing a thorough purification? A reference to two passages of Scripture, it is thought, will show that, as a symbolic action, partial washing is equally significant with total! "When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, 'I am innocent of the blood of this just person.'"—(Mat. xxvii. 24.) The ceremony of washing the hands in token of innocence was familiar to the Jews.—(Deut. xxi. P. xxvi.) But as Pilate was a Gentile, he may in this instance have followed a Gentile custom. "It was the custom among the ancients, (says Whitby, quoting the Scholiast upon Sophocles) when they had killed a man or shed blood, to wash their hands in water, to purify them from defilement."§ 2. Jesus said to Simon Peter, "If I wash thee not,

† It may possibly have been higher than the level of the garden. When Shebna was rebuked for his pride, it was said, "What hast thou here, and whom hast thou here, that thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here, as he that heweth him out a sepulchre on high, &c.?" Is. xxii. 16. Some persons may have supposed from John and Peter's stooping down and looking into the sepulchre, that after entering the door they bent forward and looked down. (Luke xxiv. 12: John xx. 5.) But the word rendered to stoop down is rendered in Canticles, ii. 9, (Sept.) to look forth from a window, and in Eccles. xxi. 23, to peep in at a door. Calmet (Fragment 138,) thinks that the door of the inner chamber of the sepulchre was 4 feet high.

§ Whitby says that Aeneas in Virgil speaketh to the same purpose, referring to Æn. II., 715. But in this he may be mistaken. Aeneas appears disposed to give his body quite a thorough ablution. The following is Dryden's paraphrase of a part of his address to his father:

"Our country gods, the relics and the bands,
Hold you, my father, in your guiltless hands:
In me 'tis impious holy things to bear,
Red as I am with slaughter, new from war,
Till in some living stream I cleanse the guilt,
Of dire debate, and blood in battle spilt."

LIGHTFOOT (V. 66,) tells us that "bathing for purification was a mere stranger among the Gentiles, and used by none but the idolatrous priests." He does not, however, give his authority. Rous in his Archæologia gives an account of the methods that were pursued by the Greeks to get rid of the bad effects of dreams. After mentioning two, he says, "If you think that this will not do neither, try a third remedy, go make a prayer, and wash yourself lustily in the cold river till you sweat." "Or, if the river water be not good enough, go to the fountain, as he did in Æschylus." "If you think no cold water will do it, call for hot, as he does in Aristophanes."

thou hast no part with me. Simon Peter saith to him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. Jesus saith to him, He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit.—John xiii. 8, 9, 10. "That this [last] saying of Christ did not relate merely to bodily cleanliness is plain, (said the late Bishop Seabury,) from his remark to the same disciple, upon his objecting to Christ's doing so servile an office for him; 'If I wash thee not, thou hast no part in me.' That washing, therefore, was not only an instance of humility in Christ, and an example of it to his apostles; but it was figurative of internal and spiritual cleansing. For how should washing the feet make the whole body clean, unless it be in a figurative and mystical sense?" (Sermon, of Baptism, p. 95.) It ought in justice here to be stated that a different view of this passage is held by some expositors. The following is supposed to be the meaning of the 10th verse: "Then Jesus, willing to lay hold on a hint which gave him an opportunity of pursuing so useful a thought, says further to Simon Peter, 'He that is washed already, or that has just been bathing, needs only to wash his feet, which may indeed easily be soiled by the shortest walk, and when that is done, he is entirely clean;' at which he should have said, 'The truly good man needs not that deep repentance and universal change which is absolutely necessary to others, though he should, by renewed acts of penitence and faith, be cleansing himself from smaller pollutions, which are in some degree inseparable from the infirmity of human nature, &c.'" But the objection to this view is twofold. 1. It represents our Lord as descending in the 10th verse from the lofty position which he had assumed in the 8th. Unless I wash thee, he had said to Peter, after that disciple had declared that he should never wash his feet, Unless I wash thee, thou art not mine. Peter alarmed begged him to wash not only his feet, but also his hands and head. What reply then was to be expected? That Peter was already washed, and therefore need not be alarmed? That a slight cleansing was necessary to entitle him to the privilege of having part with Christ? Such a reply does not appear to be in keeping with the character or general conversation of our Lord. 2. It is to be borne in mind that during the conversation now referred to our Lord predicted that Peter would thrice deny him, and mercifully promised to pray for him lest his faith should fail; (Luke xxii., 32;) that a few hours afterward Peter not only denied him, but cursed, and swore that he knew him not; and that upon due reflection he wept bitterly. Was Peter's one of those "smaller pollutions which are in some degree inseparable from the infirmity of human nature?" This will hardly be affirmed. Is it probable, then, that while the master was warning the disciple of his danger, and striving to prepare him for the conflict with Satan, he would at the same moment neutralize the effect of his warnings by the assurance that the disciple had been already completely cleansed, and now required but a modicum of spiritual influence? According to the view now advocated the passage is clear and unencumbered with difficulties. Peter, apprehensive of the consequences to flow from a separation from Christ, entreated his Lord to purify different members of his body. The answer was, that that was not necessary. It was absolutely requisite that he should be sanctified, and that some outward act should symbolize the inward process; but in the use of the symbol he need not be over-anxious as to the point of more or less, of totality or partiality. The cleansing of one member was equivalent to the cleansing of the whole.]

If any who are styled "Regular" or "Ironsides" Baptists should still insist upon the exposition of John xiii., 10, which I have endeavoured to set aside, I beg leave to meet them on their own ground. They generally maintain that baptism is not indispensable to salvation, that they become the children of God by faith, that true believers are washed when they first receive Christ for their Saviour, that all their sins are then completely pardoned, and that baptism is afterward administered as being "an impressive emblem of that through which their sins are remitted or washed away." This, it is believed, is a fair statement of the views of the Regular Baptists, as distinguished from the disciples of "Elder Campbell." My argu-

"But perhaps no kind of fresh water is strong enough; you may do well, therefore, to try in the sea, for there they used to wash away not only the evil of a dream, but of a crime, or disease, or any thing else; for 'tis reported that Euripides when he went with Plato into Egypt, being troubled with the falling sickness, was bid by the priest to bathe himself in the sea, &c." "After murder it was a common practice; and then no fear of the displeasure of a god for the future."—Lib. vii. Cap. v.

|| The word rendered He that is washed signifies also, He that is about to be washed. See similar participles in passages quoted in Winer's Grammar, p. 131. Professor Anthon in his notes on Horace, Ode XXVIII., B. I. relates a circumstance which furnishes an appropriate illustration of the figure Synecdoche. A mariner, as he was travelling on the shore of Southern Italy, discovered the dead body of the Philosopher Archytas, which had been thrown up by the waves. He addressed the corpse and expressed his surprise that so illustrious an individual could not escape from the dominion of the grave. The shade replied, "Be not surprised, O mariner, at beholding me in this state. Death has selected far nobler victims. Bestow the last sad offices on my remains, and so shall prosperous fortune crown your every effort." "According to the popular belief, if a corpse were deprived of the rites of sepulture, the shade of the deceased was compelled to wander for a hundred years either around the dead body or along the banks of the Styx. . . . In order to obviate so lamentable a result, it was esteemed a most solemn duty for every one who chanced to encounter an unburied corpse to perform the last sad offices to it. Sprinkling dust or sand three times upon the dead body was esteemed amply sufficient for every purpose." If the learned professor is right the ancient Romans might with propriety have said, "He that is to receive the rites of sepulture, needeth not to be entirely covered with earth; his body is honorably interred if it thrice receives an emblematic sprinkling.

ment, then, is this: if baptism is an impressive emblem of that through which our sins are remitted or washed away, the Saviour, according to their interpretation, has expressly decided against the necessity of total immersion. They being our witnesses, he has decreed that the man who is already washed from his sins needeth not to be emblematically washed, save in a part of his body.

Three paragraphs from Lightfoot's Harmony shall close this article.

"Baptism was not administered among the Jews by any whomsoever, but only men of some authority, and in orders, and appointed thereunto; a 'Beth Du' or Consistory or Tribunal was orderly and properly to administer it, and not every one that would take it upon him. So also was the administration of this ordinance in the New Testament by ministerial men, and men appointed and empowered for such a work.

"If Paul were baptized within the house, as the story seemeth plainly to carry it; (Acts ix., 17, 18,) or if any other in the New Testament (Acts x., 47-8,) were either baptized in houses or synagogues, they could not be baptized after this manner of the Jews' baptism [by dipping.] for they had an express maxim against dipping in any vessel; unless it were the priests' bathing themselves in the Jordan sea. 'But was not that a vessel?' (say the Gemarists, in the Jerusalem Talmud,) 'Yes, but R. Joshua, the son of Levi, saith, a pipe of water ran into it out of the well Etam;' and so it was as a spring of water, because fresh water was running into it continually.

"Though men of age among the Jews were baptized by dipping, as their records do evidence, yet it is hard to find that infants among them were so dipped; and yet they speak it out plainly, that infants were baptized."—Works, V., 65, 66.

ENTHUSIASM.

Pulpit.

Enthusiasm is consentaneous in almost every profession and occupation, but that of religion; and yet there is not one in which it is more frequently employed under the strange notion that it is efficacious. In true religion it has no place. Fervor much indulged is often so called, but on a careful examination into the difference between the two, a line of demarcation can readily be drawn. Piety and devotion, humble and sincere, can have no sympathy with feelings that are perpetually on the verge of excess and transgression. With the many perhaps, passing for what it is not it may be, captivating for the time, even cheating the judgment of the speaker himself: but to the intelligence of men of integrity and proper cultivation it is a sad distorting of fervor into passion. There is a vulgarity about enthusiasm in the pulpit, arising from the cause to which it is applied, which cannot fail eventually to prove detrimental to both pastor and congregation. It puts all in a sub-commotion. The humility of prayer,—prayer on the knees; the prostrate heart of penitence; and the thanks of a grateful remembrance of divine goodness are painfully at variance with that false position which enthusiasm of necessity ascends to. Egotism moreover is necessarily implied in it, which may be all very well where the type of individuality is deemed necessary; but the slightest display of it in that service which is so remarkable for its dignity, simplicity, and humble-mindedness, is to the feelings of an upright worshipper fulsome in the extreme.

The vulgarity of enthusiasm in a minister of religion it is conceived, consists in this, that we are to be impressed as a congregation with the Divine emotion of our preacher. This emotion is not "hid in a bushel." A little mindedness, perfectly incompatible with that dignity and self-possession which greatness of mind is dressed in, is very apt, when it finds that all must listen to all it has to say, to yield to the suggestions an inflated sense of self-importance is ever ready to induce; and, under this swelling feeling, rendered more and more swollen, as the lone position, the upturned countenances, the sacred place, and the awful silence affect the mind and feelings, to commence that peculiar, measured would be impressive strain, deemed so imposingly grand if not actually sublime.

The natural tendency of enthusiasm is to excess, and in nothing more so perhaps than in religion. All excess, naturally leads to further excess, and that to overthrow and destruction. We look upon enthusiasm in an advocate of any of the arts and sciences with feelings of allowance, because we understand it to arise from a particular partiality to the object of his adoption, which has a direct bearing upon his happiness and prosperity, provided he can only make others think and feel as he does upon the subject. His egotism, extravagance, and misrepresentation (perhaps unintentional) the concomitants of enthusiasm, are greeted either with a smile of incredulity, or silent contempt; we perceive the aim of our advocate to be to establish his own peculiar notions, feelings, and views, because by so doing, his character, his reputation, his success and fortune are all enhanced. With this feeling we overlook it, but suspect his integrity; and in religion this operates to a much greater extent. Good sense and moral rectitude of purpose are alone sufficient, without an appeal to the higher qualities of mind to detect this imposture. Although for the time our tongues must be still, the understanding and the heart are in converse, and at what the eye sees, and the ear hears they simultaneously revolt. In religion all must be truth, manner, voice, and precept, nay more, we must ever feel that the motives are true to the great and holy cause; that they are not misplaced, misapplied, mis-conceived, or mis-led in any way. A minister is the advocate of truth, ay, of holy truth. In him we look for no trickery, no languishing airs, no womanish weakness at his own sad story no unmeaning, metaphysical quibbling upon an axiom: but for manly plainness of speech and bearing, simplicity of manner, and freedom from every thing, how elegant soever elsewhere, that is untoward to the thoughts and feelings of piety and devotion. Who would attain the writings of St. Paul with the charge of enthusiasm? No one. Nothing would have shocked his fervid, pious eloquence more. It may fairly be asked, can enthusiasm exist without a certain amount of charlatanny? At all events it will in all probability incur the suspicion if not the actual consequences of it. Besides there is a pretension inherent in religious enthusiasm which (some have called it by a bolder name, presumptuousness) is sadly at variance with that simplicity with which truth seeks to enrobe itself. It speaks in the bearing, the voice, the gesture, and in the very words as they fall from the lips. Oh what a mistake, and how fatal to the nurture of piety are the bombast, and over-reaching aspirations of religious enthusiasm! The lip 'may speak aloud of His praise, though the heart is courting for its own, and this often-times the more lamentably, because deceived by the hope of ecomium for its exertion and eloquence, the spirit, the heart, is not of Him' in whom all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," but of that egotism, vanity, and presumption which the man of insufficient judgment, humility, and godliness, is prompted by flattery to indulge at the expense of sanctity.

The manners of society, (where society is cultivated) are become gentle, graceful, calm, and unostentatious. Conversation is chaste; sentiment truthful, opinions are offered with deference and modesty, and the precepts of religion are pronounced with reverence due to the Being from whom we receive them. Can it be proper that a course so greatly at variance with these elements of christian accomplishments, should be set at naught by him whose permanent business it is to improve them if possible, if not at least to uphold them not less in public than in private, in the homestead than in the temple? If it be pronounced vulgar to violate these established rules, deemed by the judicious essential to the well being of a chaste and intellectual society, can it be less so in him who egregiously trespasses upon the simple and sacred rules which circumscribe the duties of a spiritual and religious society?

In religion there is nothing boisterous, nothing exciting. It addresses itself to the deeper feelings, and thoughts, and dwells in silence in the innermost shrines of the heart. It subdues all undue emotion; checks impetuosity, curbs precipitancy, and is the broad fundamental basis of true dignity and simplicity. If such be the case, surely the enthusiast cannot fail to arouse astonishment and apprehension in him whose study is elevation of character by holy means; whose love for goodness, and truth, and all things sacred and divine, hath its roots deep in the soil of the New Testament; whose model of fervency and energy is St. Paul; or of love and meekness Christ himself; but whose enthusiasm is a cypher, as in the gospel it is non extant.

Let him who is used to indulge the allurements of enthusiasm when expounding the things of God, beware how he plays his fantastic tricks before high Heaven. His business, his bounden duty is to teach, not to enact the orator Divine; to let the words of wisdom and life touch the heart, not bursts of ecstasy and fanaticism pierce the ear. Above all things let him be in himself, as far as in him lies by daily habit, and study, the outward manifestation "of an inward and spiritual grace."

There is a point connected with this subject which we are secretly prompted to notice, viz. its deleterious influence upon the congregation. In a portion of country where from its recent settlement, and rapid influx of persons of almost every grade and profession, a congregation must of necessity be formed of such, it surely behoves a minister of Christ to study with great consideration the true condition of his charge in spiritual matters. That to the majority, and that a large one, the most undisciplined, and direct exposition possible of the vital points of their religion would be required, is no more than any rational man would anticipate. If, however, instead of the 'bread of life,' the allurements of more exciting food be put before them, it is easy to perceive how little likely minds so fed are to be satisfied with any thing short of an increased stimulus in proportion to the increase of appetite for it, an appetite rendered morbid and capricious by wanton indulgence. With such the unexamined elegance and simplicity of the service of the Church, is apt to be a minor consideration; and it is painful to reflect, that it has sometimes seemed to be so to the minister himself; for not unfrequently has it happened that the service has been unnecessarily curtailed, merely to expedite the pulpit performance, and give further time for display. If to such a congregation perchance a man of modesty and talent, singleness and truth be asked to preach, his unassuming manners, gentleness of voice, simplicity of language (how rare a virtue!) and appropriate enunciation fall senseless upon their overstraining eyes and pampered expectations. Whose the fault; need not be asked.

St. Mark's Church, Northumberland.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—

Will you allow me to ask through your paper, if there are any of the Philadelphia Churchmen, to whom God has given the ability, that are willing to contribute towards the finishing of a small Church in the town of Northumberland? The services of the church have been held in this town regularly, for something more than eighteen months. And although in an inconvenient and uncomfortable room, the congregations have been quite as good as in some of our established country parishes. A parish has been formed and vestry elected. And a small, but neat church building begun, and as far as the exterior is concerned, finished and painted.

It requires yet to be plastered, and provided with seats, chancel furniture &c.

Two hundred and fifty dollars would enable the vestry to finish it comfortably for immediate use. And to avoid contracting a debt, they must receive aid from their more wealthy brethren abroad. If this should meet the eye of any who have of this world's goods, an abundance and to spare, and who know how sadly the wholesome institutions of the church are wanted in this neglected portion of our Diocese, may we not hope that though an humble undertaking, it shall be remembered in that stewardship, whose work that proceedeth of love is not forgotten by a righteous God! If any are disposed to aid in this work, their contributions may be left at the office of the Banner of the Cross.

A NEGLECTED RUBRIC.—We hear much of the poverty of the Institutions of the Church, of parishes groaning and sinking under the oppressive load of debt, of schools and colleges crippled or crushed for want of means. And all this while those who look to the gospel in the church as affording them their richest blessings and comforts in life or death are living and dying possessed of a superabundance of this world's goods! A heavy part of this fearful evil results, we fear, from the unfaithfulness of those who should seek on all proper occasions to press upon the hearts of the living and dying their responsibility to God in this respect, and the account they must at last render as the stewards of His earthly gifts. The growing wants of the church can only be met by an enlarged liberality on the part of her members proportioned to the increased demand. Especially should those who in life have enjoyed the benefit of the church's holy services, be faithfully reminded in the hour of death of the account they must give to God, and of the last opportunity of consecrating a portion of their worldly goods to the blessed purposes of Christian charity.

The Church has made this the solemn duty of her Ministers in a Rubric which we may well call neglected, one which has in fact become almost obsolete. It is found in the office for "the visitation of the sick," and is in these words.

"The Minister shall not omit earnestly to move such sick persons as are of ability, to be liberal to the poor."

In this provision the church has shown her usual practical wisdom. In its neglect we show our too common practical folly. And then without using the prescribed method of supplying her need, we impotently and vainly deplore her lack of means!

These remarks have been suggested by an article which appeared in a late number of the N. Y. Churchman, a part of which we subjoin.

"A LATE WILL.—The public curiosity has been much excited for a few days, concerning the will of probably the wealthiest man in the country. The testator resided in this city more than half a century, and died in it last month. Although, strictly speaking, he was not a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, yet he nominally belonged to it; as he many years since purchased a pew in one of our city Churches, and his children were brought up in that faith. He was, also, a long time intimately acquainted with several of the Clergy, and the great majority of his intimate friends belonged to the Church, and many of them were of its most influential and active members. It does not appear that any reproach can be cast upon them for improper influence or interested suggestions, in regard to the disposition of his estate. Not one cent is given to any Church or Religious Institution, here or elsewhere."

How just are the concluding remarks of the editor on this and similar cases.

"The reflection occurs, Whether the fault is not in part of us who lived with them? Whether it is not our duty to use every proper means to persuade those who have such abundance, to give of it a share back to Him who gave it all to them? Whether in fact we are doing our own duty, when from mistaken motives of delicacy, or any other insufficient cause, we abstain, upon due opportunity, from reminding our neighbour of the debt he owes to God.

We venture little in predicting that there will be less cause for such complaints, if the Rubric quoted be only faithfully followed.

It is pleasant to know that there are cases occurring where faithful members of the church remember Her need in the hour of their last extremity. Such a case has lately occurred in New York, as we are informed by the same paper. Mrs. Mary Welsh a parishioner of Zion Church, N. Y., left by her will, $5000, to found two scholarships, of $2,500 each, in the General Theological Seminary, for supporting indigent students.

She also left $1000 to the Missionary Committee of the Diocese of New York, and after giving handsome legacies to a number of friends, constituted Zion Church her residuary legatee. It is supposed that the portion of Zion Church will not be less than $5,000.

We hold this instance up as an example to the members of the church worthy of imitation. It is also an encouragement to the Ministers of the Church to be faithful in carrying out the Rubric designated. Such noble bequests will not be so few and far between when this can be no longer classed among the neglected Rubrics.

THE INSTABILITY OF HUMAN GREATNESS.—The history of our times has been marked by one of the most striking illustrations of the vanity of all earthly dependence. The account from the London Times, which will be found among our selections, presents this case in a clear and truthful manner.

When the Ministers of God give in their sermons, strong exhibitions of the insecurity of earthly possessions, and tell men how swiftly and suddenly power and wealth may fade away, the wise men of earth are disposed to regard these opinions as apt specimens of "the foolishness of preaching." The clergy know little of the world but in theory! what a pity they had not more experience! They never would talk so disparagingly of our most substantial blessings.

Draw near then, wise men of earth, ye who scoff and despise the lessons which God would impress by mortal lips, listen with reverence to God's eternal Providence proclaiming throughout the length and breadth of earth, the truths which are unheeded when uttered by your fellow men! This is the text of the heavenly discourse. "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches."

The discourse itself will be found as the first selection.

We have received with great pleasure, the following statement from a clergyman of North Carolina, regarding Bishop Ives, whose indisposition has caused much anxiety to his numerous friends. Many hearts will unite earnestly in the prayer with which our correspondent concludes.

For the Banner of the Cross.

North Carolina.

To satisfy the many inquiries that have been made in regard to the condition of our Bishop, it gives us pleasure to state that he is now convalescent. The disease with which he has been most severely afflicted, is the typhoid erysipelas. By circumstances which cannot be regarded as otherwise than providential, he was detained where able medical advice, and the kindest care of friends have been instrumental to the preservation of his most valuable life. But the violence of the disease has left him in such extreme debility, that in the opinion of his medical attendant, it will yet be some time before he will be so far restored as to be able to resume his official duties.

Let all then who are bound to him by the ties of affection or duty, thank God for his preservation so far, and pray for his perfect restoration.

The Annual Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania will meet at St. Andrew's Church on Tuesday afternoon 16th inst. at 5 o'clock.

We ask the attention of the charitable to the modest communication concerning St. Mark's Church, Northumberland.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania held on Tuesday May 2d, Testimonials were signed on behalf of the Rev. Thomas A. Starkey, and the Rev. Daniel S. Miller, Deacons, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Priests.

Also, on behalf of Mr. Joseph I. Elsegood, late a Minister of the Methodist denomination, applying to be recommended for admission as a candidate for Holy Orders.

Foreign Intelligence.

We have received "the English Churchman" of April 20th and the London Guardian of April 19th.

In both church and state, matters seem more quiet in Great Britain. The church appears happily relieved of all questions of general excitement, so that the English Churchman can thus speak.

"At no previous time have we felt more satisfied than on the present occasion, that we may, without any neglect of duty, carry out what we wish to make a general rule in this THE HOLY WEEK of the Church, of abstaining from discussions and disputations, whether on ecclesiastical or secular questions. And it gives us unfeigned pleasure to find that the only subject which it is at all necessary to notice in this place, this Week, is one upon which, even in these days of dissension, there can be no difference of opinion among persons of all parties—so far, at least, as concerns its main features."

This refers to a prayer set forth by the Archbishop of Canterbury, by order of the Queen and council, for the maintenance of peace and tranquillity.

We find in the English Churchman another grateful proof of the interest felt in the affairs of our church by the full republication of the proceedings at the formation of the Ecclesiological Society in New York.

We copy the following summary of Intelligence from the Guardian.

The consecration and opening of St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, is now fixed for St. Peter's Day next, June 29.

The Fellows of Sion College have presented an address to the Primate, expressing their congratulations, that as they are "Fully convinced that on the purity of the Protestant faith and on the stability of our Church depends the welfare of the State, we rejoice that our chief guidance in these anxious times has been placed in hands so experienced in authority, so moderate in its exercise, and so highly entitled to the confidence of the clergy of England."

His Grace replied, thanking them for their expressions of kindness, and then continued:—

"You congratulate me, gentlemen, on my accession to the See of Canterbury; and no doubt it is a post of dignity which may justly be the subject of congratulation, though I own that in former times I should have always rather dreaded its responsibilities that coveted its honours. And now, looking at the new and arduous duties which devolve on me, I confess that I should be dismayed at the prospect if I did not believe that our situations are chosen for us, and that He who orders them will render those whom he has called to his service sufficient for the performance of his will, as long as they make his glory their object, and look to Him for that aid of which they feel the need.

"To one part of your address I must now particularly allude. I entirely concur with you in the sentiment that the welfare of the State depends on our faithfulness to the Protestant principles of our Church. I believe that we may look for the blessing of God upon our country in proportion as we are true to those principles. One of your own members has shown, with great ingenuity and just application of historical knowledge, that such has been the case in former times. And we may believe it shall be so. For what is the Protestant principle in contrast to the principle to which it is opposed? It is adherence to the word of God, deference to the Scriptures rather than to the practice or opinions of men. Now, to know the word of God is to honour Him who revealed that word, and He has himself declared, 'Them that honour me I will honour.' I trust that, as far as in me lies, I shall endeavour to answer in this respect the expectations which you have formed, and endeavour to maintain the true principles of our Church, free alike from Romish tradition and from latitudinarian error."

The venerable Primate concluded by requesting their prayers on his behalf.

The Dean of Westminster will preach on Good Friday, and on Easter Sunday the Bishop of Oxford, in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The Bishop of Chichester will preach the Spital sermon at Christ Church, Newgate-street, on Easter Monday; and the Lord Mayor's chaplain the one on the following day. Dr. Hook, the vicar of Leeds, preaches on the first Sunday after Easter at St. Sepulchre's, on behalf of the charity schools of that parish.

Bishop Hampden will hold his first ordination at Hereford on Trinity Sunday.

A public meeting was held at Exeter-hall, on Friday evening, to hear from the Rev. J. Shore, of Berry Pomeroy, a narrative of the proceedings taken against him by the Bishop of Exeter. The Hon. A. Kinnaird was in the chair. The Rev. Baptist Noel and Rev. Thomas Mortimer were advertised to attend, but the Bishop of London interfered, and the former gentleman abstained, but the latter paid no attention to the admonition of his Diocesan, and was present amidst a number of Dissenting ministers aiding and abetting the schismatic priest.

The Bishop of London, during the past week, has consecrated a new church, dedicated to St. Matthew, in the City-road, and another dedicated to St. Jude, in the parish of White-chapel; the latter made the hundred and twenty-eighth his lordship has consecrated. His lordship has also licensed a temporary church, called St. Mark's, in St. Pancras parish, containing 600 sittings, making the fifth provided by the vicar, the Rev. Thos. Dale, under his Parochial Church Building Fund.

The Bishop of Ripon consecrated, on Wednesday last, a new church dedicated to St. John the Baptist, at Baildon. The first stone of a new church, dedicated to St. Mark, at Wolverhampton, to be erected under Peel's Act, and to accommodate 1,080 persons, was laid yesterday se'nnight.

The Bishop of Cape Town, the Right Rev. Dr. Gray, arrived on Sunday, the 20th, in the Persia, with the Rev. H. Douglass and the Rev. Mr. Badmali.

We are pained to read the following account of suffering in Dr. Hook's parish.

So great is the distress of the poor of Leeds that Dr. Hook and forty-one clergymen of the rural deanery of Leeds have issued the following conjoint appeal on their behalf:—"We, the undersigned, clergy of the Church of England, venture to call your attention to the great distress now existing in Leeds amongst the labouring classes. From returns, which have recently been made by the visitors of the poor, it appears that there are at least 15,000 persons who are receiving relief from the public soup kitchen, that the average weekly income of most of these does not reach twopenny per head, and that the destitution is increasing; large numbers of workmen being daily discarded, because of the convulsed state of the continent.

The rates are already very heavy, and press severely on the less competent class of householders, and the funds of the soup kitchen are nearly exhausted. We desire, under these circumstances, to appeal to the members of the Church who may be in a position to assist their poorer brethren in these trying times, to contribute towards the efforts now making in Leeds to continue, and if possible increase, the relief given to our suffering population—the more deserving of this sympathy because of their patient and praiseworthy deportment.”

New Publications.

CHRISTIAN SONGS.—By the Rev. James Gilborne Lyons, L. D. “The Service of Song,” THIRD EDITION, with additions. Philadelphia. George S. Appleton, 148 Chesnut street, 1848.

The readers of the Banner, in whose columns several of these noble “Christian Songs” have first been given to the public, need not our words of praise to commend to them this choice book.

Indeed these songs have passed the ordeal of general criticism, and have obtained the most distinguished marks of public approbation. Few modern compositions of this class have been more widely circulated, than some of these which have been copied by publications of most opposite character.

Their harmonious numbers have not only lent attraction to our religious periodicals, but they have so commended themselves to the common taste and feelings, that many secular prints have admitted to their columns the “songs” most thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Christianity. On this account we attribute to these poems a nobler influence than a mere passing gratification in their perusal. We know that their author had a higher object in their composition. We consider it the high and holy office of the true Poet, to present religious truths and sentiments in such a form and manner that they may attract the attention, and interest the feelings of those who are inclined to think little of, and care less for the teachings of Christianity. Those who have had a chance of serving the various channels through which these “Christian Songs” have found their way to the public mind, must own that they have accomplished this noble and worthy purpose.

Having once reached such a point, there is no danger of their receding from it. These songs are not mere hasty productions, to be read hastily and then forgotten. They are made to wear! They will bear the strictest examination. The high scholarship of their author ensures their perfect accuracy. There is not a word in them which the sense does not require, nor one word whose use cannot be supported by the standard authorities of our language. Many of them too are on subjects which are continually recurring to our observation, and therefore not to be forgotten. For example, the beautiful and appropriate song for the season, which appeared for the first time in the last Banner, and which may be taken as a fair specimen of the pieces added in this new edition, will revive each year with the flowers of spring, and its spirit, fragrant with the breath from “the flowers of God,” will be fresh with each new return of May, when

“From the green marge of lake and stream,
Fresh vale, and mountain sod,
They look in gentle glory forth—
The pure sweet flowers of God.”

The present edition, which we think much improved in form, is much enlarged in matter. The first edition contained only twelve pieces, and in this we find thirty-six. And some of the latest productions are among the very best. We feel that the author's reputation will grow with the increase of his volume. And we trust the important truths, embalmed in these “Christian Songs,” may not only please the taste, but improve the hearts of their readers, and in them “the service of song” be consecrated to THE SERVICE OF GOD.

THE CHRISTIAN RULE OF CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTION.—A sermon, preached in St. Paul's Church, Louisville, Ky., on Sunday Feb. 6, 1848, by Rev. John B. Gallagher. Published by request.

We read with pleasure each new enforcement, by our Parochial Clergy, of St. Paul's rule of Christian charity. This discourse gives a clear and forcible exhibition of this much neglected duty. The text is that most appropriate one, 1 Corinthians, xvi. 21.

The scope of the sermon is thus stated by the author.

In treating the subject, I shall endeavour, first, to state the bounds of obligation to devote a portion of our substance to the cause of God; secondly, to consider what should be the measure of our giving; and, thirdly, to exhibit the importance of a frequent and regular offering, especially in reference to Christian Missions.

THE YOUNG CHURCHMAN'S MISCELLANY, for May, informs us that its much esteemed editor has been obliged to go abroad for the restoration of his impaired health. Our kindest wishes attend him. We trust a Gracious Providence will guard him on his journey and bring him back with restored health, to his useful labours and his many friends.

We have also duly received “the Literary World” and “Littell's Living Age” both welcome visitors.

From abroad we have received the Christian Remembrancer for April. This number though a most excellent one, gives us little opportunity for selections. The able and impartial article on American Poetry will be read with interest. Its contents are, Art. I. Study of the Greek text of the New Testament. II. American Poetry. III. German Pantheism, its influence on Criticism. IV. Jane Eyre. V. Blunt's undesignated Coincidences. VI. Conington's Agamemnon of Æschylus VII. The Hampden Controversy.

We insert with pleasure the following from a valued correspondent.

Medical Schools of Philadelphia.

There are no institutions in our city which have higher claims to our regard, and of which, as Philadelphians, we may be more justly proud, than our medical colleges. A proof of the estimation in which they are held abroad, may be found in the fact, that about twelve hundred students have attended the courses of lectures the past winter; of whom 508 were in the University of Pennsylvania. While every state in the Union sent pupils to be educated at this venerable institution, there were also students from Austria, Cuba, the East and West Indies, England, Nova Scotia, Canada, and South America. Probably no city in the world, of equal size, can boast of so great a number of eminent Physicians, who are distinguished alike for their learning, their moral worth, and their philanthropy. These thoughts have been suggested by the perusal of a very able lecture, introductory to a course, by one who ranks among the first of his profession, Dr. William Harris. There is a tone of religious feeling pervading this address, which is truly refreshing. Speaking of the value of classical attainments to the medical student, and of the “pleasure derived from mental cultivation,” he says:—

“The claims of the mind, too, as an independent part of our being, must not be overlooked, nor its appropriate enjoyment withheld. We were not designed, by the Author of our being, to spend all our time in buying, selling, and getting gain; but as the mind, or soul, is the better part of man, so the cultivation of its faculties is more noble than anything that relates to the body alone. The physical structure perishes, but the soul, which dwells within it during life, is indestructible and immortal.

The soul may sleep, but it never dies, neither does it enter the tomb with the body; but is translated, at death, from earth to heaven; and, according to the opinion of some learned theologians, it never ceases to act, and never loses any knowledge that it once possessed, but commences in the next world where it leaves off in this. How much wiser is it then to enrich the mind with imperishable treasures, than to spend all our days in accumulating “riches which make to themselves wings and fly away!”

And again:—

“You will be solicited to minister to minds diseased; to mitigate bodily suffering, and to prolong life. And when your professional wand is broken, and your most skilful efforts unavailing, it will be expected that you will extend to the afflicted family your sympathy, and to the dying the consolations of the Gospel. You will be admitted, too, behind the veil that screens the privacy of domestic life from the scrutiny of the world. The peace and happiness of families will often be confided to your honour. Hence, the vocation of a physician is a sacred office, requiring the highest moral as well as intellectual culture.”

The following extract with which we close this communication, contains information which is useful and interesting to general readers.

“May we not claim, without arrogance, that Philadelphia is the great emporium of medical science? That she is, in this respect, to the United States, what Edinburgh is to Scotland, Vienna to Austria, and Paris to France? And is it not a tribute justly due to the University of Pennsylvania, to say, that she stands at the head of the medical institutions of our country?”

While I say this, it gives me pleasure to recognize the talent and ability that now distinguish the Jefferson Medical College. This school is also in a very prosperous condition, and is yearly adding names of promised eminence to the rolls of our profession. The Professors of the Pennsylvania College, too, have delivered very satisfactory courses of lectures to their medical class, during the two last winters, and the institution may be said to be increasing in respectability and importance. The Franklin Medical College, incorporated by the Legislature of Pennsylvania two years since, is an institution of great promise. The members of her faculty are all men of fine talents, of thorough classical and medical education, and of untiring zeal. She is in great favour with the medical profession of this city. Her faculty has been lately strengthened by the appointment of Doctor Thomas Forrest Betton to the chair of surgery.

The Philadelphia College of Medicine, the last chartered medical institution of our city, is clothed with all the powers of the other Medical Colleges; delivers summer and winter courses of lectures, and has the privilege of conferring degrees twice a year. The faculty are encouraged to hope that their efforts will be crowned with success. It cannot but be the wish of every sincere lover of science, that these several institutions may continue to stimulate each other to an honourable rivalry.

Unconnected as I am with any of the incorporated medical institutions of our city, I shall deliver an independent course of lectures. During the approaching summer I shall endeavour to communicate to you, accurately, all that is known by the profession respecting the obstetrical art, and the treatment of the diseases of women and children. With regard to the winter schools, you must select for yourselves, according to your individual predilections.

My preference is for the University of Pennsylvania. She is my Alma Mater, and I should be destitute of filial regard if I did not feel for her the warmest affection. Besides, I reverence her for the unceasing and noble efforts she has always made to elevate and dignify our profession. During the last twenty years, the rapid multiplication of medical schools in different parts of our country, has tended to lower the standard of medical education, and to degrade the profession. The University, however, has always resisted this downward tendency, and in her praiseworthy efforts to sustain the profession, jeopardized her interests, and diminished the number of her pupils. But institutions, like individuals, that pursue an honest and an honourable course, may suffer for a time, but will always, in the end, receive their just reward.

The members of the medical profession of the United States have recently awakened from their profound slumbers, and have become alarmed at their indifference. Two National Medical Conventions have been held, the first in New York, the last in Philadelphia, at which the most learned men of our profession were congregated. From every part of the Union the cry of the delegates was for reform. Their deliberations resulted in a fixed determination that the whole profession should unite in a grand effort to elevate the standard of classical and medical education, for all who shall hereafter become members of our profession; and they enacted a code of medical ethics for the better regulation of our vocational intercourse. But the most important of all the changes recommended, was that the medical schools of the United States should extend their courses of lectures from four to six months. In good faith, and in accordance with the spirit of the convention, the University of Pennsylvania decided promptly to carry into effect, as far as practicable, all the suggestions of that learned council. The College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York, also adopted and carried out the recommendations of the Convention. And these two pioneer institutions in the great work of reformation, I am happy to say, have been generously sustained by the profession at large. Their classes were increased both in numbers and respectability, and their praise is in the mouth of all the State Medical Conventions. Hear what the Medical Convention of the State of Alabama says of the University of Pennsylvania. “Resolved, That we unite, in one voice, in the most unqualified praise, for the high-toned, independent, and self-sacrificing magnanimity, by which the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania has distinguished itself, in becoming the pioneer to place the first foot upon the threshold of the usages in this country, regardless of all consequences to themselves, and governed alone by an eye single to the general good of the profession they so honourably represent.”

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Died,

On Friday the 5th inst., at Germantown, META MORRIS, youngest daughter of J. S. LITTELL, aged nine years.

With her hearty welcome and jocund laugh still ringing in the ear, it is impossible to realize that this sweet child is no longer an inhabitant of the earth which she gladdened by her presence; that we shall no more be cheered in our pilgrimage by her sprightliness and mirth, or be taught by her early example lessons of innocence and love. Nurtured while here with the continual dew of the Divine blessing, she acquired a capacity for larger measures of heavenly grace, and has been transplanted in the spring-time of existence, while nature was bursting into beauty around her—herself the fairest flower that bloomed—to those fountains of living waters which proceed from the throne of God and the Lamb. Angelic ministrations were visible in preparing her for the approaching change. During a painful illness, no word of fretfulness or repining escaped her lips. With every thing to make life attractive she manifested, for a person so young, a remarkable resignation to the will of her heavenly FATHER. “What language are you using?” she inquired of one who at her request was silently praying by her side. “Thy will be done, O Lord,” was the answer. “Yes,” she replied, “those are the right words; pray that I may recover if it be God's will, but not else.” Her childish or imaginary faults she feared were almost too great to be forgiven; she was apprehensive that she did not repent as she ought, that she was not sufficiently sorry for sin; and it was not until reassured by maternal piety, in a private conversation which she sought, that all her misgivings vanished. She was frequent in forgetfulness of her own sufferings to apologize for any involuntary uneasiness which she had given to others. Dear little Meta! the assurance that He whom thou thus remembered in thy youth has called thee to His arms in heaven, should check the flowing tear and inspire us with resignation like thine own. Bright and happy as thou wert upon earth, thou art happier far in the full fruition of His love; and we may not indulge one selfish or murmuring thought. But thy early departure has left an aching void in lone and loving hearts; many are the cherished memories which thou hast bequeathed; and long shall we lament “the vanished ray which scattered gladness o'er our path.”

The following lines written by her father in a Prayer Book given to her on the anniversary of her eighth birthday, breathe a prayer which has been granted in all the depth of its unconscious meaning.

“Cricket and sunbeam! youngling of my fold!
Thy chirp hath gladden'd oft the passing hour;—
Blessings upon thee, dearest,—wealth untold—
That He alone can give who hath the power;
And as I thus with anxious thought and heart,
The day that mark'd thy birth once more recall,
My prayer ascends that thou mayst bear thy part Purely before Him,—Father of us all.” LAMB.

MR. EDITOR:—

For the Banner of the Cross.

Like a preux chevalier, B. has placed his lance in rest, and made a famous charge upon the old Scottish Covenant. I decline the contest—alike distasteful to myself, and now unprofitable as well as unjust to your subscribers. I wish, however, to deprecate the charge of want of candor in my former article. I therein expressly said, that I pretended not fully to discuss the question, and particularly wished not to be considered as an antagonist of B. How, then, can I fairly be charged with disingenuousness, because I have not assailed all his arguments? and by what rules of candor was I obliged to confine myself to his arguments alone? I only touched upon those of his positions from which I differed, and I contend that I am not bound to consider the uttering of sentiments from the pulpit as giving them any peculiar sanctity or immunity from comment. Those sentiments to which I alluded, were doubtless held by many, and provided all be done in charity and decorum, no one has any cause of complaint whatever.

A few words more and I leave the subject. I am not learned in rubrical lore, but does not B.'s argument as to breaking the bread before the people, prove too much? If it proves that the people should have their faces towards the minister, does it not prove that they ought actually to see this part of the service? If so, we have been very unscrupulous hitherto, in common with every other congregation with which I have ever worshipped. It does not suggest itself to persons devoutly kneeling upon such an occasion, that they ought to cast their eyes at this particular moment towards the communion table. Human sense, I think, interprets the rubric to mean merely that the bread should be broken at this particular time and place, whilst reading the Gospel account of the first institution of the Supper.

I cannot feel the gratification at the action of the Vestry in this matter which B. seems to suppose. It is by no means so summarily disposed of as I could have wished. I would have been glad to see some disclaimer, on the part of the Vestry, of powers not delegated to them, and therefore not in existence. So far as we know, they have voted upon the resolution of Mr. Binney without intimating a doubt of their being competent to entertain such a proposition. Suppose that resolution had passed, and three wealthy members of the congregation had advanced immediately $10,000 each, how monstrous to suppose that the Vestry could have packed the rest of us off somewhere else, while the three millionaires indulged their mediæval taste amongst the graves of our ancestors! Will B. stake his professional reputation upon the legality of such proceedings as this resolution might, fairly interpreted, warrant the Vestry to adopt.

But the sprinkling of precedents having failed of its purpose, we are now, alas! threatened with a real shower of brick and timber. This looks very like another appeal to the fair and more timid sex, and is the argument always held in reserve in such cases, to be launched forth when milder means have failed. When the idea of a new church was first broached, I heard it prophesied that the discovery would be made that St. Peter's was in a dangerous state. And I venture to say, that any speculating architect of ordinary ingenuity, will find cause of apprehension in any given structure whatever, be its massiveness or materials what they may.

Although I wish to be very brief, I cannot forbear protesting against the use which has been made of the Scripture incident of the box of ointment. Our blessed Saviour most assuredly never meant his words on that occasion for a standing argument against appeals for aid to the poor, and a plea for wasteful ostentation. In St. John's Gospel, we learn that it was covetousness which induced Judas Iscariot to object to the rich gift of the woman. Now an honest and disinterested opposition to fruitless waste of money, cannot be quietly disposed of by classing it with that niggardliness which would keep men's gifts back from God. We must remember that Jesus Christ said on this very occasion, "The poor ye have always with you."

Not wishing to monopolize all of B.'s attention, I shall not find fault with him, as he has done with me, for turning round upon other adversaries. I will only say that the Vestry, by their action, did not forbid those whose hearts burned within them to build a better temple for God's worship, to do so,—they only said, "You cannot build such a house upon the site of old St. Peter's;" and in this decision no doubt they will be supported by the congregation.

The Ends and Objects of Burlington College.

"An Address Introductory to a course of Lectures, delivered in the Junior Hall of Burlington College, by the Right Rev. George Washington Doane, D. D., L. L. D., Bishop of the Diocese of New Jersey, and President of the College," pp. 16, third edition.

This is one of those beautiful "apples of gold," set in "pictures of silver," which the Bishop of New Jersey has "spoken upon his wheels." Of such fruit there is great scarceness now-a-days. The purpose of the "Address" is to present first to the inmates, then to the Christian community, "a brief outline of the Ends and Objects of Burlington College." These are first, "to bring up MEN. Second, to bring up GENTLEMEN. Third, to bring up SCHOLARS. Fourth, to bring up PATRIOTS. Fifth, to bring up CHRISTIANS." It is not informal, but "a rapid and familiar" exhibition of sparkling truths, flying off in every direction, like the scintillations of burning metals, under the intense action of the Galvanic fluid. Though evidently and intentionally unstudied, coming directly from the heart of a father, yearning over the youthful minds committed to his care; it is a beautiful model for addresses of the same kind, and cannot fail I think to command the admiration of all men, who have hearts, and children to love and to educate.

In these days of political confusion, and religious distraction, and social dissolution, and moral pestilence, it is a token for good, when the Bishops of the Christian Church, God's own commissioned fathers, of his own redeemed family; appear to understand their paternal office and government, that these supercede the necessity for every other, so far as "the Kingdom of Heaven" is concerned. HOME and HEAVEN. A Christian house, part of a Christian church: what need we more? A divine constitution of government—"built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone"—Assuming man's fallen and depraved condition; and adapted in all its parts to his "regeneration" and "renovation;" the only form of moral freedom which suits the condition of creatures; how foolish for Christians to be mixing themselves up with the perplexities and entanglements of worldly politics; thereby weakening their own moral influence, and endangering their soul's salvation. 'Tis delightful to hear the voice of a Christian Bishop; confident in the strength of his own position, and appreciating the hallowed influences, which he can bring to bear upon the objects of his care, thus calling the children of the Church about him, that he may train them up as Christian patriots and scholars, and gentlemen and men. God speed thee in thy noble work, Bishop of New Jersey! May thy fruits abound yet more and more! May thy soul be comforted by the prosperity of thy work of love! Be not discouraged. Thy God is with thee, and his Church will sustain thee, so far as she returns to her first love, and learns the true import of her daily prayer—"Thy kingdom come." God forbid that Burlington College should prove a witness against any who call themselves Christians.

Under the first division of this truly Christian address, it is assumed, that to "give assurance of a man," we must first have the material of a Christian. "Within the breast of every (Christian) child there is an Embryo MAN: God's image, in a shrine of clay." This is the living germ of all Christian education. This is what the Church calls, "being regenerate and born anew of water and the Holy Ghost."—To bring out this "image" in all its parts, and full proportions is the work of Christian Bishops and Presbyters, and parents and school masters; the great work of the Church's life. To attempt the production of a Christian man, without a constant recurrence to this primary truth—must needs be unsuccessful. If Christ be not there, he cannot be "formed in the heart."—And poor fallen humanity—whatever beautiful appearances it may put on, will be as dead as the Parian marble after all the labor of the teachers. Hence the practical wisdom of what the Bishop has said about "self-indulgence," and parental weakness—and the necessity of religious principles, to sustain the work of education. Hence the deserved commendation of "a well ordered Christian school." "It must be (says the Bishop,) a home for safety—and for happiness; but not a home for weakness, and indulgence.—In such a house there must be order that never varies: there must be vigilance that never slumbers: there must be patience that never yields: there must be love that never tires. An atmosphere must be created that shall minister to wholesomeness, and health and strength. A moral mechanism must be constructed and directed, that shall frame the heart by shaping and controlling all its ways: a heart machinery, that holds but never hurts, that moulds but does not mar. To this end Christian men and Christian women must conspire. They must give themselves to it as heart-work, and as life work. They must be moved to it of God. They must be governed in it by his word. They must be guided for it by his Church. They must be carried through it by his Spirit." The influence of the true Church system; (as the Bishop says,) cannot fail to make itself conspicuous. It is a divine mechanism. Its propelling, moving power is above. The Spirit of God is in it. The power of God is with it. If it be not disturbed and disordered by the miserable efforts of "the wisdom of men," it will work silently and surely, to the development of the moral or spiritual creation, its spring time and summer, and abundant harvests." Oh! that the Church of God was better instructed in this seminal principle of the only form of education, which can "bring up men." The age in which we live seems to be almost infidel upon this point. Education which God has committed to his Church, and where alone it can be conducted under his blessing, to its happy and glorious results; has passed well nigh, with the consent of the Church, into other hands. Let's see. Time will solve the question who ought to have the training of the young. A generation educated upon the principles that it matters not what religion we are of, will of course have none.—If all religions are alike, there can be no true one, and if we have come to this—we may calculate the end is near.

Missing Books alluded to in Holy writ.

MR. EDITOR,—

Probably many of your younger readers, who in a systematic perusal of the Holy Volume, have met allusions to various writings, now not extant, would be gratified to see a connected account of them. This I have attempted in the following sketch, vouching only for such general correctness, that may satisfy the ordinary reader, without pretending to subject it to the notice of the theological critic.

The following list embraces, as far as I have been enabled to judge, a complete enumeration of the books, actually or supposed to be lost. The authorities consulted are Dr. Lightfoot, Calmet, Horne, and his references.

It may be well to premise, (a fact of which the theological reader is aware) that these missing books never occupied a place in the Sacred Canon, not having been received by the Church as a part of Divine Revelation, and consequently their loss is little to be regretted. To the Jews contemporaneous with the writers of the several portions of the Old Testament they might have been of service as evidences of the truth of the sacred writtings; but to us, who receive the Canon of Holy Scripture on the unerring testimony of the Church, they are not needed in this, if in any capacity.

1. The first quoted in Exod. xxiv. 7, is "The Book of the Covenant," which is supposed to be lost, but in fact, comprises the injunctions and exhortations in the preceding four chapters. It is then not a distinct book.

2. "The Book of the Wars of the Lord"—Numb. xxi. 14. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that this was a record of the defeat of the Amalekites which Moses was commanded to make as a memorial and to rehearse it in the ears of Joshua. Others, suppose it to have been a record of the Wars ordered by GOD, against the seven nations of Canaan.

3. The Book of Jasher—Joshua x. 13, 2. Sam. i. 18. Josephus the Jewish historian says it was a collection of chronicles of what happened to the Jews, year by year; and of directions for the practice of archery and maintenance of military exercises. The work now sold under this title is a recent forgery.

4. "The Books of Solomon."—1 Kings iv. 32. 33. Of his 3000 "Proverbs" we probably possess a select portion. Horne supposes that they "were perhaps only spoken, not committed to writing." His "Songs," which were a thousand and five in number, were in all probability juvenile compositions. "The Song of Songs" or Canticle, was the best, having a typical or prophetic meaning. His treatise on the vegetable and animal kingdoms, master pieces in their kind, belonged rather to philosophy than Revelation.

5. "The Books of Gad the Seer, and of Nathan the prophet."—1 Chron. xxix. 29.

The earlier acts of David's reign were written by Samuel, and are contained in the first twenty-four chapters of 1st Samuel; the remainder, with the 2d book were written by Gad the Seer and Nathan the prophet.

6. "The Books of Nathan the prophet; the Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite; and the Visions of Iddo the Seer, against Jeroboam the son of Nebat"—2 Chron. ix. 29. In these were contained the acts of Solomon's reign, being civil records, and probably contemporaneous. The Prophecy of Ahijah led the Schismatic Jeroboam to cause the revolt of the ten tribes.

The books of 1st and 2d Chronicles themselves being records having an intimate connexion with the design of God in causing the Old Testament to be written, probably drew facts from these civil documents, and appealed to them for truth.

7. The Book of Shemaiah the prophet, and of Iddo the Seer concerning genealogies—2 Chron. xii. 15. "The Story or Commentary of Iddo the Seer"—xiii. 22. These prophets were compilers of the acts of Rehoboam, and of Abijah kings of Judah.

The commentary or 'Midrash' appears to have been concerning that branch of public documents, which were scrupulously kept—genealogy.

8. The Book of Jehu, son of Hanani—2 Chron. xx. 34, was the record of the administration of Jehoshaphat, (1 Kings xvi. 1.)

9. "The Sayings of the Seers"—2 Chron. xxxiii. 19. Or, better rendered the "Words of Hosai," who was probably the recorder of the events of the reign of Manasseh.

It is to be observed, that the word rendered in many places book is not always so understood. It is variously translated, roll, volume, record, list, bill, &c.

10. St. Paul's first Epistle to Corinth—1 Cor. v. 9. The original may thus be rendered "I have written to you in this Epistle, and may be regarded as anticipative of what is written subsequently, (chap. v. 18, vi. 13, vii. 2.) Or, ἐγγράφω, may be taken in the present tense, 'I write,' which will bring us to the same result. It indeed, must be so understood in the 11th verse.

There were no other than the two Epistles which we possess.

11. An Epistle to the Ephesians—Ephes. iii. 3. The passage reads thus, "As I wrote before in a few words," and has been supposed to allude to another epistle to Ephesus. That it is not so, is evident from the silence of external evidence. The words may be explained by a reference to the preceding chapter which contains the 'few words.'

12. "The Epistle from Laodicea"—Colos. iv. 16. No Epistle of the Laodiceans is here referred to, but evidently one which that church sent to Colosse, probably by the same bearer who carried the Epistle which St. Paul directed to them. The supposed Epistle is that to the Ephesians, a copy of which the Laodiceans who were within the circuit of Ephesus, caused to be made, and dispatched at Colosse.

13. The prophecy of Enoch—Jude 14. This is generally believed to be a Jewish forgery, but which probably contained several facts. Others, with more probability suppose that the Apostle merely made use of a well-known tradition of the Jews, handed down as a part of their popular teaching.

It must be recollected, that on most of the preceding points much uncertainty exists. Of the many suppositions concerning them, these are believed to be the most plausible. One thing is certain, that had those books been included in Holy Writ, not one would have been missing.

To Every One His Due.

MR. EDITOR:—

A western missionary desires to call the attention of his brother missionaries to a little work by Mr. Kip, entitled "The Double Witness of the Church." You are doubtless well acquainted with the work and can for its intrinsic merit. Of this I have nothing to say. The work may be defective. I am not qualified to judge, though I am inclined to believe it a masterly production. Now, however, I only wish to call attention to its merits as a book to be put into the hands of any one inquiring the way to the church or entertaining objections or prejudices against her holy institutions.

The writer of this article possesses one copy which has done signal service in his field of labour. It has been in circulation more than two months and when last heard from was bespoken in advance, the privilege of lending to another having been granted the readers.

Together with a gentleman of the parish the missionary has ent for a number of copies with the intent of throwing it into the hands of all who will read. This step has not been taken in consequence of anything else, than a certain knowledge of the effect it produces, where it is read with anything like a fair spirit of inquiry.

Hoping this little testimony may call the attention of some to the book, the writer begs pardon for presuming thus to endorse the writings of one so justly eminent. A faint hope is so entertained that the Tract Society will procure the copyright or the privilege of publishing an edition for the benefit of missionary stations. Its size need not exceed that of "Episcopacy Examined," and without in any way, comparing the merits of the two works it is beyond doubt that the "Double Witness" is vastly more popular in many respects.

Yours Truly

OZARK.

We have known similar instances of the usefulness of the book to which our Correspondent refers. It has been a most useful work and has done good service for the Church. (Ed. BANNER.)

On Wednesday afternoon, 26th, in St. John's Church, Salem, the Rector elect, the Rev. Mr. Kidney, catechized the children, and the Bishop examined them. In the evening, the Bishop preached and confirmed two persons. On Thursday, 27, the Bishop instituted the Rev. John Steinfort Kidney into the Rectorship, and preached the sermon.

On Sunday afternoon, (first after Easter,) 30, at a Hall in Pemberton, the Bishop read prayers and preached.

NEW YORK.—EPISCOPAL SERVICES.—The Standing Committee of the Diocese have invited the Rt. Rev. Dr. DeLancey to perform Episcopal duties until the next Annual Convention, which assembles on the 27th of September. The Bishop has accepted the invitation, and will do such duty as his own proper diocesan engagements will allow. He is now in the city, where he will remain until the 9th inst. He expects to spend some ten days here at the close of June, and to hold an ordination on the 2d Sunday after Trinity, July 28. During the following three months, as his other appointments will admit, he purposes visiting such of the country parishes as have not had an Episcopal visitation.

EPISCOPAL SERVICES BY THE BISHOP OF WESTERN NEW YORK.—Acting by request of the Standing Committee of the Diocese:

First Sunday after Easter. Afternoon, in Trinity Church, New York, confirmed ten persons.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY FOR SEAMEN IN THE CITY AND PORT OF NEW YORK.—The Anniversary of this Society was held on Sunday evening last, in the Church of the Ascension. The Bishop of Western New York with a large number of the city clergy were present. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Benjamin I. Haight, D.D., Professor in the General Theological Seminary, who also read the Lesson. The Annual Report of the Society was then read by H. Meigs, Jr., Esq., one of the Vice Presidents, after which a sermon appropriate to the occasion was preached by the Rev. Dr. Vinton, of St. Paul's, Boston. The sentences of the offertory were read by the Bishop, while the alms of the people, in behalf of the Society, were received, which were by him placed upon the Holy Altar. The concluding prayers were said, and the benediction pronounced, by the Bishop. The amount of the alms received is $218.

The Report is very encouraging in regard to the operations of the Society; but it exhibits a deficiency in its Treasury of Thirteen Hundred Dollars. The object of the Society is one which commends itself strongly to the sympathies of Churchmen; and we trust they will not allow its usefulness to be retarded, by permitting the deficiency to remain unpaid.

NEW YORK.—ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, BROOKLYN.—The interior of this edifice has been completely altered and very much improved; the building stands on the corner of Johnson and Washington streets, the entrance being from Washington, at the southern end of the church. The chancel has been extended, and over the altar at the end of the chancel a large window has been constructed, into which the light streams through stained glass with appropriate religious emblems. The desk and pulpit have been removed to the front of the chancel, and beyond the altar is placed an oak screen, with three entablatures, on which are respectively, the Lord's Prayer, Creed, &c., emblazoned on a ground of blue, in old English capital letters. The ceiling has undergone quite a transformation, having the appearance of an oaken ceiling on beams, and supported by brackets: this is so exceedingly well done in coloring that it can with difficulty be distinguished from reality. More space has been given between the front pews and the chancel rail, and entrances made on each side of the chancel to the vestry rooms from the body of the church.

This edifice originally was built by that highly popular and esteemed divine, Rev. Evan M. Johnson, some twenty-three or four years since, at a time when the population in that section was quite sparse. We have understood that when he commenced, there were but fourteen persons in the congregation, and he has regularly administered the services and preached there ever since, without any compensation until July last, when he resigned for the purpose of establishing a free church, in the 5th ward of our city; the building, however, during that period has been enlarged, and within a few years past galleries have been added in order to accommodate the increasing numbers of the congregation.

The present Rector is the Rev. Samuel Roosevelt Johnson, D.D., a son of the Rev. John B. Johnson, who was a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church, and the owner of the farm, as it was at that time, on a portion of which this church was built, and which identical piece of ground, we have been informed, was intended by him to have been set apart for the purpose of erecting a church edifice thereon. The committee of the congregation who had the charge of the present alterations, were Messrs. Samuel E. Johnson, Alfred Emanuel, and William Hunter, Jr., and great credit is due them for the manner in which they have carried it through.—Brooklyn Eagle.

WESTERN NEW YORK.—BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Tuesday the 18th of April, Bishop DeLancey officiated in St. John's church, Sodus, Wayne county. The Bishop preached, and confirmed one person.

In the afternoon, in the School House, at Sodus Point, the Bishop preached and confirmed one person.

On the 19th, in the afternoon, in the Union House of worship at Pultneyville, the Rev. Mr. Cadle read prayers, and the Bishop preached.

On the 20th, in the evening, the Bishop preached in Zion church, Palmyra. And on the 21st, being Good Friday, the Bishop preached in the same church, and confirmed four persons.

On Easter Eve, in Trinity church, Geneva, the Bishop confirmed fourteen persons, and delivered an address. Among the persons confirmed, was one from Angelica, and one from Montezuma.

On Easter Sunday, the Bishop read prayers, preached twice, and administered the Holy Communion in St. Paul's church, Waterloo.—Gos. Mess.

MARYLAND.—ORDINATION.—On the first Sunday after Easter, at a special Ordination holden at St. George's Church, Mount Savage, Alleghany county, the Rev. James Cole Tracey, Deacon, minister of the church, was admitted to the Holy Order of Priests. The Bishop preached. The candidate was presented by the Rev. James A. Buck, who, with the Rev. Mr. Johns, joined in the imposition of hands.

MARYLAND.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On Good Friday, the Bishop visited St. John's church, Washington, preached, confirmed twelve persons, and administered the Holy Communion. The Rev. Smith Pyne, as Rector of the parish, and the Rev. Messrs. Lambert, of the Navy, and Shiras, of Georgetown, assisted in the services.

On Easter Day, in Emmanuel Church, Cumberland, after Morning prayer, by the Rev. J. A. Buck, the Bishop preached, confirmed seven persons, and administered the Lord's Supper, assisted by the Rev. D. H. Buel, the Rector of the Parish.—Church Times.

CONFIRMATIONS.—On Saturday, April 29th, in St. George's Church, Mount Savage, eight persons. On the afternoon of Sunday, the first after Easter, April 30th, in St. Paul's Church, Maryland Mining Works, Alleghany county, two persons.—Church Times.

VIRGINIA.—EPISCOPAL SERVICES BY BISHOP MEADE.—Easter Sunday, at Fall's Church, Fairfax county. Confirmations, 2. Sunday after Easter, Chapel of the Theological Seminary. Confirmations, 11.

EPISCOPAL SERVICES BY BISHOP JOHNS.—Confirmations, Feb. 13, St. Paul's, Richmond, 13. March 12, O. Church, Hanover, 1; 26th, Monumental, Richmond, 5. April 2, St. John's, Richmond, 7; 9th, St. Paul's, Hanover, 1; 16th, St. James', Richmond, 7; 23d, Grace, Petersburg, 10; 23d, St. Paul's, Petersburg, 10; 25th, St. John's, City Point, 3.

ORDINATIONS.—April 24th, St. Paul's, Petersburg, Bishop Johns admitted to the order of Priests, the Rev. H. M. Dennison and the Rev. J. M. Banister. The candidates were presented by the Rev. P. Slaughter.—Southern Churchman.

RHODE ISLAND.—EPISCOPAL ACTS.—On Easter Tuesday, April 25th, five persons were confirmed in St. Paul's Church, North Providence. The Bishop delivered a sermon and address.

On the first Sunday after Easter, April 30th, five persons were confirmed in St. Andrew's Church, Providence. Sermon and address by the Bishop.

On Monday, May 1st, seven persons were confirmed in St. Philip's Church, Crompton Mills. Sermon and address by the Bishop.

MAINE BOARD OF MISSIONS.—A regular meeting of this Board was held in Saco, during the past week. Almost all the clergy of the Diocese were present, and some of the lay members of the Board.

The first services were held on the evening of Wednesday, April 26th, when the Bishop preached on the 4th verse of the 42d Psalm, with some allusion to the fact, that the church in which the Board assembled, had been closed for several months and without a pastor.

On Thursday morning, after the meeting of the Board for the transaction of business, the Rev. Mr. Durborow preached on the 13th verse of the 12th chapter of Ecclesiastes, enforcing the necessity of active obedience to the commandments of God, in opposition to a religion of mere feeling. In the afternoon the Rev. Mr. Burgess preached on the 1st verse of the 12th chapter of Hebrews: pointing to the cloud of witnesses by whom the Christian is encompassed, and to Jesus as the great witness, and the dispenser of the prize. In the evening the Rev. Mr. Hammond preached on the 1st verse of the 65th chapter of Isaiah; illustrating, by the mercies of God to the Gentiles, the general necessity and blessedness of a true conversion. Some remarks from the Bishop concluded the services.—Christian Witness.

ILLINOIS.—The corner-stone of a new church edifice, for the Parish of Grace church, in the city of Galena, was laid on Wednesday morning, the 5th of April. Divine service was held in the chapel of the congregation, at 10½ o'clock, and after morning service, the congregation, headed by the clergy and wardens and vestry, proceeded to the site of the new church, on the corner of Hill and prospect streets, where the usual religious ceremonies were conducted, in the act of laying the corner-stone—the form adopted, being that put forth by the Right Rev. the present Bishop of New York.—Churchman.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Sheldon Davis has resigned the Parish of St Peter's, Hobart, Delaware county, and become Missionary at Clinton, and parts adjacent, in Dutchess county. Post office address for the present, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

The Rev. Thomas L. Randolph, has been received into this diocese, with a letter dimissory from the Bishop of Massachusetts, and has taken charge of St. Paul's Church, Portsmouth, and the Chapel of the Holy Cross, Middletown. Rhode Island.

The Rev. Robert S. T. Lowell has been received on letters dimissory from the diocese of Massachusetts; and is the Missionary in charge of Christ Church, a free Mission Church, in Newark, N. J.

A beautiful printed pamphlet of 86 pages, with an engraved portrait—price 37 1/2 cts.

History of England, from the invasion of Julius Cæsar to the Reign of Victoria, by Mrs. Markham. A new edition, revised and enlarged, with questions adapted to schools in the United States, by Eliza Robbins, author of "American Popular Lessons," &c. 1 neat vol. 12mo—price 75 cts.

There is nothing more needed in our schools than good histories; not the dry compends in present use, but elementary books, that shall suggest the moral uses of history and the providence of God manifested in the affairs of man. Mrs. Markham's history was used by that model of all teachers, the late Dr. Arnold, master of the great English school at Rugby, and agrees in its character with his enlightened and pious views of teaching history. It is now several years since I adapted this history to the form and the price acceptable in the schools of the United States. I have recently revised it, and trust that it may be extensively serviceable in education.—Extract from American Editor's Preface.

—Burlington Gazette.

"A volume got up in a substantial and elegant style. Our readers have had frequent opportunity of judging of the peculiar excellence of its contents."—Philadelphia Saturday Courier.

"We have read these Songs with great pleasure, and regard them as at once chaste, graceful, and breathing genuine Christianity."—Penna. Inquirer.

"They are imbued with the spirit of piety, and have a just claim to the title, Christian Songs."—Banner of the Cross.

"They are truly poetical, though poetry appears in them constantly as the handmaid of religion."—N. Y. Churchman.

"We have read this elegantly printed volume with great delight. With rare excellencies, the author has no faults of style to mar the pleasure received from the perusal of his pages."—Protestant Churchman, N. Y.

"These brief poems are evidently the productions of a man of taste and genius. They are replete with sentiments of benevolence and piety."—Episcopal Recorder.

"The work contains thirty-one lyrical pieces, many of them of great merit."—Phila. North American.

"The present selection is small and choice; nothing has been admitted merely to swell the size of the book, but every song has decided merit and ability."—Hartford Calendar.

"They indicate a strong mind, sound sentiments, and a bright fancy."—Richmond Enquirer.

"A volume which should grace the collection of every reader of sensibility and taste."—Germantown Telegraph.

"The volume is a gem of the first water."—Missionary, N. Y.

"We congratulate the religious world on this addition to its stock of sacred poetry."—Toronto Church.

"Oh, steal not thou my faith away," and an "Evening Hymn," included in these "Christian Songs," are two of the most beautiful sacred lyrics we have ever met with."—Neal's Gazette, Phila.

"It is really what it professes to be, a book of 'Christian Songs,' and one which every Christian of taste can and should appreciate."—Christian Repository.

"The versification of Dr. Lyons is smooth and graceful, his feelings those of a poet, his sentiments those of a Christian."—Presbyterian.

"Most of them are of a very high order."—Christian Chronicle.

"The subjects selected are chaste, elevated, and beautiful, and the poetry smooth, graceful, and flowing."—City Item.

"A perfect cluster of gems, set in fine work by the printer and binder, to be preserved for after ages."—Scott's Weekly Paper.

"They are no ephemeral pieces; they will live, and find their way to the heart, and delight the ear, among the few permanent contributions to our growing literature."—Baltimore Church Times.

"This elegant volume contains a collection of lyrical pieces, whose merits as sacred songs will commend them to the favorable regards of the lovers of poetry."—Christian Observer.

Summer Retreat for Children,

AT NEWPORT, R. I.

A gentleman having a delightful residence a short distance from Newport, R. I., and near the sea shore, proposes to take into his family, for the summer months, five or six little girls, between the ages of 6 and 12 years. The advantages of his estate for sea bathing and healthy air are not surpassed by any other on the island. The studies of the children entrusted to his care will be carried forward under the tuition of his lady, who will also extend over them the watchful care of a parent.

To parents proposing to travel, and to those seeking for a healthy summer abode for their children, rare advantages are here offered. Further information in regard to terms, &c., may be had by applying to the "Editor of the Banner of the Cross."

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1848.

[VOL. X.—No. 20.—WHOLE No. 490.]

Selections.

The First Fruits are the Lord's.

Young and happy, while thou art,
Not a furrow on thy brow,
Not a sorrow in thy heart,
Seek the Lord, thy Saviour, now!
In its freshness, bring the flower,
While the dew upon it lies;
In the cool and cloudless hour
Of the morning sacrifice.

Life will have its evil years,
When its skies are overcast;
All the present thronged with fears,
And with vain regrets, the past:
Let him tremble, who, his heart,
In an hour like this, would bring,
Let Jehovah say—"Depart;
'T is a worn and worthless thing!"

But the first-fruits of the year
Have been chosen by the Lord;
And the first-fruits of the heart
On His altar should be poured;
Thus, the blessing from above
On life's harvest shall be given;
Sown in tears, perhaps, on earth—
Reaped with joyfulness, in heaven.

The Missionary. Bishop G. W. Doane

Our Appointed Time.

Bound down to earth, the weary soul complains,
And struggles to escape; panting to rise,
And wing its way back to its native skies.
But He whose breath it is, who ever reigns Supreme, amid the light of light sustains
Its fainting strength, and giveth life new ties,
To make endurance sweet, and thence supplies
A ray of heaven's bliss to earth's sad plains.
Peace, weary one! thou hast a work to do,
Which being fitly ended, thou shalt soar,
And having gained it, quit thy home no more:
Then with firm constancy thy course pursue,
Until all knowledge open on thy view,
When life is love, and love is to adore.

As the Banner is received in many country parishes, we hope the following homely, but most practical and useful lesson will not be lost upon our readers.

Our Pastor.

It looked dark in the pastor's study as he entered it one Friday evening, not long since. And well it might look dark, for his meditations were gloomy, and he saw no star of hope to cheer him in the distance. The truth was his scanty supper had been closed with a conversation between himself and wife on the pressing and immediate wants of the family. There was not flour enough to make another loaf of bread, the last piece of butter was on the table, and to say nothing of other necessities in this line, it was plain enough that several additional articles of wearing apparel were loudly called for, to render the family even comfortable for the winter.

The pastor did not reproach his wife for calling his attention to these things. Neither could he accuse her of ignorance or insensibility in regard to their true condition. No, for she had just told him of her resolution to appropriate her ten dollars of 'wedding fees' to the unavoidable wants of the family, and fix up her old cloak for another year's service.

But still it was dark in the pastor's study. And yet not so dark, literally, as to prevent him from tracing distinctly, the outlines of an empty pocket; not so dark as to obscure the record on his memory that the last barrel of flour had not yet been paid for, and that this formed only one item in a bill at Mr. D—'s store which had been running for some time. Nor was it so dark that he could not recognize brother B—, who just then passed in his wagon, on his return from the city.

The pastor sat down and thus held communion with himself. How can I live here with my present means of support? And yet, with my limited congregation, and the usual amount of salary paid in neighbouring parishes, I cannot have the face to ask for more. Shall I then seek another field of labor? This I dare not think of doing. The congregation has been gradually increasing under my ministry—the church seems united and prosperous. I cannot doubt that providence has assigned me this post. I have every reason to believe, from the kind expressions of the people, and their regular attendance on my ministry, that it would be a grief to them for me to leave.

And yet, there is one thing that I cannot account for. I have received far less in presents this year than formerly. While there is no apparent diminution in the confidence and love of my people, there has been a great diminution in such marks of their favor as called forth the gratitude of my pockets as well as my heart. Year before last, we had butter enough sent in by one and another to last through the winter. This year we have received but one small box as a gift. And what makes it still worse, one pound costs now nearly as much as two did then. One year I recollect we had so much fresh meat sent in about Thanksgiving time, that our chief source of anxiety was to know what we should do with it. Our anxiety this year has been of a nature entirely different.

The pastor felt that the people were under no obligation to continue such favors, and that he had no reason to complain. He did not complain. Still he could not conceal from himself the fact, that what was not a gratuity in the necessities of life must be paid for; and that a bushel of neighbour E.'s chenan-goes, with the best wishes of the donor, would go quite as far in his family as a bushel for which he had to pay a round half dollar. The chine of pork for which he paid 48 cents that very day was no sweeter—no more nourishing than those that came in during the year of plenty almost as often as a porker died in the parish. But it was useless to think of these things now. Something must be done to meet present emergencies. There must be some flour, or before Monday the family must be destitute of bread. Could he, with a clear conscience, ask Mr. D— for another barrel, while the last remained unpaid for, and while he had but small hopes of being able to meet his present debts at the close of the year?

In his perplexity he fell on his knees and commended himself and family anew to Him who hears the young ravens when they cry. Long and fervently he prayed, until his feelings were calmed, his faith was invigorated, and a cluster of rich promises told him to cast all his care on the Lord, and go forward. He seemed to feel an assurance that God would provide—but in what way he was utterly ignorant.

Just as he was leaving the study to go out on his trying mission, he was summoned by the announcement, that the clerk of Mr. D— wished to speak with him at the door. He had long been expecting such a call, and no inference could be more natural under the circumstances, than that the bill of the village store was sent in for payment. No wonder that his faith wavered, and that he went to the door with a heavy heart.

We have already mentioned that farmer B. a member of the church, and a true friend of the pastor, had returned from the city in the early part of the evening. It is only necessary to relate the substance of a conversation that took place at the fire-side that evening, to account for the call of Mr. D—'s clerk on the afflicted pastor.

Not long after Mr. B.'s return, Mr. A. another member of the church called in to hear the news, and especially to enquire about the state of the markets. After Mr. B. had named the prices at which he had disposed of the different articles of his load, Mr. A. remarked, that whatever other folks might say about hard times, the farmers had certainly no cause of complaint. Seventy cents for potatoes, twenty-two cents for butter, nine and ten cents for pork, &c. didn't sound much like the prices at which these things ranged a few years ago.

'Very true,' replied farmer B., 'and now as you have introduced the subject, I will give you some of my reflections on my way home, and some of their practical results.'

He then stated that he had been comparing the fruits or rewards of his labors the past year, with those of some former years. Three or four years ago, he sold his potatoes for twenty or twenty-five cents per bushel. Then butter was ten and twelve and a half cents—now twenty and twenty-two cents per pound. Pork then brought six or seven cents—now it was quick at eight and nine. And this same proportion held in most articles. It had cost him but little, if any more to cultivate his farm this year than formerly. And now look at the result:

100 bushels of potatoes, at 70 cts.	$70 00
75 lbs. butter, at 20 cts.	15 00
150 lbs. cheese, at 10 cts.	15 00
375 lbs. pork, at 9 cts.	33 75
	$133 75

According to the prices of some former years, the following result would appear:

100 bushels of potatoes, at 25 cts.	$25 00
75 lbs. butter, at 12½ cts.	9 37
150 lbs. cheese, at 7 cts.	10 50
375 lbs. pork, at 7 cts.	26 25
	$71 12

Now, said Mr. B. add to these beef, hay, grain apples, poultry, &c. &c., and I think with you, brother A., that we farmers ought not to complain of hard times.

'But,' he continued, 'these calculations have let me into another secret, which it may be important for me as well as you to know.'

He then mentioned that with the same number of cows as formerly, and the same family to provide for as in former years, he found that his butter and cheese not only commanded a larger price, but there was more in quantity. This he was about to ascribe to the superior economy of his wife, when it flashed upon him that he had sold the whole and given none to the minister. He could hardly account for it—certainly it was not that he prized him less highly than in former years. No, no, his heart could not deceive him here. But why was it? Could it be possible that because every thing was quick in the market, he had forgotten to save a cheese and a few pounds of butter for their good pastor? Such a thing had never been known with him before. Perhaps others in the parish had done the same thing. And then, to think that their pastor must not only buy, but buy at a high price also. No wonder Mr. D— refused to pay his subscription for preaching the other day, because, as he intimated, 'Ministers are not over punctual in paying their debts.' He saw, also, that his pastor meant something when in a late conversation he said that 'salaried men fared worse than any other class in these times.'

The result was, Mr. B. said his mind was made up at once, and passing Mr. D—'s store on his way home, he left an X, with instructions to send a barrel of flour, and the remainder in groceries to their pastor.

'And now,' said he, 'brother A. you may have the benefit of my example, and before the first of January, we will see to it that the whole parish are prepared to wish their minister a 'happy new year,' with a clear conscience.—Scribe.

We most heartily agree with the following expressions of the New York Churchman in copying the following address. It is certainly a most excellent one, brief, instructive and to the point. We commend it to the notice of our readers.

We beg leave to call attention to the address, on our first page, of the Rev. A. Louderback, at the laying of the corner stone of the Church of which he is Rector, at Galena, Illinois. To those who have at heart the prosperity of our Western Missions, and who contribute of their means to their extension, it is exceedingly gratifying to see such evidences of the field being occupied by men of talent, learning, and sound Church principles. No one who reads the address, will doubt that Mr. Louderback has these requisites for efficient missionary labor in the far West.

Our last number contained an account of the laying of the corner stone of Grace Church, Galena, Illinois: we have now the pleasure to lay before our readers the address delivered.

We have assembled together this morning, in keeping with our usual custom, to commemorate with suitable religious ceremonies, the act of laying the corner-stone of a noble temple to be erected to the worship and service of the Triune God. The massy stone containing the deposits, has been lifted into its proper position; and the corner-stone has been solemnly placed upon it, with the resounding blows of the workman's hammer, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. May it remain there, in its present resting place even for generations to come—and add its strength and support in sustaining the sacred pile, where the pure word of the Gospel shall be preached, and His sacraments duly administered to the salvation and comfort of unborn thousands!

If it be asked, as it doubtless will, why these religious ceremonies are connected more especially with the laying of the corner-stone of the temple, to be consecrated to the worship and service of the Christian religion, we reply—that the principles of our holy faith teach us, in all our undertakings, to recognise and acknowledge the superintending providence of that God, from whose blessing, success must come to all our enterprises—and that we should begin, as well as continue, and end, all our undertakings in His name, and in humble reliance upon His blessing. "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." The laying of the corner-stone, then, is a fit time to mark the commencement of such an undertaking.

But apart from these considerations, we find an argument in favor of the ceremonies witnessed this day, derived from the natural fitness of things. The edifice which we seek here to erect, it is intended to consecrate, and set apart to the most sacred of purposes—even the honor and worship of that Supreme Being, who is our Maker, Redeemer, and Judge. It is not then any common or ordinary building to be devoted to any common or ordinary uses that we seek to rear; but a sacred temple to the Most High! What, therefore, can be more fitting, and seemly, and proper, since it is the house of God, which on this spot, is to rear its spire toward heaven, than to commence so noble and sacred an undertaking, with the offices of our holy religion! If it were some common building—or (however sumptuous) to be devoted merely to common uses, the neglect of such ceremonies might easily be pardoned. But since it is the house of God, the commencement of which we thus honor and commemorate, with ceremonies of religious service, it gives to such ceremonies, a meaning, significance, and propriety, which at once are recognised, from the natural fitness of things.

If it be further demanded—why, with resounding blows of the workman's hammer, the corner-stone is laid in the name of the Trinity—we answer, by a significant act to show, that we consider that article of our holy faith, fundamental to the whole system—that the Church should ever adhere to it—and that we are not ashamed to confess the doctrine at all times and under all circumstances—and especially, when as at present, we are commencing a temple to the Triune God—the Trinity of Persons, in the one essence of the God-head.

If it be yet further inquired, why the corner-stone is preferred before any other portion in the laying of which, the ceremonies are performed—we reply, because, as in the commencement of the building, it is the prominent part, that supports the whole stress of the edifice, and unites the different parts together, so it is a fit emblem of unity and strength; and is often so employed in the language of the sacred writers. Hence, we read of the early converts, being “built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone”—and again of there being “laid in Zion, a chief corner-stone, elect and precious,”—and of “the stone which the builders rejected becoming the head-stone of the corner.” So that the corner-stone, is eminently fitted, from the association of scripture phraseology, and its emblematic character, to demand the preference that is thus given to it.

The question has been asked by some, why the Christian religion could not be left to gain its empire, and maintain its influence in our world, without the outward aids, of Temples consecrated to its worship—an order of men as its Priesthood—and its external rites and ceremonies? Our brief reply to this question, is, that its Founder and his Apostles deemed it expedient to have it otherwise. Nor can we fail to see, from a moment's reflection, how consistently it should be otherwise ordered.

For in the first place, the Church, as comprising the kingdom which the Divine Founder of our holy religion has set up in our world, is a visible institution; and as such, could not perpetuate its existence, but in connexion with those aids, that tended to give it a visible embodiment. It must, therefore, have its Temples, where its friends and followers can meet, as a visible and regularly organized institution; and, as a necessary consequence, have, in some form, its rites and ceremonies in its associated assemblies. Without these, they would be only tumultuous gatherings and not the orderly assemblies of a well regulated institution—as the Church—viewed as comprising the body of the faithful, and as a visible institution—most evidently was designed to be. For we have the example of the early Christians, in their setting apart particular places, as specially devoted to the solemn service of their religion, which from thence, derived a relative sanctity. This is most evidently proved, apart from all other testimony, by that memorable passage of St. Paul, when reproving the Corinthians, for their gross irreverence and abuse of the Lord's Supper: “What,” says he, “have ye not houses to eat and drink in, or despise ye the Church of God?” evidently alluding to the material building, and not the assembly, meeting together.

The exaction, which our religion makes of social, no less than of private, worship, of all its followers, renders the sacred temple, and its rites and ceremonies no less necessary. For the very nature of such worship implies, the joint concurrence of several persons—and requires a place sufficiently capacious for all that assemble together, conveniently to celebrate that worship; and that all may know, whither they may repair, at their stated times, to meet each other, in its performance. The very nature of the Christian religion—the purposes it was intended to serve—and the necessities of the case, all viewed together, make the Christian temple, with its rites and ceremonies, an essential requisite, in gaining for our religion its empire, and maintaining its influence in our world.

The same necessity exists, in relation to its Priesthood. The Divine Redeemer had in view, when he entered upon his mission in our world, not only the establishment of a kingdom, which he called his Church; but also the communication of a body of revealed truth, of which, the Church he established, was to be constituted at once, both “the keeper and the witness.” For the truths which he revealed, he designed to be of perpetual force and obligation; and gradually to gain a universal dissemination—while, at the same time, they were to exert a moral influence and power peculiarly their own, in the renovation of man, and in the regeneration of our world. This could be done no otherwise, than by a standing living ministry, duly authorized and commissioned, and continued, in a regular succession, from the first establishment of the Church, to the end of time. For the Church as “the keeper and witness of holy writ,” if she fulfil her commission, must take every care, that she preserve and hand down purely, the sacred deposit. In so doing, she proves herself truly to be, as she is styled in sacred writ—“the ground and pillar of the truth.” It is not enough, that we possess the written word, through the keeping of the Church—the living ministry is requisite also, as the duly authorized expositor of that revelation, in giving it its individual application and force, and aiding in its universal dissemination gradually over the face of the earth. Hence, in every effort at evangelizing the darkened portions of the world, the volume of revealed truth has not been sent alone; but the aid of the living ministry, has ever been sought to be added, in order that its teaching may be more clearly apprehended, and its power more fully felt. It is in such capacity, as lawfully and regularly constituted and commissioned expositors and teachers of the truths of Divine revelation—as the same are witnessed by the Church—and in bearing the same to their fellow men, as a message of mercy—that they are styled, “Ambassadors of God.”

The same necessity holds good, in reference to the ordinances and rites of our holy religion, as ministered by the authorized Ambassadors of God in the Church. Because the system of Divine revelation, as given to us by the Redeemer and his Apostles, was designed to serve, no less, as an aid to our moral weakness, and a help to our infirmities and sins, than as the means of enlightening our ignorance, in relation to our destiny, and our duty to our God, to ourselves, and each other. As beings inheriting a nature vitiated and depraved, and strangely impotent in the power, and averse to the performance of that which is good—the Church—the gospel—the ministry—and the sacraments—are intended to lend their aids in correcting the evils of our nature, and so prepare us for a better world. And with such an object in view, they are adapted by the Founder of our holy religion, for the conveyance of spiritual help and strength to those, who will but properly resort to their reception and use, in securing the final happiness and repose of the soul. The rites and ordinances and sacraments, are not barely signs, and outward ceremonies; but as divinely appointed observances are meant to be, to all who rightly and truly receive them, effectual channels for the conveyance of divine grace to the soul. They are the means in the hand of God, of bringing the guilty and defiled soul, under the renovating influences of the religion of Christ, and so moulding, and fashioning, and preparing it, for a higher, and holier, and happier state of being.

In a word, were our religion left to itself, without the external aid of temples devoted to its service—and an order of men exclusively, to minister its rites and ceremonies—and standing institutions of ordinances to be observed—so far as we can see, it must inevitably soon die out, and be forgotten, unless a continued miracle preserve it. In making it, in a measure, dependent upon such aids, its Divine Author knew what was best for us, as social beings, wrought upon by the powerful sympathies of our nature; and what was most calculated to give it true efficacy and saving power, and secure its ultimate triumph in a universal dissemination over our world. We cannot be too thankful, that means so effectual for its preservation, by the blessing of God, have been wisely established by its sacred Author. For no calamity could be greater, than to have our world deprived of its influence, and light, and power, in its dying out and being forgotten. It would be a calamity extending its influence no less over our political, and social, than over our moral condition in life. For all that is elevated, and noble, and happy in these respects, is the fruit of that religion, which our Saviour Christ, entered our world, to promulgate and establish. Hence every man who values such blessings, ought to have the preservation of our holy religion from such a calamity, most sincerely at heart. And if our observations thrown out be true, the best way in doing so, is to multiply those external aids that have been appointed of God, to promote its dissemination, and sustain its influence to the end of time. For every new temple that is reared to the service of our holy religion, and in which its sacred ministrations are duly performed, is a new impulse given to the cause of pure patriotism, and social virtue and happiness, no less than that of revealed religion.

The occasion that assembles us together, is one of mutual congratulation, and should afford us the liveliest emotions of pleasure. Our mutual co-operation, and concentrated efforts, as a congregation, to provide more commodious and ample accommodation for the services of our holy religion, have been crowned thus far with ample success. The earnest and pledge of a complete triumph, is now before us, in the foundations of the beautiful temple that is destined soon, (if God permit,) in all its noble grandeur, to grace this spot! May our fondest hopes be realized in soon witnessing the noble pile completed, and filled with humble and devout worshippers of that God whose house it is destined to be!

We should remember, however, that the work is only begun, and that, for its final completion, there is required on your part, the same steadiness of purpose, and the same zeal, and devotion, and self sacrifice, which has heretofore marked your efforts, to secure this promising beginning. Let the united resolve be formed in the help of God, that the work must and shall be accomplished, and it will be done. No difficulty can then present itself, but what can and will be surmounted—no lack of means present itself, but what can and will be supplied. But such, I am persuaded, you have already resolved upon as a Congregation, and will permit no seeming difficulty to stand in the way of the speedy and ultimate accomplishment of your noble purpose, in rearing this sacred edifice to God and religion! You are too well aware, how intimately all your interests, as a congregation, are connected with the success of the present enterprise; while your pride, and honor, no less impel you to its vigorous and successful prosecution. For, when completed, you will possess as a congregation, a temple for divine worship, combining a degree of beauty of proportion, and durability of finish, with commodiousness, and elegance, and comfort, unsurpassed in all this region of country. It will be an honor to your generous zeal and devotion, in providing the means for its erection, and reflect lasting credit upon your taste and judgment, as a specimen of architectural beauty—while it will no less be regarded as an ornament to our rising infant City.

God grant, that it may be equally beautified by the indwelling of the Spirit of the Most High; and that untold thousands may be prepared, through its solemn services, for the habitation of that eternal temple, not made with hands, where all the glories of the ineffable God-head are revealed to the redeemed soul!

Some Rules for the Conduct of Human Life, &c.

(By Archbishop Synge, 1659—1741.)

VI.—RULES FOR THE INTERVALS OF BUSINESS.

At such seasons as these;—Rule 1.—Divert yourself with reading some pleasant and innocent books (such as history, poetry, &c.) which at the same time may entertain and instruct you, without much labour of thought. But beware of all such books, poems, &c., as are profane, lewd, or debauched. These may well be compared to delightful poison. There may be wit in them; but if you read them, they will insensibly corrupt both your morals and principles. Therefore avoid them wholly.

Rule 2.—Entertain yourself sometimes with a few agreeable friends (too many at once will encumber you) and choose such as are men of virtue, good humor, and good sense; from whose conversation and behaviour you may learn, or be confirmed in something that is good. Shun flatterers, who, for some little ends of their own, will soothe and encourage you in every thing you say or do, whether it be right or wrong: and show yourself always pleased with honest men, who will speak their minds freely, and admonish you of whatever you do amiss.

Rule 3.—With respect to amusements generally, regard them simply as a recreation, and abstain from those which incapacitate you for serious thought and prayer, when the hours of meditation and prayer arrive.

VII.—RULES TO BE OBSERVED BY A TRAVELLER.

I own that I see no necessity, in your circumstances, of your travelling (or at least so soon) out of your own country. You may, in a more easy way learn from books all that is useful for you to know touching all the parts of the world. But since you have an earnest desire, and are encouraged by your father in this way to gratify an innocent curiosity, take the following rules with you.

Rule 1.—I have already told you that a wise man does every thing for some good end. In the first place, therefore, propose to yourself the right end for which you travel. It is not, at least it ought not to be, barely to see new countries, cities, rivers, men, &c. This may be an innocent, but it is an useless curiosity. It may furnish you with matter for table-talk when you return home, but will be of no farther service to you. “The only reason why such a man as you should travel, is to learn something whereby he may become better, wiser, and more serviceable to his country. If this be not the end you propose, your travelling will be but labour lost, and money thrown away, that may be better employed.”

Rule 2.—Wherever you come (whether at home or abroad) contract no manner of acquaintance, much less familiarity with ignorant, empty, or vicious persons; from whom you can learn nothing but vice and folly. But endeavour as much as you can always to keep company with men of the best knowledge, learning, and virtue; who may inform you of the history, antiquities, laws, religion, and polity of each country, together with the arts and sciences that flourish in it; and this without any danger of corrupting either your principles or your morals. These things will be really useful to be known, and will help to make you both wiser and better. But the fashions of apparel or equipage, with the little trifling customs of many people, &c., are hardly worth the observation of a man of sense; except it be sometimes for a little innocent amusement or diversion.

Rule 3.—Wherever you are, take great care always to keep your passions under your command. Let your passions ever be guided by your reason, but never a guide to it. “Passions (like fire and water) are good servants, but very bad masters. And if you suffer them, or any of them, especially anger, to lead your reason, they will often betray you to say and do such things as sometimes will disoblige others and create you enemies, and sometimes expose you to scorn or contempt.”

Rule 4.—Wherever you go, remember that you are a Christian; and be neither afraid or ashamed to speak and act like one. “Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you.” 1 Pet. iii. 15.

This I know you are well able to do; but take care to do it with meekness and fear, as the text adds; or with reverence, as it is rendered in the margin: and still without the affectation of being thought a saint, lest the company take you for a hypocrite. But be not fond of entering into disputations concerning the controverted points, which by many are adopted into their religion, and of which you may be wholly ignorant without any hazard of your salvation. Such disputations may engage you in quarrels in a strange country, but seldom do much good.

Rule 5.—Take care of your health: and for that reason, as well as upon a principle of conscience, be strictly sober and temperate in eating and drinking. Intemperance is the cause of many diseases. Sickness is always a melancholy condition; but more so in a strange country; and most of all so, when it is caused by a man's own irregularity or intemperance.

I will not now burthen your memory with more rules. Have God in all your thoughts, and be diligent in the study of His Holy Word, and in prayer to Him. And may He preserve and direct you. I am yours, &c.

POSTSCRIPT

To sum up all. Wherever you are or shall be:—

I. Live to God; Who is the Author and Giver of life, both here and hereafter.

II. Live to a good conscience; which I may call the life of life.

III. Live to a good name and reputation; which will be an example to others whilst you live here, and after you are departed this life.

Read these Rules often, and with such attention as may imprint the purport of them in your memory. You will undoubtedly add many particular rules to them; but let not these be forgot. A rule that is forgotten is altogether useless.—Dr. Hook's Devotional Library.

From the Rev. Dr. William's Sermon on Ordinary Gifts.

The two former, then, of these qualifications, were bestowed in the Apostolic ages, directly, and in miraculous measures; while to the latter there was also annexed a miraculous power. That state of things however has passed away. So that what the Apostles had directly, “a penetrating judgment in abstruse matters, and ready recollection of written knowledge,” we are to acquire in these days “by long and diligent study.” While we are also to cultivate and cherish, that earnest living faith, without which, wisdom and knowledge will only gender strife, and turn to the subversion alike of the learner and the teacher. But in regard to the two former qualifications it is clear, “that as the word of wisdom, and the word of knowledge, were to the first preachers instead of learning, so in these later ages, when the Spirit no longer imparts his extraordinary gifts, learning is instead of them.” Uniting then in this way, under the general term of learning these two qualifications of wisdom and knowledge, and thereby legitimately simplifying our divi-on; we find that the great characteristics of the Christian Ministry, should be that learning which consists both in the cultivation of the natural intellect, and the storing up of acquired knowledge; and that faith, which in this, as in all other cases, is order to be real and worthy, must issue in the life, and work of love. These should be found in every minister of Christ, who will be a good steward of his Blessed Master, and "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

Now if there be one word of truth in what I have advanced, how full an answer is hereby furnished to what in many quarters—not I am happy to say frequently among ourselves—we have said as to the small importance of a learned clergy. The argument usually being, that since the Apostles were confessedly illiterate men, therefore study is but a human device, which the least cannot be needed, and may be even injurious to the spiritual interests. But one knows not which most to wonder in such an argument; the arrogance of those who make it, or its own utter worthlessness. Because in the Apostolic ages, some persons were restored by a miracle from sickness to health, we therefore to argue that in no succeeding time, should any one employ the ordinary means of curing the diseases of the body? Because the Holy Ghost vouchsafed at once to bestow on the Apostles the highest intellectual culture, and the most abundant knowledge, are we to argue, that in no succeeding time, were the ministers of Christ to strive by ordinary means, to attain such culture, and to acquire such knowledge? The truth is that there never was and never can be so learned a ministry as the Church, as there was in the Apostles' times, unless indeed the Apostolic gifts, should be again vouchsafed. Nor ought such an argument to be adduced, except by one who can lay upon his head the cloven tongue of fire which sealed the Apostles at the Pentecostal Feast. No! next to an ungodly ministry, an unlearned one, is the greatest, deepest curse that God can send upon the Church.

Of the two divisions then of the ministerial learning, which we have named, let us proceed now to say something more; viewing them not in reference to the Apostles' times, but to our own.

We have explained as it will be remembered, the word of wisdom, as implying the power of grappling with the objections, and meeting the attacks of philosophical infidels. Can we say, Brethren, or do we imagine, that this same thing is not needed in our own age and our own country? If we do, we shall be like deceivers and deceived. Infidelity is of a Protean character; and as the ages roll along, it assumes various shapes, and appears in different guises, while its principles are still essentially unchanged, and its end and object, whether avowed or not, are always the subversion of our Holy Faith. And never was there need of a more subtle and penetrating search, to detect the falsehood, and bring it out to light, than there is, in our time, and our country, as well as in other countries of the world. We know no more prevailing stratagem of Satan, at this present time, than that of persuading infidelity, to pay a sort of homage to God's written word, whereby many well meaning Christians are deceived." The struggle now, is not what it was in the last century; it is a more dangerous struggle, more dangerous to common minds; the Bible is nominally accepted now: the varieties of infidelity now support themselves by texts of Scripture, and derive their systems from a perverted and blasphemous interpretation of God's word. It is the acceptance of the Bible, without attaching any distinct meaning to it, or attaching an heretical meaning, which is among the fearful signs of the day. We want no longer a host of evidences for its inspiration; they have done their work: chameleon infidelity has changed its color. It is now the Bible against the Bible; that it is the true sense against the false sense; the Catholic verses against infidel interpretations; the right interpretation against the wrong. It is now an internal war. Believers and unbelievers meet within Bible ground, both accepting the Sacred Volume as the Revelation of God; but each disputing what that Revelation is, and drawing from precisely the same words opposite result.* Would my Brethren that it could be pressed upon the minds of honest and sincere believers, how widely this most subtle poison spreads, and what danger there is that persons will be led captive by its specious pretences unawares. It pervades much of the current literature of the day. It characterizes many of its benevolent projects; and every where it wears a mask which hides its real features from the ordinary observer. It speaks of God, but it believes only in some abstract divine principle, destitute of all attributes of personality. It talks of Scripture, but it regards it as a mere collection of instructive fables. It professes Christ, but it means only a model man, the human form of divine idea. It speaks of the Church, but it means a mere association.† It has usurped the sacred phraseology, it appears in the sacred guise; but its words are lies of crafty cunning, and its garments are a base and vile imitation. I cannot but look upon it as Satan's masterpiece. I would fain reverently hope that it is the development of Antichrist.‡ Ages of open assault have failed. Like the waves rolled backward from the everlasting rock, troop after troop of Satan's leagued host have recoiled from that rock of ages, on which stands the sacred citadel of God's unshaken Church, guarding within its heaven-built walls the old deposit of the Apostle's Faith. But now a craftier method is to be attempted. Assault has failed to leave one mark upon the strong foundation; to secure one outpost of the holy fortress; to dislodge one stone from all the gleaming pinnacles. And now there comes the hour of cunning stratagem. As the Sabine troops in the days of ancient Rome, tampered with the maiden, and promised her as she thought costly prizes, so she would open to them the citadel: so these the adversaries of the Lord, would tamper with the guardians of the Church and of the faith: so do they now hold out fair promises and specious hopes: but let them once be listened to, and it will not be jewelled bracelets that they will place upon our arms, but it will be brazen shields that they will shower upon our heads, and crush us in destruction. Let them then be shunned; or rather I should say let them be thrust away; for "what fellowship hath light with darkness, and what concord has Christ with Belial?" But surely my Brethren, from this brief view you will not fail to see, that if the "word of wisdom" was needful to meet the infidelity of the Apostles' times, it is needful also now. And that since its miraculous measures are no longer vouchsafed to the ministry of the Church, a double duty is laid upon them carefully to cultivate it, by all means in their power.

Recollections of Servia, its People and Religious Customs.

There are many Slavonians, of Servian origin, who live under the protection of Austria. Some of them have brought the deserts of Warasdin and Carlstadt under cultivation, and are represented in the Hungarian diet: the rest form the greatest portion of those military colonies which protect the frontiers of the Austrian monarchy against the inroads of the Turks. These, together with the Dalmatians and Morlacians, amounting to more than four millions, form but one and the same people, speaking the same language, and identified by the same manners and customs; but a portion of them form the advanced posts of the Turks, whilst another are the guardians of the Austrian frontiers. Those who reside in what is properly called Servia have been the least fortunate; for the eight hundred thousand Christian Slavonians who tenant it live in the midst of the Turks, under the immediate yoke of their masters, possessing neither privileges, freedom, nor hereditary nobility. In Servia, which is governed by the pacha of Belgrade, none are to be found but the victor and the vanquished, the master and the slave.

To the tyranny and pride of their conquerors, which have rendered all intercommunity impossible, the Servians are indebted for the maintenance of their native character and national customs.

The Servian villages—if such may be denominated a succession of houses built so far distant from each other than forty or fifty of them occupy as large a space as the whole city of Vienna with its suburbs—are situated in deep and well-watered valleys and extend as far as the narrow passes of the mountains.

Each habitation forms a community in itself. Within the principal residence, which is enclosed by clay walls, covered with the bark of the linden tree and dried leaves, and in the centre of which is the fire-place, various apartments are constructed; the middle room serving as a general rendezvous for the family during the day, and as the sleeping-room of the chiefs, whilst the rest are occupied by the younger people. They form but one household; and at the death of the father, the brothers proceed to elect from amongst themselves a new chief; and they separate only when their habitation can no longer accommodate them all. The father of a family seldom requires the assistance of others. The men build their own residence, make their own ploughs and carts, and the yoke of their oxen; and a coarse hide provides them with shoes. The women are employed in spinning wool and flax, and weaving linen and cloth, which they dye with madder. Every village has its own blacksmith; and several houses hold a mill in common.

Brotherly love is the principal link which unites the patriarchal families. The brother is proud of possessing a sister; and the sister swears by the name of her brother. It is not the wife only who weeps for her husband; but the mother and sister of the deceased are careful of adorning his tomb. In some parts of the country a very singular custom still subsists: if one of two brothers, who are born in the same month, happen to die, the survivor is bound to the dead body, where he remains, until he is released by a stranger publicly declaring that he is willing to adopt him as his brother. It often happens, too, that different families contract, in the name of St. John, an indissoluble bond, and are styled "brethren in God," "brethren of election" (dobratinje). Marriages are formed by a sort of sale. The youth's father first makes a present to the father of the girl; but it is her brother who gives her to the party that comes to remove her from her paternal roof. The bride, after being received at her father-in-law's house, either by the sister or half sister of her future husband, has her mouth closed by a piece of sugar, and remains as a stranger in the house and separated from her intended husband for the space of a twelvemonth.

All the Servian families are bound to the community by a double tie—a civil and a religious one. Each village elects its elders (kmetes) and its mayor (knes), who assess and regulate the taxes. When a murder has been committed by any member of the community, all are obliged to pay the composition. The festival of the patron saint affords another means of re-union and intercourse; and several villages are formed into one district (a kneschina), over which a baschkes presides, who is in direct communication with the government.

What tends still more to cement the ties of union between as a general principle, that the greater the apparent resemblance which a false religion, utterly and fundamentally different in its spiritual character and moral tendency, externally bears to the true, the more reprehensible will be in itself, and the greater its hostility to the truth."

the inhabitants of the different villages is their custom of going to confess to the monks of the nearest convent, where all the adults are in the habit of assembling on certain days of the year; for, after the communion, whilst the old men are engaged in debating on the interests of the country, the younger people mingle together, and give themselves up to dancing. The kneses are obliged to provide means for supporting the monastery, and enjoy the right of appointing the archimandrite, or chief. Notwithstanding the barbarous condition of the Servians, their priests do not possess that influence over them which might be supposed; and, previous to the recent convulsion, the popes (priests), who were in the habit of purchasing their office of the bishop, were treated by him as though they were his servants: their whole duty consisted in reading the service at christenings, marriages, and burials, and in giving notice of such holidays as were appointed by the calendar; independently of this they lived and worked in the fields the same as the other peasants. The monks enjoy more consideration; but they are dependent on the inhabitants, and partake themselves too largely of the national character to be able to mitigate the coarse temperament of the people. Besides the established principles of their religion, the Servians entertain peculiar religious sentiments of their own, in which are united, spite of their apparent contradiction, the belief in an universal providence, and a species of natural religion. They have retained many ancient customs which appear to refer to that mysterious union which weak and uncivilized men conceive to link them with the powers of nature.

In winter, previous to Lent they celebrate "All Souls' day," when every one recalls the memory of those he has lost; but on the approach of Palm Sunday they rejoice at the renewal of spring when all the girls assemble together on a hill, and chaunt the resurrection of St. Lazarus. On the sabbath-day, before sun-rise the females dance round a fountain, and sing a song, which shews how the waters are troubled by the horns of the stag, and how his eye has the power of rendering them limpid.

On St. George's eve, towards the end of April, the women gather flowers and herbs, which they throw into some water taken from the mill-stream, and the next morning bathe themselves in this infusion, thus appearing desirous of partaking of the invigorating force which accompanies the revival of nature.

The next fete is that of Kralitza, which happens at Whitsuntide, when from ten to fifteen young girls are assembled; one representing a standard-bearer, another the king, and a third, who is covered with a veil, the queen Kralitza. In this manner they proceed singing and dancing before every house. The substance of their songs are the joys of matrimony, and the felicity of parents who are rendered happy by their children; and the termination of every verse "Leljo," which is the Slavonian name of the goddess of love, produces a most pleasing effect.

Every revolution of the year has its fete. On that of St. John they say that the sun, seized with respect, stands still three times. On the eve of this day the shepherds, with lighted torches of the birch-tree in their hands, run round the enclosures which contain their cattle and flocks, from whence they proceed to the mountains, where, giving themselves up to gaiety and amusement they leave the torches to be consumed.

Whenever there is a long drought, a girl, stripped of all her garments, and completely covered with herbs and flowers, proceeds from house to house, escorted by her companions, singing and offering up prayers for rain; whilst in her progress she receives from the matrons frequent and plentiful dilutions of water. Elijah is supposed to preside over the tempest, and to be the god of thunder.

The arrival of winter brings with it new ceremonies. On the eve of St. Barbe, the Servians dress all sorts of corn, which they place in a vessel near the fire during the night. The next morning, having observed the situation of the corn, they decide upon cultivating for the ensuing season the barren land which lies on the same side as that where the grain in the vessel has risen the highest.

Thus this people feel themselves dependent on the forces of nature. They swear by the sun and the earth; never doubting at the same time that every thing is in the hands of the Almighty; hence all their labours are undertaken in his name. The set form of every question and plan is, "if God pleases." Each individual, however, considers he is under the special protection of some patron saint.

What more especially characterizes the religious temperament of the Servians is the manner in which they celebrate Christmas. On the eve of this solemn day, the head of the family proceeds to a wood where, having cut a young oak which is perfectly straight, he carries it home, saying as he enters: "Good night," and "A happy Christmas." The inmates then throw grains of corn over him, saying: "God gives them to thee;" and the oak is placed on the fire. The next morning, which is greeted by the firing of pistols, a person appears before each house, and throws handfuls of corn through the door, uttering these words: "Christ is born;" when those whom the corn has touched reply: "Truly he is born." The visitor then enters, and striking the tongs against the oak which is lying on the hearth, he exclaims: "May there be as many oxen, horses, goats, lambs, hogs, and bee-hives as there are sparks!" The mistress of the house afterwards throws a veil over the visitor, and carries the fragments of the oak into the orchard. At the repast which follows these ceremonies, every one present has a lighted wax-taper. They first pray and embrace each other, exclaiming: "May the peace of God be with you: of a truth Christ is born: we adore him." With a view to represent the close union which exists between the different members of the family, the head of it forms the whole of the wax lights into one bundle, and places it in a dish containing all kinds of grain, and an unleavened cake called tschisniza. The cake is then broken, and the person who obtains the piece of money which was put in whilst it was kneading is deemed the most fortunate of the family. The table, covered with eatables, is free for three days to all who may choose to partake of them; and, until new year's day, their mutual salutation is: "Christ is born: truly he is born."

The necessity of assigning an origin for evil has given rise in this country, as it has done elsewhere, to many superstitious customs. The natives believe in witches (wjeschilizes), who *Christian Remembrancer No. LVII. p. 33. Dr. Wordsworth in his Diary in France, mentions, that when Vanini the great theist was arrested at Toulouse, the only book in his possession was the Bible!

†See especially the Last Incarnation, a Translation from the French, and published this year in New York. It is simply Coleridge says, "the superlatation of blasphemy." But there are many other things that might be referred to; I only add, however, that Strauss has been reprinted in New York.

‡It would almost seem that the Pantheistic Infidelity in Christian lands is the correlative of Buddhism in heathen lands. The latter is an imitation, as it would seem, by demoniacal agencies of Christianity; and the former is the same. Both too issue in a "chaos of abstractions," which can only end in Atheism. See the conclusion of Schlegel's third Lecture on the Philosophy of History, and the Translator's note. We may say of Pantheism, what he says of this religion of Fo: "The similarity observed is not real, but is that caricature resemblance the ape bears to man." He adds, "We may lay it down hav the power of casting off their bodies as they would a garment, and, mounting on fiery wings, proceed in search of persons asleep in order to open their side, and take out their heart for a meal. These witches, however, prefer venting their fury upon children. Adults are in danger from vampires (wukodluk), who rise from their graves to satiate themselves by sucking the blood of the living. The plague, that terrible scourge of the east, is likewise represented by phantoms of females, covered with white veils, who carry the scourge from village to village, and from house to house; and many sick persons have not hesitated to affirm that they have not only seen these phantoms enter their cabins, but have even spoken to them. But the most singular of the Servian superstitions are the wiles, who are represented as being very beautiful, adorned with long flowing hair, and remarkably quick in their movements. They are supposed to reside in the depths of forests, and on the borders of rivers. These wiles have the faculty of seeing into futurity; and to many people, who are connected with them, they have imparted a portion of their power. Those, however, who are not initiated, should, they say, carefully avoid meeting them, and, above all, disturbing them in their nocturnal dances.—Church of England Magazine.

The Annual Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

This Convention assembled in St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, at 5 o'clock, P. M., of Tuesday, the 16th inst.

Fifty-eight of the Clergy answered to their names. Sixty-two Parishes were represented by their Lay Delegates.

After the testimonials of the Lay Delegates had been examined by the Secretary, the Bishop stated that it was now the duty of the Convention to elect a Secretary.

Whereupon, the Rev. Dr. Bull, nominated as a candidate, the Rev. Mr. Van Pelt, and the Rev. Dr. Dorr nominated G. M. Wharton, Esq. It thus became necessary to elect by ballot.

Dr. Dorr and the Rev. Mr. Howe, were appointed Tellers for the Clergy, and Drs. Darlington and West, for the Laity.

The result of the first ballot was as follows:

CLERICAL VOTES.

For Rev. Mr. Van Pelt,	20
For G. M. Wharton, Esq.	38

LAY VOTES.

For Rev. Mr. Van Pelt,	14
For G. M. Wharton, Esq.	37

Mr. Wharton was therefore declared duly elected. The Rev. Mr. Odenheimer was unanimously elected Assistant Secretary.

The Rules of order were read by the Secretary, and adopted, and the usual invitation extended to the Clergy from other Dioceses, and to Candidates for orders.

The Bishop appointed the usual Committee, to examine the Testimonials of Lay Delegates, viz: Messrs. Pettit, Wagner, and Rivinus.

The Rev. Dr. Dorr moved the suspension of No. 1, of the "Revised Regulations, adopted in 1829," which provides that "no business shall be transacted on the day appointed for the meeting of the Convention, except what appertains to its being duly organized." The object of this motion was to facilitate business, by the appointment of Committees on Charters, and on unfinished business. This motion being carried, on motion of Dr. Ducachet, it was Resolved, That the Rules of order should not be suspended, except by the consent of two-thirds of the members voting.

A motion was also adopted that a Committee be now appointed on the claims of the Clergy to a seat in the Convention.

The Bishop appointed the following Committees.

ON CHARTERS, the Rev. Mr. Harris and Messrs. Hayes, A. Brown and Rosencrantz. ON CLAIMS OF CLERGY TO SEATS, Rev. Dr. Morgan, Rev. Mr. Howe, and Rev. Dr. Flint. ON UNFINISHED BUSINESS, Rev. Dr. Morgan, and the Rev. Messrs. Rogers and Cooley.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

SECOND DAY.—OPENING SERVICE OF CONVENTION.

Divine service began at 10 o'clock. The Rev. Dr. Flint said Prayer, and the Lessons were read by the Rev. Mr. Natt.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Yarnall. It was a truly excellent and appropriate one. The text was 1 Cor. 1, 10. And this most practical charge of the Apostle, was forcibly and eloquently applied, first to the Clergy, secondly to the Laity, and thirdly to both conjointly.

After the sermon, the Bishop proceeded to admit the Rev. Messrs. Miller, Parvin, and Clotworthy, to the order of the Priesthood. The two former were presented by the Rev. Mr. Howe, and the latter by the Rev. Dr. Flint. After the ordination, the Holy Communion was administered by the Bishop, assisted by several Presbyters.

Immediately after service the Convention was called to order, the roll called, and the minutes read.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Morgan, the thanks of the Convention were tendered to the Rev. Mr. Yarnall, for his interesting and appropriate sermon.

Dr. Morgan, the chairman, made a report in behalf of the Committee on unfinished business.

T. M. Pettit, Esq., reported in behalf of the Committee on the Testimonials of Lay Deputies. Two of these Testimonials were found to be defective, in omitting to state that the delegates had been for six months regular worshippers in the Churches represented by them. One of these testimonials was signed by one member of the Vestry as Secretary, and was therefore defective in this respect.

The Rev. Dr. Dorr, reported in behalf of the Committee on the proposed alterations of the Constitution.

The Rev. Dr. Bull, offered a minority report, concerning the 4th Article, as to qualifications for seats in the Convention. Mr. James S. Smith, offered a proposed Canon, to supersede Canon IX, by which only one-fifth of the Standing Committee would be elected annually.

All these were ordered to be printed, and made the order of day, at 11 o'clock on Thursday.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Ducachet, it was resolved that when a change in the Rules of Order or Revised Regulations was proposed, notice must be given on the day previous, before it can be adopted.

The Rev. Mr. Harris, moved that several Diocesan Canons for which provision was made in the General Canons, be repealed. Ordered to be printed.

The Rev. Mr. Leaf, gave notice that he would move to-morrow the repeal of the 8th of the Revised Regulations, adopted in 1829, which concerns the African Church of St. Thomas.

The hour of two having arrived, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION—5 O'CLOCK.

The Bishop delivered his annual address, which was heard, as it well deserved, with marked attention by the Convention.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Bull it was Resolved, That the clergy be recommended to read the Bishop's address to their parishes.

The order of the day, being the election of Standing Committee and Delegates, was now taken up.

The first ballot, which occupied the Convention until the hour of adjournment, resulted in the election of only three members of the Standing Committee.

While the Tellers were engaged in counting the votes several reports were read.

BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.—This important Society of the Church, held its fifteenth annual meeting on Wednesday of the week in which the Diocesan Convention meets. This has been long its custom, and this evening has always been considered the property of a Society in which not only the Diocese of Pennsylvania, but the Church at large, has so deep an interest.

Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. T. A. Starkey.

The Annual Report of the Board of Managers was read by the Rev. F. Ogilby. From this, it appears that the appropriation of books to various Dioceses and objects, amounted to 4574.

During this year the contributions have amounted to $1097.25. The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Ducachet, from 2 Tim. 1: 13.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year.

President,

RT. REV. ALONZO POTTER, D. D., Ex Officio.

Vice Presidents,

REV. GEORGE BOYD, D. D.,	WM. H. NEWBOLD.
" WM. SUDDARDS,	JOHN WELSH, JR.

" J. S. Newbold,	" A. G. Coffin,
" Thos. Latimer,	" Wm. Martin,
" Geo. M. Wharton,	" T. Tragner,
	J. R. Wimer.

After prayer and benediction by the Bishop, the Society adjourned.

The payment at any one time of the sum of $25.00, constitutes a Life Member, and $50.00 a Patron of the Society, with privileges of membership in either case.

Individuals or congregations wishing to constitute their Pastor or any other friend Life Member or Patron, can do so by addressing Wm. Musgrave, Esq., Treasurer, No. 175 Market Street, Philadelphia.

AGENTS.—The Rev. C. F. Peake, has kindly consented to act as agent for the "Banner," at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, and Wm. F. Walthell, Esq., at Pensacola, Florida.

The following calm, temperate, and dignified "Pastoral Letter," commends itself to the sober judgment of the members of the Church. We trust that there is sufficient good sense, and good feeling in the Church, to judge rightly of an Association which thus formally arrays itself against the constituted authorities of a Diocese. There is an end at once to all rule, and all authority among us, if a regularly constituted organization can be formed in a Diocese, in opposition to the wish of the Bishop, the STANDING COMMITTEE, and the CONVENTION.

Pastoral Letter,

To the Clergy and Congregations of Western New York.

DEAR BRETHREN:—

I perceive this morning, in the Episcopal Recorder, of Philadelphia, a printed Circular, calling for a meeting to be held in St. Luke's Church, Rochester, on the 11th of May, "to organize an auxiliary in the Diocese," to "the Protestant Episcopal Society for the promotion of Evangelical Knowledge."

The Circular is signed by four clergymen and thirty-five laymen, in their individual capacity, and not as representatives of the Parishes; being four from Geneva, one from Penn Yan, two from Mount Morris, one from Oxford, one from Le Roy, one from Oswego, one from Lockport, and twenty-four from Rochester. It has been sent, I understand, to many of the Clergy and Laity in the Diocese, though not to me.

As Bishop of the Diocese, I deem it my duty to say to you, that this, as I understand it, is an attempt to form a Diocesan Society, "a Society in the Diocese," without previous consultation with the Parish Vestries, the Standing Committee, the Convention of the Diocese, or the Bishop. To neither of these bodies, so far as I know or believe, nor to the Bishop, has any Circular been sent.

The meeting is not called to discuss the question of the expediency of organizing such a Society, but to organize it. They say—"We deem it expedient to organize such an auxiliary, in the Diocese of Western New York," and for this purpose the meeting will be held.

Your Diocese has not been informed of this design, in private, or in public, except as it comes from the printed Circular.

shown to him by others, and of which no copy has been sent to him.

The names attached to the Circular, forbid the idea of any intentional, deliberate, and known design, to introduce a mode of action disrespectful to the authorities of the Diocese, in disregard of the Diocesan, and which opens the door to distraction, division and schism.

It will however, I trust, appear both to you and them, that in the same way, by a notice from a few gentlemen despatching a Circular, asserting the expediency of the step, without consultation with any of the authorities of the Diocese, any kind of irresponsible Society—even an anti-Protestant, a tractarian, or anti-evangelical Society, may be formed, and claim the character of being a Diocesan Society, when, as in this case, neither the Vestries, the Standing Committee, the Convention, nor the Bishop of the Diocese have a voice, or have been advised with, in the case; and that, in this way, every Diocese throughout the country, and, in fact, every Parish, may be involved in all the evils of party distraction and schism.

Of the right of individuals to give their money to what objects they please, to promote what kind of religious literature they desire, or of the right individually to combine for the object of publishing, buying and circulating books for themselves, do not raise a question. All are free to do so.

But of the expediency and propriety, not to say right, in individuals in a Diocese to organize, in name or character, a Diocesan Society, "to furnish Episcopalians with a sound religious literature, in the shape of Sunday School books and tracts," for children and parents, without any previous consultation with the Rectors, or even notifying the Vestries, Standing Committee, Convention, or Bishop in the Diocese, I trust that even the gentlemen who signed the circular will, on a reconsideration of the subject, judge adversely.

I am slow to believe that the Soldiers of our Spiritual Army will designedly countenance any effort to carry on the spiritual war, without reference to the officers and the government.

A Protestant Bishop, and a Protestant by descent, by birth, by education, by study, and by conviction, I am a friend, as are all the Clergy of the Diocese, to sound Protestant religious literature, which sustains the Bible and the Prayer Book, but not to measures or views which may elevate the Protestantism of men above the Church of God, which may sink the authority of the Diocese, may invade its regular action, and may substitute party organization for Christian unity, and in my judgment, will lead, not to law and order, and truth, but those sad results of division and schism, which all but the enemies of the Church will deprecate, and from which it is my duty to dissuade you. With the best judgment I can give to this project, I am bound frankly and affectionately to say, that I cannot but regard it as an irregular, needless and distracting measure, and however undesigned to do so, yet calculated to rivet a party character on the Diocese, from which we have been hitherto free, and to provoke and promote disunion and conflicts, rather than to advance unity, harmony and peace. In this view I cannot sanction it. And while I trust it will not be sustained by the clergy and laity of the Diocese, I would fain hope that the gentlemen themselves, to each of whom a copy of this Address will be sent, will see, when they come together, that such an organization is so fraught with evils, and injury to the Church, that they will not complete it.

With this brief statement, I commend you to the guidance of the Holy Spirit, that by the abundance of his grace, all of you "may with one heart, desire the prosperity of his Holy Apostolic Church, and with one mouth profess the faith once delivered to the Saints." Earnestly praying for my whole Diocese, in the language of the Prayer Book, that God would defend them from heresy and schism, let not the foot of pride come nigh to hurt them, nor the hand of the ungodly to cast them down, that so we may joyfully serve him in all godly quietness, walk in the ways of truth and peace, and at last be numbered with his saints in glory everlasting.

I remain, affectionately,

Your friend and Bishop,

WILLIAM H. DE LANCEY,

Bishop of the Diocese of Western New York.

May 5, 1848.

The weekly arrival of foreign steamers can hardly bring us, each time, news of general interest. The Church Papers received by the last steamers are, for the most part, filled with matters of local concern.

We find in the last "English Churchman" an admirable letter from the Rev. Thomas F. H. Bridge, Rector of St. John's, New Foundland, to one of his parishioners, "in reply to his remarks for leaving the Church of his Fathers and his baptism" to become a Roman Schismatic. We shall try and find room in part at least, for this admirable letter hereafter. In the mean time we give the following brief

APPENDIX.—John Henry Newman gained a second class in Classical Literature, and was elected Fellow of Oriel College. He became Dean and Tutor of that College, but left his proper duties to open and superintend a kind of monastery in the neighborhood of Oxford, of his own heart and will. This establishment received no favour, and Mr. Newman went over to the Roman Catholics, whom he had before attacked in most unmeasured terms. He was rebaptized, and is now, it is believed, at Rome.

Francis W. Newman, his brother, gained a first class in Classical Literature, and a first class in Mathematics, and was elected Fellow of Balliol College. He presently went as missionary to Persia, but of his own heart and will, neither ordained nor sent. His undertaking did not succeed, and on his return to England, he renounced his communion with the Church, and joined the Dissenters. He was rebaptized by immersion, and is now a professor in the godless London University. Thus will always end, in one extreme or other, self-chosen ways! [Mr. F. W. Newman is now a Socinian, we believe. Ed. E. C.]

We fully agree with the remarks of the esteemed correspondent, whose desire has anticipated our own intention of republishing the article from the New York Churchman. It is a sad proof of the church's deficiency in practical charity that such institutions are needed. Surely the bond of christian brotherhood in the church of Christ, whose members are all parts of "one body," should be a nearer and dearer tie, than any of man's device! Yet we must own, that practically it is not. And those who fail to make the Church such a fellowship, are chargeable with all the evil resulting from such inventions. We have never been exposed to the difficulty of which "Ecclesia" complains, yet we have heard more than one of our city Clergy make the same complaints. Our duty is plain. If the dead are to be buried, as christians, it is our office to perform the service. If their friends wish them to be interred as "odd fellows," let them "bury their dead."

For the Banner of the Cross.

The Church and Odd Fellowship.

MR. EDITOR:

You would oblige me by inserting also in the Banner, the annexed communication, which appeared in the Churchman of last week; with the introductory remarks of the editor. It is on a subject to which I have long thought that the serious attention of Churchmen should be directed. Like the writer of the article, "I am a parish priest, and several of my worthy people are Odd Fellows;" which has often brought me to take a decided stand against the society, as "going out of its place," in a way that he does not refer to. I allude to the burial of their deceased members. They have a prescribed service of their own, which it is their usual custom to append to the religious services which may have been previously used. Against this I have uniformly protested, on principle; nor do I see how any clergyman can allow the sacred office which the Church has appointed for such solemn occasions, to be mixed up with language and prayers which may be sometimes highly exceptionable. I have always refused to officiate, unless with the express understanding that the Church service, and none other, was to be used; nor have I ever met with any difficulty. In every instance in which I have been called to act, a decided preference has been given to the one only office which the Church permits.

ECCLESIA.

The writer of the following communication has touched on a subject that deserves a fuller treatment. Of the benevolent design of the society referred to, and of the great majority of its members, we have not a doubt; and as little do we doubt that its immediate results, in the relief of temporal wants, are extensively beneficial. These are reasons why they who view its operations from our correspondent's point of observation, should approach it with tenderness and great consideration for the feelings of others; but they are no reasons why its true relation to the Church should not be pointed out. Our own views, it is hardly necessary to say, agree with those of our correspondent.

Should he see fit to continue the subject, we should be pleased to have him view it in connexion with the Offeritory and the capability and obligation of the Church by this means to supply those wants, the real pressure of which leads many of her members to look to a strange source for relief.

From the Churchman.

CAUTION TO CHURCHMEN.

Mr. Editor,—Many communicants of the Church have lately become what is called "Odd-fellows." They generally explain their adhesion to that Fellowship, as simply an interest in a society for mutual Insurance; and they assure me that nothing is "done of them in secret," which a good Christian may not do "to the glory of God." This, I am happy to believe, on their assurance; and with the society, as an insurance company, I can have no quarrel. I find the society, however, occasionally going out of its place as an Insurance Company, and assuming the office of teacher and interpreter of God's holy word. In several of its publications, (either official, or highly esteemed, and widely circulated by Odd-fellows,) I find sad perversion of gospel truth, and many statements with regard to CHARITY, which contradict the doctrine that there is no true charity except in the fellowship of the HOLY GHOST and in the souls of regenerate men. Now, my object, in this communication, is only to inquire, whether Churchmen, who belong to this Insurance Company, cannot prevent the publications of the society from thus attacking the fundamentals of our holy religion? For their serious consideration, I select a few paragraphs, from a dissenting newspaper, which coincide with my own personal observation, and which, (occasionally altering the phraseology,) I include in brackets. I can vouch for their substantial truth.

[In an official exposition of the principles of Odd-fellowship, we are told, that "it brings together men of every sect and party; and as they mingle, from week to week, the rough corners of prejudice are sure to be battered off; and the sharp features of hard-faced bigotry to be smoothed and softened. The partition walls that divide sect from sect, and party from party, are broken down." And thus it is added, that by uniting with the order, persons will become "better men and better Christians, for they will imbibe more of that first and greatest of all graces, charity, that thinketh no evil." Who does not see the bearing of all this, as interpreted by the latitudinarian principles of a large proportion of the members of these institutions? A conscientious devotion to the interests of the Church of God, is "hard-faced bigotry;" and these bigots are to be made better men and better Christians by joining the lodge, where they are taught to "think no evil" of any sect or party! Can Churchmen sanction such doctrine as this? Again: In the official document to which I have referred, the angels are represented as bending from heaven to "smile on the good Samaritan who stoops to bind up the wounds" of a brother of the order—"aye, and God himself will write the deed in the book of remembrance, and bless and prosper him that had compassion on his suffering fellow mortal. Whether these works are done by the Churchman or the Odd-fellow, is of little consequence. They are works that Heaven will own and bless." These are sentiments officially uttered, and yet they most directly and palpably contravene the testimony of the word of God. The periodicals of these societies abound in statements of this character; frequently, however, going to far greater lengths in heretical teaching. A published article affirms that Odd-fellowship is designed to answer "some great purpose in the practical application of Christianity, which the church, as an organization, cannot attain, in the present condition of the world." Another article contains the following:—"What is Odd-fellowship? We answer in a single word, it is practical Christianity. It combines all that is excellent in religion, pure in morals, and benevolent in practice." Such is the boast of a society organized upon the most guarded principles of mutual insurance, yet, practically recognizing the loosest latitudinarianism, as the only genuine Christian charity!

In their funeral orations and obituaries, one of the commonest things among these associations, is to send their departed members to heaven, simply by virtue of their fidelity to the principles of the order. Heaven, itself, is sometimes represented as a Grand Lodge, and our blessed Lord Jesus Christ, is addressed in a blasphemous jargon, as the Grand Patriarch, Vice Grand, or some other official of a mutual benefit association of O. F.!

Now this last asserted fact is the one, which, as having been verified, in my own observation, has moved me to write this communication. I am a parish priest, and several of my worthy people are Odd-fellows. A person in our neighborhood died of late—not "in the confidence of a certain faith," &c., but having never been baptized, and continuing, to the last hour of life, equally destitute of faith and works, though, as a neighbor, we all respected and loved him. He was buried on a Sunday, with extraordinary pageantry and parade. Observing several of my parishioners (communicants) absent from their usually well-attended duties, I ventured to expostulate with one; and begged him to ask himself, whether even a funeral should have withdrawn him from his duties to God, when unnecessarily set at the hour of service, and turned into a mere display of a Mutual Insurance Society? He was a good man, and answered me honestly. No. He added—"I must say my odd-fellowship was staggered a little by some things that happened.—There was Mr. A—, the Socinian preacher, acting as Chaplain; and he said more for neighbor B, than the prayer-book (3) says for our best bishops, at the grave. He spoke as if his salvation was certain; but what worried me most, was—he went so far as to thank the great Lodge-master, for opening the door to the Grand Lodge on High, to our departed brother!"

Now, as a pastor, I only ask, can Churchmen, who may be Odd-fellows, submit to such things, consistently? Have they no redress? If so, I shall more and more content myself in refusing fellowship with any Insurance Company, that so treats the "Communion of Saints, and the FELLOWSHIP OF THE HOLY GHOST."

PASTOR.

A PAINFUL ACKNOWLEDGEMENT.—The following pathetic account we take from the "Pittsburgh Catholic." How sad and painful the necessity which compelled "the Holy Father" to drive out his dear children! And how dreadful the situation of these poor innocents, when thus expelled from the paternal roof and exposed to the temptations and machinations of an evil world! If Rome, the great asylum since the days of Romulus, will not shelter them, whether will the exiles go? The Jesuits turned out of Rome! What next? The "Catholic" history of the fact is almost as remarkable as the event itself. It is only paralleled by the Emperor of Russia's official account of the French Revolution.

EXPULSION OF THE JESUITS FROM ROME.—Not merely as bearing on the subject discussed in the foregoing article, but from its intrinsic importance, we here insert the official report of the calamitous intelligence which has for some time been noised about. The Jesuits are expelled from Rome. Not for any guilt in their spiritual character; not for any political offences; not for any misconduct, even of a milder kind than is implied in guilt; but, solely from that mysterious hatred which, ever since the foundation of the Institute to the present time, has beset and dogged them on every side. Private letters from Rome report a most affecting interview between the Holy Father and the General of the Jesuits, when his Holiness intimated the necessity for their departure. It is said that he burst into tears, and declared that he felt he had himself no longer any right to remain in Rome, if he was compelled to banish from it the most illustrious defenders of Religion. We can add no more at present, but must content ourselves with expressing the deep affliction which this intelligence causes, not to us alone, but to every one who desires the prosperity of the Church and loves those whose lives are devoted to its service.

"Urgent representations have several times been submitted to His Holiness on the part of the Rev. Fathers the Jesuits, wherein they set forth the straits under which their Company laboured, even in that capital, and the necessity which existed for their personal safety being attended to. The Holy Father, who has always looked with an extreme complacency on these religious as indefatigable labourers in the Lord's vineyard, could not but feel a new and most lively distress in so calamitous a position. Nevertheless, regard being had to the now increasing excitement of minds, and the various parties which threaten to bring on serious consequences, he is compelled to take the gravity of the question into serious consideration. We therefore decided, the day before yesterday, by means of an eminent personage, to inform the Rev. Father General of the Company, of the sentiments above expressed, and at the same time, of the agitation in which he felt himself placed by the difficulties of the times and the danger of some serious accident. On receiving this notification, the Father-General having convoked the Father's Consultors to deliberate, was determined by them to yield to the force of circumstances, not wishing that their presence should serve as a pretext for any grave disorder, or the effusion of blood. Hereupon the necessary measures were taken with the Rev. Father-General, with a view to carry this resolution into effect, so as to provide for the schools, the sessions of the Roman College, the religious houses inhabited by them, and the necessities of worship.

After this statement of the circumstances, we are authorised to declare the falsehood of all which was published yesterday in an anonymous print."

The following appeal commends itself to the best sympathies of the charitable. The Rector of this church has won the esteem and respect of all who know him by his quiet and unobtrusive course, and by his zeal and faithfulness. This interesting congregation, though composed for the most part of those whose means are limited, has seldom asked aid from others.—We earnestly hope that their present desire may receive a prompt and liberal response from all who have means to bestow in furtherance of a laudable and praiseworthy effort.

An Appeal to those who delight to praise God with the sound of the Organ.

At a recent meeting of the congregation of St. Thomas' Church, assembled for the purpose of devising means to carry on certain indispensable improvements in and about the Church, besides passing a resolution for the erection of a wall around the burial ground, they appointed a committee to solicit aid for the purpose of purchasing an organ. An appeal is therefore now made to the generosity of every one who appreciates the impressive sound of a good church organ. The smallest donation will be thankfully received and faithfully applied. Any contribution to this object may be left with the Rector, the Rev. WILLIAM DOUGLASS, 243 Spruce Street above Eighth, or with any of the following Committee, who may call with books bearing the signature of the Rector.

Communications.

A friend has kindly translated the following interesting narrative for the Banner. It is an extract from "The Comte de Tocqueville's Regne Philosophique de Louis XV."

For the Banner of the Cross.

Death of the Dauphin—Father of Louis 16th.

An event of the greatest misfortune to France, was soon to stir the withered heart of Louis XV. The health of the Dauphin, hitherto very good, began to fail soon after the death of Madame de Pompadour. He became thin, the brightness of his countenance vanished, and a short dry cough gave token of the approach of pulmonary disease. He was directed to eat nothing but grapes, which for some time being his only nourishment, seemed to revive him; and in the following Autumn, a camp being formed at Compiègne, he repaired thither, and took command of the regiment which bore his name. The Dauphin had always shown a fondness for the science of war, and at Compiègne gave evidence of his skill as an engineer, and directed the manœuvres of the army with the precision of an experienced general. His strength unfortunately, did not equal his zeal. On the breaking up of the camp, the Court retired to Fontainebleau; but hardly had the Dauphin reached that place, when his health grew materially worse, and his physicians declared that hope could no longer be entertained of his recovery. When the opinion of his medical attendants was made known to the people, universal grief was manifested throughout the kingdom; crowds daily filling the Churches to offer to God their prayers for the preservation of a Prince, on whom rested all their hopes for the future. His character had long been misunderstood; for the philosophers, the umpires of the opinions of the day, and who dreaded the severity of his principles, accused him of passing his life in the observance of the minutest forms of devotion; and of being the docile instrument of the priests. The truth shone forth when his illness began, and the voice of calumny was thenceforth silent; from that moment nothing was spoken of but the virtues of him whom the nation dreaded to lose.

The Dauphin of a serious temperament, and fond of occupation, devoted the greater part of the day to study. He used to say, that it was essential to a Prince to be familiar with the language of the various people with whom he was in constant intercourse. He had studied philosophy, which enlightens and expands the mind, mathematics, military engineering, architecture, and history, which he called the true lesson of Princes, and the best school of politics. He had especially directed his attention to the science of government, and to the knowledge of the men among whom he was to pass his life; "for," said he, "to understand men, is the true knowledge for kings." He once said to the Abbé de Marboeuf, his reader, "I consider you a happy man; you see men often." "Your highness has the same advantage," answered the Abbé. "No," replied the Dauphin, "those who in your presence act like men, are for us, but puppets moved by machinery." He was economical, and never asked of the controllers general more than the sum allotted to him, which amounted to 5000 livres a month; and of which he commonly distributed 4000 livres in donations to various individuals. His piety was active and enlightened, his morals austere, and in these respects, he among all the French Princes, most resembled their great ancestor, Saint Louis. The severity of his habits however, did not diminish his sympathy for others. It is related of him, that having once while indulging in the pleasures of the chase, unfortunately shot one of his attendants, he for the rest of his life, renounced all participation in that sport.

The Dauphin was upon his death bed; and yet the festivities ordered by the Marshal de Richelieu, first gentleman of the bed-chamber, had been suspended for but three weeks. In the meanwhile, little care was taken to conceal from the dying Prince, the preparations for the departure of the Court, which was to take place soon after his death; and from his bed he saw all that was going on in the principal Court of the Palace. Orders had been given to leave Fontainebleau, as soon as he should have expired; and as he observed the servants loading the carriages with a multitude of packages, he turned to his physician and said calmly, "It is time for me to die; for every one is impatient at my lingering so long." Soon after he breathed his last, not only with composure, but with joy. The Duke of Orleans, deeply affected by the spectacle of so calm a death, observed to Louis XV, "How is it possible sire, that at the very gates of death, one should preserve so serene a countenance, so perfect a tranquillity?" "It could not be otherwise," replied the monarch, "with one who like my son, has led an irreproachable life." How fine a eulogy extorted from the troubled conscience of the king and the father! The Dauphin died on the 20th of December, 1765, at the age of 36 years; and in him royalty lost its strongest support, and innovation its most efficient check. The Prince possessed by his education, the intelligence necessary to detect abuses, while his eminent virtues inspired respect, and his firmness while granting all that was just, disposed him to resist the inroads of licentiousness. Unfortunately for the peace of the world, his successor inherited only his goodness of heart. As had been the case at the death of the grand-children of Louis XIV, there were not wanting men who attributed the death of the Dauphin to foul means; and suggested poison, through the agency of the Duke de Choiseul. The Prince was known to dislike that minister; for seeing with extreme regret, that M. de Choiseul had made France a mere instrument of Austria, he had at length thought proper to present a remonstrance to the King on the subject. The Duke receiving information of this, complained to the Dauphin in person, of his proceeding. During the conversation which took place between them, the minister so far forgot himself, as to say to the Prince, "Monseigneur, I shall perhaps have the misfortune to be one day your subject, but I will never be your servant." There is a vast difference, however, between insolence and criminality; and there was as little justice in the accusation of the Duke de Choiseul, as there had been in that of the Duke of Orleans. The prejudice and mistrust which had been infused into the mind of the King, with the coldness resulting from them—the calamities of the seven years' war—the degradation of royalty—and especially, the probable destruction of the existing social system, while human sagacity and forethought were at a loss to decide how its place would be supplied—these were the poisons which consumed the life of the Dauphin.

As soon as the King was informed of the death of his son, he sent for the Duke de Berri, the oldest of his grand-children, and taking him by the hand, led him to the chamber of his mother, and ordered the gentleman in attendance to announce the Dauphin. When the unhappy princess thus learned the extent of her misfortune, the tenderest attentions of the King were used in vain to console her. This truly admirable woman, had been removed from the side of her husband, only when he was in the agonies of death. During his illness she had constantly watched his bed, ministering to his wants, with the most devoted affection, as she had before done, while he was suffering with the small-pox. Her constant attendance upon the Prince, predisposed her to receive the contagion of his malady, and soon after his death she began to decline; but courage conquering her sufferings, she prayed for strength to watch over the education of her children. During the Dauphin's life, she had shared this pleasant task with him; after his death, she continued it alone. She was well qualified for her office, being well instructed in French and Latin, and thoroughly familiar with sacred and profane history. Her especial aim appears to have been to train her sons in those duties prescribed by religion, as well as in those which devolved upon them from their high position. Her strength by degrees gave way, and the severe struggle between the desire of meeting her husband in Heaven, and the maternal affection which made her love this world for her children's sake, was at length terminated. She expired on the 13th of March, 1767, fifteen months after her husband; having on the day before her death given her last lesson to her children.

MR. EDITOR:—

From his direct appeal to the Congregation of St. Peter's Church, Old Mortality passes in your late paper to an indirect one through yourself. I should have allowed his last article to close our discussion, had it not been for the personal question which he puts to me upon a point now first opened by him; a question which I meet as cheerfully as I have met his arguments.

He asks me, "Will B. stake his professional reputation upon the legality of such proceedings as this Resolution," for the reconstruction of St. Peter's upon a better plan, "might, fairly interpreted, warrant the Vestry to adopt?"

I might object to the question, for I do not regard it as strictly delicate. My antagonist speaks from behind a mask which he has authorized no person to raise, but one, whom self-respect must of necessity restrain from lifting it. I on the other hand, with nothing to conceal, having given my name to the printer, and my initial to the Congregation, must maintain an unequal strife with an unknown antagonist, who allows me to put to him no personal questions in return.

But in truth, it is manifestly with no desire for information that Old Mortality has asked his question. His object has been gained by asking it. It is his Parthian arrow, as he leaves the field. Certainly my professional reputation, a humble stake, was committed to the legal propriety of the Resolution when it was offered in the Vestry, and I am equally willing to hold it committed to it now, and to the fullest extent. That the Vestry of St. Peter's Church have as ample Corporate power and authority, to take down the present building and replace it by a better, as to repair it, is beyond dispute, nor has any lawyer to my knowledge, either in the Vestry or out of it, ever doubted it. Thus, then, I answer my interrogator, and if he wishes the concurrent opinions of "older and better soldiers" of the bar, let me assure him that they too, if seriously applied for, shall be at his service.

And now, Mr. Editor, the controversy in your columns draws to its close. But what is the result of the discussion? Have my statements been disproved, or is my reasoning refuted? Does St. Peter's Church furnish to instructed minds and earnest hearts in its Congregation, arrangements for the service of the Church, such as the Church herself, in her unambiguous Liturgy, demands?

I speak not, now, of the unpitied occupants of the Galleries, whose discomfort invites a smile or sneer, but is promised no relief. For them, indeed, there would seem to be no immediate hope, so let them, for the present, gasp on in the stifling atmosphere, as heretofore, and if perchance, a few of them now and then swoon and are carried out, or a few young heads or aged limbs suffer from the perils of the steep and tortuous stair-cases, why, let them even be thankful that matters are no worse, and doomed to drowsiness against their will, let them rejoice if the fate of Eutychus, the first occupant of a Church Gallery we read of, is not their own.

Upon the discussion itself, those to whom it has been addressed, will pass. One result it has accomplished, which is to myself most grateful. I know and am persuaded, that the feeble note which I have sounded, has awakened an echo in many a Churchman's heart, within the walls of old St. Peter's. Those echoes will not soon fade into silence. Other and stronger voices will repeat the strain—nor will it die away until it shall be lost in the trumpet-note of triumph. This is no empty flourish. The demands of those of whom I am in your columns the imperfect exponent, are too reasonable, too just, too sincerely urged, to be put aside by the cold vote of the vestry, or the warmer opposition of men who doubtless are Christians, (not very charitable indeed) but who are not Churchmen. Men who denounce a practice as superstitious and pernicious, and yet have perhaps never examined the Rubric which directs it. Men who call it ostentatious waste in others, to replace, through toil and self-denial, a building like our present, with one where God may be worshipped in the beauty of holiness.

The issue is not doubtful. St. Peter's will be reconstructed. Our Christian Temple will yet be built; her foundations will be laid. It is but a question of time. Let an earnest, self-denying, united effort be made, and the vestry will never continue their prohibition. Look at Christ Church. How much was gained there? How much more may yet be gained by us? We ask nothing from the grudging and reluctant, we ask but to spend, and be spent ourselves, to the measure of our ability, and we invite the co-operation of all who think and feel with us as Churchmen, unwilling to abandon the noblest Church site which our city can supply.

The attempt at least, risks nothing. Are we not ready for it? Why not begin soon? Why not now?

Church of the Holy Communion in the City of New York.

MR. EDITOR:—

In a late number of your paper, a writer in opposition to B.'s proposal for rebuilding St. Peter's, says, (not having the paper at hand, I quote from recollection) that if $30,000 can be raised let it be appropriated to the building of three such Free Churches as that of the Holy Communion. The writer appears to have fallen into an error, which it seems proper to correct. The Church of the Holy Communion is indeed free, but cost $45,000. It was built at the expense of a single pious individual; it is an argument therefore entirely irrelevant to the writer's proposed appropriation of $30,000—and certainly not in favor of the opposition to rebuilding St. Peter's, in a style more worthy of the Great Being to whose worship it is consecrated. Other arguments of the same writer struck me as equally fallacious; he says "that God will accept the prayer of the meanest person in the congregation," and by inference, from the meanest place; doubtless, He will graciously accept the humblest offering, if it be all the worshipper has to bestow; so we, would love our children, and gratefully accept their duty in a log hut, but we should think it poor proof of love if, when our children lived in palaces, they permitted their parents still to dwell in the log hut, and should deem it a poor excuse, if they were to say that the recollections of their childhood were so agreeable and their affection for the old hut so strong, that they preferred their parents continuance in the miserable dwelling, for their gratification.

I am not a member of St. Peter's congregation, and have therefore no interest in the dispute, save the desire which every Churchman must feel, to see Temples raised in our city, more worthy the worship of an Almighty Being than any which we at present possess, and more consistent with the great expenditure of wealth in private and personal gratification. But to return to the Church of the Holy Communion; I should indeed rejoice, Mr. Editor, to see through the whole length and breadth of our land, more churches than we could number, in all respects such as the Holy Communion, of which it may be truly said, that "he who comes to scoff, remains to pray;" where the eye of a stranger, after a satisfied glance at the beauty and fitness of the building, is at once arrested and fixed, by the superior beauty and fitness of the chancel, the Communion table, and the expressive symbols of our Saviour's death and atonement; for it is here that the chief decorations of the church are concentrated: here it is known that all the time, and talents, and energies of the pastor, are devoted to the spiritual welfare and improvement of his flock; where every seat is free, and every seat and almost every standing place is filled; where every knee is bent and every voice responds; and above all, where there is no hired choir, no intricate harmonies to show off the skill of the organist, but simple, noble music, solemn or jubilant according to the occasion; when the sweet voices of the children in the choir, led by an older member of the pastor's family, and strengthened by his own rich and powerful voice, alternates with those of the whole congregation, and the building resounds with the united and instructed voices of men women and children.

I have been sir, a constant attendant for more than forty years upon the services of the church, but never realized their beauty till I visited the church of the Holy Communion; I have heard the finest music of the Sistine Chapel and St. Peter's at Rome but have never heard any so grateful to my devotional feelings as that of the Holy Communion, and I could not but lament that beautiful and heart stirring a portion of our services, such an aid and incitement to devotion should be so sadly and universally neglected. I must mention one other peculiarity of this church. On a week day service, the pastor read from a printed volume a well-chosen and excellent sermon, appropriate to the occasion. What a relief it would be to our pastors in general, if only one or two original sermons were expected from them in each week, and what a benefit to their congregations, if the time now so wearily spent in composing and writing numerous discourses, were devoted to catechetical instruction, private visiting and to the superintendence of weekly meetings of the congregation for instruction and practice in church-music: for it is by this mode, that the Church of the Holy Communion has attained such pre-eminence in this particular. In what I have said of this church I only offer a grateful return for the few but happy hours spent in it; but it may possibly induce some to visit it, and if among such visitors, any pastor should be encouraged to cultivate similar music among his people, or any individual be induced to give largely of his or her substance towards the erection of a similar Temple of worship, I shall feel that I have contributed at least a mite, to the setting forth of God's glory upon earth.

Diocesan Intelligence.

NEW YORK.—EPISCOPAL ACTS BY THE BISHOP OF WESTERN NEW YORK.—Acting by request of the Standing Committee of the Diocese:

Second Sunday after Easter, in the morning, confirmed forty-four persons in St. Paul's Church, New York.

In the afternoon, in St. John's Church, confirmed twenty-eight persons.

CONSECRATION OF THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY APOSTLES, CORNER OF 28th STREET, AND 9th AVENUE.—This new and beautiful edifice was consecrated to the service of the Ever Living God on Monday morning last, by the Bishop of Western New York.

The procession, consisting of the Bishop, several of the clergy, and Vestrymen of other churches; the students of the General Theological Seminary; and a large number of the members of the parish, was formed at the residence of John A. King, Jr., Esq., in 28th street. The Bishop was supported on either side by the Rev. Dr. Berrian and the Rev. Dr. Taylor, and was received at the vestibule of the church by the Wardens and Vestrymen of the parish.

The following clergy took their seats in the chancel—the Rev. Drs. Berrian, Taylor, Muhlenberg, Forbes, Haight, Rosevelt, Johnson—and the Rev. L. Carter, Staunton, Carder, Marquis, Eigenbrodt, Parker, and the Rector, (the Rev. R. S. Howland.)

The following Priests occupied seats prepared without the chancel, and knelt at the chancel rails—the Rev. Richard Cox, Southard, Walsh, Fish, Diller, Nichols, Walton, Embury, Hart, Van Rensselaer, (of Western New York,) Hall, (of Maryland,) Washburn, (of Massachusetts,) and the following Deacons—The Rev. T. M. Peters, Duffie, Preston, McGee, Weston, and Shackelford, (of Pennsylvania.)

The foregoing were habited in surplices.

The following clergy, not in surplices, were also present—the Rev. S. M. Haskins, Clapp, Loutrel, and Gordon.

The instrument of donation was presented by Mr. John Smith, Senior Warden, and read by the Rev. Mr. Eigenbrodt. The sentence of consecration was read by the Rector. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. Forbes, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Haight, who read the Lessons. The Ante-Communion was read by the Bishop, the Rev. Dr. Taylor reading the Epistle, and the Rev. Dr. Berrian the Gospel.

The Sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg. The Offertory Sentences were read by the Rev. Dr. Johnson. The Most Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist was administered by the Bishop, assisted in the distribution of the elements, by the Rector, and the Rev. Dr. Berrian and the Rev. Dr. Taylor. The Music was very sweet and effective—Chapel's Second Anthem was sung after the sermon.

We congratulate the Rector and Vestry of this church upon the completion of their undertaking, and are happy, that, after the embarrassments under which the parish has for some time labored, they are now enabled to give to God a structure every way worthy of His service.

LAYING CORNER-STONE.—The corner-stone of the Church of the Intercession, New York, was laid by the Rt. Rev. Dr. DeLancey, on Monday afternoon, the 8th inst., with the usual solemnities. At the appointed time in the service, an interesting Address was delivered by the Rector, the Rev. R. M. Abercrombie, giving an account of the origin and rise of this new and promising parish, and pointing out the great ends to be answered by the erection of this temple of the Living God. The site of the Church of the Intercession is directly opposite Trinity Cemetery, on the Tenth Avenue, Carmansville. Mr. Abercrombie has held services in a room in the vicinity for some months past, and has succeeded in gathering a flourishing congregation. The Church is to be of plank, after a very neat design of Mr. Jackson, a pupil of Mr. Upjohn; and is expected to be completed in about three months.—Churchman.

VIRGINIA.—SERVICES BY THE BISHOP OF VIRGINIA.—On Sunday morning, May 7th, Bishop Meade confirmed in Christ Church, Alexandria, Va., eight persons. The occasion was, in some respects, one of more than ordinary interest. The candidates for Confirmation were persons of various ages, grades, and conditions in life. The aged, the middle-aged, and the young, were there; the rich and the poor; the educated and the comparatively illiterate;—all kneeling together before the altar of their common Father and Redeemer, for the purpose of renewing the vows and promises made at their Baptism, and receiving from one of the chief ministers of the Church, the Apostolic rite of the "laying on of hands."—So. Churchman.

MARYLAND.—ORDINATION.—On the Second Sunday after Easter, May 7th, at a special ordination holden in Christ Church, Easton, Mr. John Neely was admitted to the holy order of Deacon. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. Mason. The sermon was by the bishop.

CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday evening, May 7th, four persons were confirmed in Christ Church, Easton.

CHURCH FURNITURE.—CHRIST CHURCH, CAMBRIDGE.—In addition to the enlargement and extensive repairs which it received last summer, and the completion of its tower by a neat spire, has lately been improved by the provision of a new organ, of four and a half stops, at a cost of $500.

CHRIST CHURCH, EASTON, was furnished with an organ for the first time on occasion of the recent ordination there; an instrument of four stops, of full and mellow tone, from the manufactory of Hall, of Baltimore, having been set up in the preceding week. The subscription for its purpose is understood to have been completed in a very few days by the spirited exertions of a few efficient members of the choir.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH, WHITEMARSH, the other church of the same parish, (St. Peter's, Talbot, Co.,) is about to be also furnished with an organ, for which purpose a subscription is now in circulation.

ST. JOHN'S PARISH, WASHINGTON CO., has received within the past year, a handsome addition to the communion plate. By bequest of the late venerable Mrs. Galloway, a pair of large silver cups, which for some years before her death she had devoted to the service of the altar, were given to the parish for that purpose. The munificence of another lady has added a pair of heavy silver alms-dishes.

THE COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES has also lately received from a lady an Easter gift of a handsome silver alms-basin, with the appropriate engraved inscription, "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver."—Church Times.

Some of the Old Fathers on the Means Of Grace.

Chemnitius on divine Operations and the use of the Means of Grace, especially Baptism.* Translated from the German, as contained in a work of the late Dr. Helmuth, formerly Lutheran Minister in Philadelphia City.

Dr. Helmuth, while treating on the Baptism of the Spirit, says: "In order that our readers may avoid all confusion of ideas, on the workings of Water Baptism, on the Operations of God in general, and the operations of the Holy Ghost in particular; therefore, instead of an introduction of our own, one of the most pious and most learned of our evangelical divines may speak here, who has set forth those points in a clear light: it is the pious Chemnitius, who expresses this opinion upon it.

"How far is Baptism a Means of Grace?" Answer: God the Father reconciles the world unto himself, adopts the believers, not imputing to them their sins. It is certain, that in this manner, as God the Father imparts the forgiveness of sin, it is not imparted by Baptism. Christ is our peace; the death of Christ is our propitiation, we are justified by his blood, &c. &c. Surely, Baptism neither washes away sin in this manner, as it is washed away by Christ.

To the Holy Ghost belongeth the power to offer and to communicate the Grace. Again in this respect Baptism is not to be compared with the Holy Ghost, as though it communicated the Grace equally and in the very same manner with the Holy Spirit himself. But now arises the question: What is the benefit of such Water Baptism? Answer: To Baptism is ascribed such power and efficacy, not as though grace unto salvation is to be sought in it, without and independent of the merit of Christ, the mercy of the Father or the operation of the Holy Ghost; but that it is a means, by which the Father offers, grants and communicates his grace; the Son his merit and the Holy Ghost his gracious influence.

Thus God retaineth his honor; so that we must seek Grace nowhere except with God the Father; the discharge and the cause of the pardon of sin, and life eternal, nowhere but in the death and resurrection of Christ; and the regenerating power unto the new life, nowhere but in the workings of the Holy Ghost. But Baptism, by the word, places before us these blessings, and offers them to us; it imparts and seals them, and thus leads us to Christ; to God's grace and to the operations of the Holy Spirit. In the things that pertain to our salvation, God would treat with us by certain means, and to this end he gave us the Gospel word; which he sometimes uses solely and alone, but at times exhibits to our view, as it were, in a garment; so it is with Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

The Word Baptism and the Lord's Supper, point out to us, where our faith must seek and can find Christ the Mediator; the Father and the Holy Ghost; so that, by Baptism, especially, the benefits are imparted, and sealed to us, which Christ hath purchased, and proclaimed by his Gospel.

Faith is the hand, by which man apprehends the grace of God; but the Word and the Sacraments are, as it were, the hands of God, by which he offers the grace of the atonement of Christ, and communicates and seals the same in the power of the Holy Ghost." So far Chemnitius. Dr. Helmuth adds: "Our readers will perceive from the foregoing, how far the true evangelical Christian places his confidence in Water Baptism; and that he by no means excludes or separates from it the work of grace by the Holy Ghost, but, with his whole heart, believes what in the Scriptures is called: the operations, emotions and workings &c. &c. of the Holy Ghost, and that it is his opinion, that the Holy Ghost, while thus operating uses the above means.

TALKING AFTER CHURCH.—"Well, Laura, give me a short sketch of the sermon. Where was the text?"

"O, I don't know—I have forgotten it. But would you believe it Mrs. A. wore that horrid bonnet of hers. I couldn't keep my eyes off it, all church time. Miss P. had on a lovely little pink one; Miss T. wore a new shawl that must have cost fifty dollars. I wonder her folks don't see the folly of extravagance. And there was Mrs. H. with her pelisse. It's astonishing what a want of taste some folks exhibit."

"Well, if you have forgotten the sermon, you have not the audience. But which preacher do you prefer, this one or Mr. A.?"

"O, Mr. A. he's so handsome and so graceful! What an eye, and what a set of teeth he has!"

A CONSISTENT SERVANT.—A very good lady in Boston had in her employment a young man from the country. On certain occasions, he was instructed to inform any company who might ring at the door that "Mrs. ——— was not at home."

One day John made this reply to an intimate friend of the lady, who shortly went away, leaving a card and a promise to call again. As the card was handed to Mrs. ———, she said:

"John, what did you say to the lady?"

"I told her you were not at home."

"Well John, I hope you did not laugh?"

"Oh, no, ma'am," said John, "I never laugh when I tell a lie."

*Martin Chemnitz, next to Luther and Melancthon, was the most eminent of the Protestant divines of the 16th century, was born the 9th Nov. 1522, died the 8th of April 1586. His Biographer says:—"By the wisdom and firmness of his conduct, and by the profundity of his dogmatical and exegetical penetration he gained the admiration of his contemporaries."

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1848.

[VOL. X.—No. 21.—WHOLE No. 491.]

comes, and quickly too; and that Ruth's mother came peace without speaking to him again."

There was a long struggle between Horace's pride and anger, and his long-smothered but still sincere love for one who had been as a mother to him. At last his better angel conquered, and peace came.

He had feared to see his brother, but Stephen was not there; Mrs. Grainger had sent him away, lest his presence might even rouse the evil spirit in Horace's heart. He saw nothing of the place where he had been once so happy, and the dying mother of Ruth.

"Thank you Horace," she said feebly, stretching out her hand; "this is good of you."

Horace clasped that withered hand—he was too deeply moved to speak.

"I wanted to say something to you," she continued; "will you not do one kindness towards me? I shall never ask more."

"Anything—anything—but one," cried Horace. "Do not ask me to speak to Stephen."

The widow half raised herself from her pillow, and looked at him.

"Horace Leigh," she said slowly and solemnly, "I took you for your brother from the arms of your dead mother—the mother of both. I filled her place as far as another could do towards you. It was my child you both loved—which caused the deadly enmity between you. Do you think that my gentle heart would welcome her mother in heaven, if I have to tell her that the two she loved best here, one as a betrothed husband, and one as a brother—for as such she did indeed love you, Horace—that they were living in hatred towards one another on earth?"

The widow stopped from exhaustion; Horace had fallen on his knees before her; his head was bowed upon his clasped hands, but he made no answer. Mrs. Grainger laid her hand gently on his shoulder.

"Horace, my dear Horace, listen to the mother of the girl you loved; let me tell Ruth, that for her sake you gave up your anger."

"But he hates me too; and I will not ask forgiveness, I will not be the first to yield," muttered Horace.

There was a movement at the half-open door, and Stephen entered; but Horace did not see him until he felt his hand taken gently, and heard his brother say in low tones, with eyes full of tears—

"I do not hate you, Horace; I will be the first to say, brother, forgive me—let us be friends!"

"My children, my children, forgive one another," said the old woman faintly. They were her last words.

Hand in hand, the reconciled brothers knelt beside the couch of Ruth's mother, and watched her during the long hours of night, which she passed in unconscious lethargy, until the spirit fled on the wings of sunrise.

Horace and Stephen Leigh followed the remains of the aged widow to the grave, and saw her laid beside Ruth in the churchyard on the hill-side. Then they returned home—to a home which was henceforth to be the same for both brothers. They never spoke of the past, but lived together as though it had never been. They were not rivals now, for they knew that death sanctified all things, and that in heaven "there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage."

Under the willow tree was placed a stone, with Ruth's name and age, and that of her mother. Below the latter was engraved this line from the Holy Book—

"Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God."

The Jewels.

A TRADITION OF THE RABBINS.

The celebrated teacher, Rabbi Meir, sat during the whole of the Sabbath-day in the public school, instructing the people. During his absence from his house his two sons died, both of them of uncommon beauty, and enlightened in the law. His wife bore them to her bed-chamber, laid them upon the marriage-bed, and spread a white covering over their bodies. In the evening Rabbi Meir came home—"Where are my two sons," he asked, "that I may give them my blessing? I repeatedly looked round the school, and I did not see them there." He reached to him a goblet; he praised the Lord at the going out of the Sabbath, drank, and again asked—"Where are my sons, that they too may drink of the cup of blessing?" "They will not be far off," she said, and placed food before him that he might eat.—He was in a glad and genial mood, and when he had said grace after the meal, she thus addressed him:—"Rabbi, with thy permission I would fain propose to thee the question." "Ask it then, my love!" he replied. "A few days ago a person entrusted some jewels to my custody, and now he demands them again; should I give them back again?" "This is a question," said Rabbi Meir, "which my wife should not have thought it necessary to ask. 'What, wouldst thou hesi-

only two or three remain in England, and those few sadly shorn of their pristine glory. Years ago, this noble forest extended for miles and miles over the country, so that it was a day's journey or more to cross it from boundary to boundary. Beasts of prey made their dens in its dark recesses, and wild deer roamed there in security from the hand of man. Age after age man had day by day approached upon its limits, had driven the wild beasts from their generous covert, and cut down the ancient trees. Now stately heathens and green lawns occupied the place of the dens of the out and the bear. Still, however, though much diminished in and fit, the forest was dangerous for a stranger to traverse without guide; and many an old woodsman, who had been for years accustomed to its mazes, never ventured to pierce into its depths without a mariner's compass in his pocket to tyrannize him on his way.

At the foot of a wooded hill, which formed the boundary of the forest at this side, lay the farm-house of which we have the land. It was in a lovely sheltered valley; behind it, almost the very door, rose up the dark woods in a sudden ascent; panies front were green undulations, scarcely amounting to hills, is wind enough to form a barrier against cold winds. The house, the wraggling, and surrounded by innumerable smaller erec-alacrit looked as an English farm-house generally does, like a village, enclosing within itself its own domestic resources, raising and amusements. And indeed it would have been almost fruitless to the inhabitants to look elsewhere for such appliances. How house was many miles distant from any town, and in ling of time almost inaccessible. There was now an air of deso-lution about the place, which it had not in former times. Large the half empty; cow-houses, with only two or three lowing grove. Master Horace in the old church. A little of this loving veneration seemed to have descended to the child who bore his name; for Horace was ever more regarded than his younger brother Stephen. This might have caused jealousy; but Stephen was of an humble and yielding nature, and so accustomed from his birth to give way to his bolder and handsomer brother, that no more dissensions than are usual with boys rose up between them.

The boys grew to manhood, and the old father died. He was a yeoman of good estate; so that when Horace inherited the farm, with the broad acres which his father during a long and laborious life had added to it, he was considered not beneath the notice of the smaller gentry of the neighbourhood. He hunted with them, riding to cover on fine horses, and set off to advantage a really well-proportioned form, and a face of which any young man would be proud. Horace well knew these facts, and he returned the salutation, with which many of his superiors honoured him, with an air in which there was not over-much of humility; nevertheless, the young squires only smiled, and the ladies would say—

"What a pity such a handsome fellow was not born a gentleman!"

If any asked about the younger brother, the answer usually was—

"Oh, the young man is good enough; clever too, in his way; some day he thinks of being schoolmaster, when old Brown dies, I dare say."

Ruth Grainger had been all her life treated by Horace and Stephen as a younger and petted sister; and now that all were grown up, there was still but slight difference—in their outward behaviour, at least. Ruth knew too little of the world to be aware that such adopted ties could not last forever; that they would either be weakened in their force, or deepen into a stronger and more enduring affection; she had loved both brothers equally in her childish days, had sported and laughed with Horace, and held grave and confidential talks with Stephen. Now, if there was any change, it was that her manner towards the latter was more reserved; it might be from a girlish fear of his great talents. Yet, though she always talked with Horace, she loved to listen in silence while Stephen spoke, and often sat watching the changes of his expressive but not strictly handsome face, when no one observed her. Still, if any one had asked her which of her old play-fellows she liked best, Ruth could hardly have told; but fortune soon brought about the discovery.

A few months after his father's death, Horace Leigh rose up one sunny morning, and without saying a word of his intention to Stephen—an unusual circumstance—rode off to the Hill Farm. He did not seek Ruth or ask for her, but went directly to Mrs. Grainger's little parlour: and when Ruth came in, she heard with surprise, and some slight vexation, that Horace had been with her mother two whole hours, and yet she herself had not been sent for. When she entered the room both started; Mrs. Grainger kissed her daughter more fervently than even was usual to her after a parting of some few hours; and Horace listened with slight confusion to Ruth's gay reproaches,

"And here you are going to run away the moment I come in," said she, seeing the young man take his hat and riding whip.

"I must go now, Ruth; I have business."

"But you will come again?"

"I hope so—nay, I will, indeed I will," said Horace, earnestly, looking with strong affection at the young girl, who had laid her hand on his arm to detain him; he pressed it warmly, shook hands with Mrs. Grainger, and a minute afterwards Ruth watched him from the window dashing his horse at full speed down the lane.

That night, when Ruth and her mother were shut up together in their own room—for the widow and her child were never parted day or night—Mrs. Grainger listened to Ruth's laughing questions as to what her mother and Horace could find to talk about for two hours, and then answered gravely—"We had many things to say."

"Then why did you not send for me to help in the discussion? I wonder Horace did not care to see me, mother."

"Horace is very fond of you, Ruth."

"He told you so, did he? I am glad of it; it is so pleasant to be liked by those one likes very much in return," said Ruth frankly and cheerfully.

The mother looked surprised at her daughter's open countenance, and then said, "I see you do not quite understand me love. Come and sit down here, I have something to say to you."

Ruth drew her footstool close to the widow's chair, and sat down with her head leaning on her mother's lap, her favourite position.

Mrs. Grainger went on—"I know that you and Horace have been like brother and sister; but it is not this kind of love which he feels now; he told me so to-day. Horace loves you very much—more than ever, Ruth; he wishes to make you his wife."

Mrs. Grainger pronounced these words slowly and with visible agitation. Ruth turned very pale, and then a deep colour rose to her cheek, as she said, in a low tone—"I did not expect this, mother. Tell me all Horace said."

And the widow related the young man's confession of a sincere and long-cherished love; his frank statement of his good prospects, his hopes, and his doubts lest Ruth's affection for him should only be of that sisterly nature which had once been all he desired.

Ruth listened without a word, but the quivering of her lips revealed her strong emotion.

"And now," said the mother, drawing her child closer to her. "he only waits for your answer; mine is given. What could I say against one with so much that is good in him as Horace; and who, moreover, will not part from my child while I live? Tell me, Ruth, can you give Horace the love he asks—the love of a wife towards her husband?"

The young girl raised her head; her whole frame trembled; but there was no maidenly bashfulness, no irresolution in her colourless features, as she answered, "Mother, I cannot."

Horace's hopes had beguiled him; even the mother herself was deceived. Ruth did not love him!
